was an assurance given from the Government bench that all amendments would be respectfully considered, and that it was not to be looked upon as a party measure. It seems to me that the refusal last night even to entertain amendments, and the statement of the Government that the Bill should pass as it was, was a distinct breach of faith. I appeal to all honourable members who made suggestions at the second reading if it was not understood that all amendments were to be respectfully considered; and the honourable member in charge of the measure has since signified the same. The Government chose to reject the counsel of those who, in a friendly manner, wished to offer suggestions. The Bill, as now passed, instead of being a measure to obtain the assistance of some very highly-skilled person from England, is a measure to enable a higher salary to be given to a gentleman already in the public service, and to remove from Parliament the control of the railways. For my part, I am afraid the Bill offers very little promise of success; but it is still my most anxious wish that it should prove successful.

Mr. MOSS.—I wish, Sir, to place on record my protest against this Bill. I voted against it at the second reading. And, Sir, last night, when it was put into Committee after midnight, I stayed till daylight, and must say that I never saw a Bill of this great importance hurried through—forced through—in the way that this Bill was. To call ourselves a deliberative body, and at the same time to treat a great measure in the way this has been treated, certainly is not and cannot be right; and I, for one, enter my protest against such a course. It is a great measure—one of the greatest we could have passed. These Railway Commissioners will largely control the labour-market. The great mass of the people ought to be our first consideration. If they are not prosperous any other prosperity is fictitious and of no value. We are now here fresh from the elections, and surely one would suppose that those who, a short time ago, professed so much interest in the welfare of the great struggling people have not so soon forgotten their professions! The honourable member for Waimea has told us of the very great distress that prevails—that there are hundreds of people out of employment and seeking it in vain; and yet a measure which would have been of infinitely more importance than this—a measure which would have certainly given new hope, imparted new confidence, and started enterprise in all directions—tariff revision—is put off because there is no time to deal with it. And yet we can deal with a question like this, which could have been well left till next session. I have noticed that the majority in favour of this Bill has increased in the House during its passage. I am quite sure that the majority outside will increase against it when the full scope of the Bill is understood. We have fallen in love before this with non-political Boards. I remember one which was established by act of this House. The Government Insurance Department was placed under the control of that non-political Board. How long did that Board last? And I add that large majorities are no sign that a measure is right. There were as large majorities for the Insurance Board; and one of the greatest swindles ever perpetrated—the South Sea Bubble—was carried in the Imperial Parliament by 172 to 55; yet it proved a disastrous failure. I may say that in connection with that measure there was one man whose opposition was so continuous that he was called the “Cassandra” of the Imperial Parliament—I refer to Sir Robert Walpole. I have heard the same name applied to a member of this House for his opposition to measures of this kind; and that honourable gentleman might very well be proud of the term. I should hope that, if this measure is passed—as it will now be passed—it will be followed by taking off one Minister from the Treasury benches. We are now taking away from the Government a large amount of work that used to fall upon one Minister's shoulders, and I should hope their zeal for retrenchment will induce them at once to dispense with the services of one Minister. That seems to be the natural corollary to the passing of this Bill, if they are to respond to the cry for retrenchment that has been raised. I have referred to the demand that prevails throughout the colony for the introduction of a great measure this session; and I venture to say once more that this Parliament will not be doing its duty—I am entitled to hold that opinion as a member—if we prorogue without some certainty that that measure will be brought down at the earliest date. The session has not lasted ten weeks yet, and the first four were taken for the formation of a new Government and to allow that Government time to prepare a policy. Six weeks is all the time we have devoted to work, and in those six weeks we have passed Bills far-reaching in their character, and more important than we have ever passed before—measures which, I firmly believe, will work for ill. We have dealt with those important Bills with a haste and in a manner that have never been witnessed in this House before. In six weeks we have disposed of measures which should have taken three or four months to be properly dealt with. I would like to repeat to the Premier that it is not even yet too late to deal with the tariff this session.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question of the tariff is outside the passing of this Bill relating to the railways, and it is my duty to confine the debate to the measure under consideration.

Mr. MOSS.—Sir, there are certain measures for the relief of the people which I consider should be passed this session. It would be very easy for us to adjourn this meeting of Parliament till April next, instead of beginning a new session then. At our meeting in April we could at once take up work left undone now at the stage at which we leave it. By that course we should have no Financial Statement, no Address in Reply—we could go straight to work, and take up different items of business exactly where we left them.

Sir J Vogel

An Hon. MEMBER.—What about the honorarium?

Mr. MOSS.—That would not be affected in the slightest degree one way or the other. The April session would be only a continuation of the present session. The Appropriation Act need not be passed till then: we could meantime pass an Imprest Supply Bill to carry on with till then. We could also then take into reconsideration this Railway Bill. It would not in that case be put into operation until the people of the country have expressed their matured opinions on it, until honourable members have had also an opportunity of again discussing the subject with their constituents, about whose opinions many of them are now talking so freely. When the adjourned session ended the House could be prorogued for a couple of days and begin the new session of 1888-89 without delay or difficulty. I think those honourable members would come back from the fresh breeze of public opinion with new ideas, and, probably, with a greater respect for the opinions of those outside than they are apt to be actuated by after too long a residence in Wellington. I entertain a very strong objection to the Bill, and a still stronger objection to the way in which it has been passed. I have voted against it at every stage, and I shall vote against it now.

Mr. FERGUS.—We have just had one of the usual diatribes from the honourable member for Parnell, delivered in the same old doleful strain—the same strain in which he has delivered every speech he has made this session. The first and the only article in his creed of the politics of the country seems to be that of Protection versus Free-trade, as to which the House has decisively settled that it shall be left over till another session to be dealt with.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honourable member must not refer to the tariff as it may be affected by the system of Protection or of Freetrade, in speaking on the Railways Bill.

Mr. FERGUS.—I will not, Sir, if not in order. Then, the honourable gentleman says this proposed Board will be an irresponsible Board. It is as much a responsible Board as the members of this House are responsible to their constituents. Supposing this Board does not manage the railways satisfactorily, it is open to Parliament to at once resume control, and have them again managed as they are now. Notwithstanding all that has fallen from the honourable member for Kumara as to the working of the non-political Board in Victoria, it must be admitted that there has not been the slightest attempt there to again put the railways under political control. This House has affirmed that there shall be non-political control of our railways by a majority of 56 to 18—a most substantial, absolute, and overwhelming majority. Not one single argument has been adduced by honourable gentlemen opposed to the Bill as to why it should not be given effect to. The question has been before the constituents for several years, it has been a burning question in many of the constituencies, and we find honourable gentlemen on both sides of the House getting up and saying they are pledged to have an alteration in this direction in the management of our railways. Even the late Minister for Public Works told us that he absolutely drafted a measure which, he said, was nearly on the same lines as this, and that it was only because of differences in the Cabinet of which he was a member that it was not brought forward. We know very well that, just after that honourable gentleman assumed office in 1884, he expressed in his Public Works Statement very grave dissatisfaction with the manner in which the railways had been for some years managed, and he said that some such change as that now proposed was absolutely needed in order to bring them into satisfactory working again. He recognised that the evils we were then suffering from were growing ones, and that they would increase to such an extent as would make it absolutely imperative to remove our railways from political control altogether. The honourable member for Kumara has told us that he has received from some person in Victoria communications which say the Board there is going down in favour. Will the honourable gentleman kindly give us the name of the party he got that information from—some data to go on? The last report of the Board seems to show that it is going on from triumph to triumph.

Mr. SEDDON.—The late Minister for Public Works said last night that the Board there was going back.

Mr. FERGUS.—I should be very glad if the honourable gentleman would do so now. I will wait for him to do so.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—The honourable member had better make his own speech. I can speak for myself another time.

Mr. FERGUS.—I was giving the honourable gentleman an opportunity of corroborating the remark of the honourable member for Kumara.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—I stated last night, when the honourable member spoke on this subject, that it was exceedingly unfair to deal with comparisons of this sort in an offhand, slipshod way, as he was doing himself; and that, if he wanted to compare the results of the working of the Victorian railways with our own, it must be in a different way from that in which he was doing it. He was again misquoting figures, as he did last night, from a return which he held in his hand, which he did not understand, and which he had asked me to explain.

Mr. FERGUS.—The honourable gentleman is inaccurate again. The figures I quoted are correct, and from the Victorian report. Why does the honourable gentleman insist on misrepresentation? He has not dealt with the point at all. The honourable member for Kumara said that the honourable member for Kaiapoi had stated the Victorian system was going back. It is either true or not that it is going back. Is the honourable gentleman prepared to say that the Victorian system is falling off in public favour or not?

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—Yes; in public favour.

Mr. FERGUS.—No; it is not so. The train-mileage has fallen from 2s. 9d. to 2s. 6d. But that is accounted for, as the last report says, because the rates have been reduced to an amount of a quarter of a million, and 130 miles of political lines have been made. In 1884 it was 2s. 9d.; in 1885, 2s. 7d.; and last year, 2s. 6d. But the net returns of the railways give 3·60 per cent. on their cost. These are absolute facts, and I utterly deny that any public man in Victoria who knows anything about the management of the railways has said that the present system of management is going back in public favour or in success in any shape or form. The very contrary is the case; and the last report on the Victorian railways, which has been referred to several times in discussing this Bill, proves that conclusively. The honourable member for Christchurch North said the Government had last night intimated their intention of accepting no amendments. Why, Sir, the Government were quite prepared to accept any reasonable amendments that might be proposed. The honourable member for Christchurch North and the honourable member for Kaiapoi knew quite well that the House was in favour of the Bill being passed; and they knew quite well that some hours had been wasted on the Land Bill before this Bill was got to. The honourable member for Christchurch North was not here when the clause providing for the appointment of Commissioners, the crucial point in the Bill, was passed; and, as soon as that clause was passed, the honourable member for Kaiapoi and other leading members of the Opposition left the House—they left the Government to carry through the rest of the Bill, the purely administrative clauses of the measure.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—That is a direct misstatement.

Mr. FERGUS.—The honourable gentleman will have an opportunity of showing that by-and-by. The only members of the recognised Opposition who remained were the honourable member for Sydenham and the honourable member for Nelson, and these two honourable gentlemen proposed, and, I think, successfully, certain amendments, but merely in the administrative clauses. It appears to me that if the honourable member for Christchurch North and the honourable member for Kaiapoi were opposed to the measure they should have opposed it on its second reading, and that they should not at this its last stage bring up a useless division on the question, especially when we have another question waiting to come on for consideration, involving the whole subject of the public works of the colony. It seems to me rather late for the honourable member for Kumara to evolve from his inner consciousness supposed facts to damn the measure. Is he not yet convinced that the House is in favour of the measure? Has not the last division shown him that there is an overwhelming three-to-one majority of the House determined that the measure shall pass? The Government are quite prepared to stand by the measure as it is, and to see that the new system shall have a fair and reasonable trial; and, if it should be found to be unable to meet the wants of the colony, then it will be within the power of the House to sweep away the Board entirely. I hope that there will not be much more discussion on this measure, seeing that it has now reached a stage when further opposition cannot be of any avail.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—I desire to protest in the most earnest manner against the organized obstruction that is coming from the Government benches. Sir, we have to-night a repetition of the old story. Whenever the Opposition come down here prepared to expedite business—determined to devote themselves to expressing, in the mildest and shortest of terms, their objections to a measure passing—we find Ministers getting up and making these irrelevant, interminable, and senseless speeches. Here, to-night, we find the members of the Opposition making a few brief businesslike protests against the passing of the third reading of the Bill, and the Minister of Defence and Justice scattering all hopes of getting business put through by making a speech calculated to raise all sorts of opposition. The Opposition can put up with a good deal, but if things go on in this way we shall have to make a stand, and insist on the business of the country being attended to.

Mr. T. THOMPSON.—I desire to say a few more words upon this Bill, not with any desire to obstruct business or to delay the passage of the Bill, but because I feel a sense of disappointment at the fate of the amendment I moved a short time ago; the more so as I moved that amendment, amongst other reasons, to give certain honourable gentlemen who I knew were in favour of giving Vaile's system a trial a chance of giving effect to their views by their votes. But I have been disappointed with them. It is true that some of them went into the lobby with me; but others did not, and my amendment nearly lapsed for want of a seconder, and would have lapsed had it not been for the honourable member for Nelson. I find I am wrong: the honourable member for Waipa, I understand, seconded the amendment. Several of those honourable members to whom I refer expressed themselves as desirous of giving Mr. Vaile's scheme a trial, and I shall now proceed to read to the House reports of what they said during their election campaigns. I must begin with the Minister for Public Works, whom I was sorry to see going into the opposite lobby. He said at his meeting at Mount Eden, on the 25th July, "I am not absolutely in favour of Mr. Vaile's system, but would agree in giving it a trial, but not throughout the colony." Having in view that statement, I did expect assistance from the honourable gentleman.

Mr. KERR.—I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman is referring to a previous debate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I understand that the honourable gentleman is referring to something that was said on the hustings before the meeting of Parliament, which, of course, is altogether outside the rule that prohibits reference to previous debates in the House this session.

Mr. T. THOMPSON.—That is so, Sir. I am quoting from election speeches of the honourable gentlemen to whom I am referring. Then, this is what the honourable member for Waikato said at a meeting at Hamilton on the 26th July:—

“As regards the management of our railways, he should say he had done good service to Mr. Vaile's system; that he had not only not actively opposed it, but had got all that was asked—namely, a Committee of inquiry; and, as a member of that Committee, he had in 1886 voted in favour of the scheme on every occasion.”

And further, in reply to a question, he said,—

“If it is proposed to risk a large sum in trying Vaile's scheme, I would not vote at all. I would not do so against the wish of so large a section of my supporters.”

Therefore I expected the honourable gentleman to get up and advocate the scheme. The honourable member for Waipa said at his meeting at Hamilton on the 24th August, “that he had already pledged himself to advocate and support Vaile's scheme.” Now, Sir, did he do so? He did not; he simply voted in favour of the amendment. The honourable member for Auckland Central was also a supporter of the scheme then. He said at the theatre, Auckland, on the 8th July,—

“What he had to say about Mr. Vaile's scheme was this: Mr. Vaile was a gentleman who had filled him with admiration for the determination and resolution with which he had followed out his plan. He had displayed great courage in making the proposals he had made in his scheme; and he felt that he could not think too highly of Mr. Vaile, who, in the face of insult, prejudice, and opposition, had followed on in the track of duty; and for his (Sir G. Grey's) own part he would stand by him (Mr. Vaile) as long as he followed it.”

Now, Sir, there are other honourable gentlemen to whom I could allude who also expressed themselves in favour of giving this system a trial; but I will not trespass longer on the time of the House. I have pointed out what those honourable gentlemen had to say at that time, and I certainly do, contrasting their action to-night with what they then said, feel somewhat disappointed at not receiving more active assistance from them. I feel it so keenly that I have voted against the third reading, and deem it my duty to oppose the Bill passing.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—The Minister of Justice is very fond of getting up and talking loudly, and scattering charges in all directions. I am not in the habit of noticing anything of that sort, unless references are made that directly apply to myself; and, in this case, he commenced his oration by charging my honourable friend the member for Christchurch North and myself with getting up and leaving the House when this Bill was on. He had the decency to withdraw, if not to apologize for, the remarks so far as they applied to the honourable member for Christchurch North, but he did not withdraw them as regarded myself, and he refused to give way to allow me to explain. As a matter of fact it was exactly twenty minutes past four o'clock in the morning when I left this House, and I explained to the Minister in charge of the Bill that I should have been glad to stop to the end, only that I was so unwell. I think the remarks of the Minister of Justice were not particularly generous; and that, at any rate, he might have given way for a moment to enable me to explain. The only other thing that I wish to say is that he was mistaken in regard to the Victorian railways. I told him last night that he had misquoted the Victorian report, and he came over to me, and I showed him where he was wrong. He has misquoted it again this evening; and now I will read a paragraph for the information of the House. This is the last paragraph in the main report of the Commissioners before they go into details:—

“The earnings per train-mile amounted to 6s. 1½d. and the expenditure to 3s. 7d., or net 2s. 6½d.; as against earnings last year of 6s. 5d., and expenditure 3s. 7½d., net 2s. 9½d.”

Which gives a difference of 3½d. per train-mile—exactly the reverse of what the honourable gentleman said.

Mr. FERGUS.—No; exactly what I stated.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—No; the honourable member said they were still improving, whereas they were actually going to the bad to the extent of 3½d. per train-mile; and, seeing that the train-mileage amounts to some millions of miles, it comes to a large amount. I may as well read the rest of the paragraph:—

“The additional mileage run, and the reduction made in rates and fares, fully account for the difference in the net result.”

Mr. FERGUS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—The honourable gentleman says “Hear, hear,” after committing a very gross blunder.

Mr. FERGUS.—I said distinctly—and the House will bear me out in this, and I have the Blue Books here too—in March, 1884, the return per train-mile was 2s. 5d.; in 1885, 2s. 7d.; in 1886, 2s. 9d.; and last year, 2s. 6d. I distinctly said that the reason why the train-mileage return showed a less amount was that there were 130 more miles of political railways open this year than there were before, and that the rates had been reduced to the tune of a quarter of a million sterling.

Mr. SEDDON.—As a matter of personal explanation, I should like to say that I made the statement that last year the railways went back; the Minister of Justice said I was wrong, that they were never better than they were last year, while the contrary is proved in that statement.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I have only a few words to say before the Bill is finally passed. I did not vote in the last division, because I had paired with an honourable gentleman who is away; but I am against the Bill, and I wish to say this: The comparison made between the railway systems of Victoria and New South Wales and those of New Zealand are totally misleading, as both these countries have a common centre and one principal town that they converge to, while New Zealand has four principal towns and four centres equally important. The railways in New Zealand are quite different; and the Board that is to be appointed, if matters go so far as that, will find that it will have a great difficulty to contend with which they have not in Victoria. In Victoria they have one centre for the railways, all the lines converging in one direction. Here we have four centres—more than that, five or six—with each line carrying a different class of goods, and having altogether a different class of traffic. Now, much of the complaint that has been raised against the Government for not being able to make the railways pay has been owing to the Government not having a free hand, or the station-managers not having a free hand, to make arrangements for large quantities of haulage. Now, this Board will be in a position to go into these arrangements, so that they can agree to carry large quantities at low rates; and, as they will be expected to make the lines pay, they will, to get traffic, carry large quantities at low rates. Who will then suffer? It will be the people who have small quantities, who want their goods carried short distances, who will have to pay heavily to make up the difference required, owing to the large quantities being carried at lower rates. That, I believe, will be the working of the thing, and I have no doubt that there will be a greater howl from one end of the colony to the other than we have heard hitherto. If revenue has to be increased, there is no way in which it can be done except by taking advantage of those persons who have small lots to send, and I believe that in twelve months' time there will be more annoyance, and more cause for just complaint, than there has been previously, because when the Boards go into this matter they will do what I have said. There is no other way that they can do it but by putting on these extra charges for small quantities, and reducing the charges for large quantities. I certainly have been opposed to this Bill from the very first, because I am quite sure that any ordinary Minister for Public Works could manage these railways as well as any Board, and a good deal better, for he has the assistance of this House. And I would go further, and say that the recommendations from this House to the Minister of Railways have always been in the direction of improvement, and not in the direction of making them any worse. Well, the Board, of course, are not to be expected to have that advice, for it will not be competent for any member of the House to interfere with the Board for the term of their engagement. To my mind, we are simply making roads for people to get into employment at large salaries to carry on the work for a short time, and we shall be disgusted with it in two years, and very glad to get out of it again, and, perhaps, shall have to pay large sums as compensation at the end of that time to get quit of these appointments. I will not say more at this stage, because anything one might say now would be merely a waste of time. I have only to protest against the Bill, from first to last, as uncalled-for, unnecessary, and one that is never likely to work satisfactorily.

Mr. MILLS.—The last speaker let drop something about making the railways pay by competing with the steamers. That has brought me to my feet. I have simply to say that I have voted every time in favour of the formation of these Railway Boards, because I think they cannot fail to effect very great and important results. I think that the railways under the management of a non-political Board will produce better results, without raising the rates improperly, and without any material reduction in the wages of the working-men, as feared by the honourable member for Kumara. I feel sure there are many other directions than these in which the railways could be made to pay, if they were removed from political control. Now, I can say that, as far as my judgment goes, I should have no hesitation in giving the colony 4 per cent. on the money invested in railways and taking the management of them, and that that would leave a very considerable profit to myself. I think there is very little doubt that the railways, in charge of a non-political Board, would yield that result, and that they would do it, as I say, without any such increase in the rates as is feared by honourable members. There is one other thing I should like to say, and that is that I very much regret to hear from so many parts of the House this wholesale condemnation of the present General Manager of Railways—Mr. Maxwell. I agree with what has fallen from the late Minister for Public Works and the present Minister for Public Works, that in Mr. Maxwell the colony has a first-class and very efficient officer. As an administrative officer I think Mr. Maxwell has very few equals; but there is no doubt his manner is very much against him, and has alienated public sympathy from him. I should regret if I thought there was reason to fear that the Government would place Mr. Maxwell in the position of Chief Commissioner; but I certainly hope that they will see their way to place him as one of the three.

Major JACKSON.—The honourable member for Auckland North was pleased to honour me with his attention when he addressed the House re "Vaile's scheme;" and I gathered from his remarks that he considered he had not received that support from myself and other members he had hoped would be accorded to him; and in reference to which I may say that, knowing the honourable gentleman had given notice he would move to have a clause inserted in the Railway Bill providing for Mr. Vaile's scheme being given a fair trial on the Auckland railway sections, I wired to Mr. Vaile as follows: "Railway Bill committed. We propose inserting clause insuring your scheme having fair trial. Write promptly, enabling me defend scheme in Committee regarding transit goods. Think understand regarding passengers." In view of acting in concert with the honourable gentleman I showed him a copy of this telegram, with a result quite contrary to my anticipations: not only did he deprecate any assistance from me, but he bitterly complained of my telegraphing to Mr. Vaile at all, saying I had "jumped his claim," and come between him and his constituents for the purpose of putting myself right with the electors of Waipa at his expense. And I gathered from him that he would rather I did not support a trial of Vaile's scheme at all, and that his principal object was to curry favour with his constituents, who had unmistakably expressed themselves as being anxious that Mr. Vaile's scheme should be adopted. I saw several of the Auckland members, and, in order to heal the honourable member's wounded feelings, I sent a second telegram to Mr. Vaile, which was shown to that gentleman and approved of before being despatched, and was as follows: "Re my last telegram, reply promptly. Required information to enable me support Thompson, who had given notice of proposed clause, and takes charge in Committee." In due course Mr. Vaile's answer to the telegram arrived, which I gave to the honourable member for Auckland North for his information, who subsequently returned the same to me: that is, he placed it in my pigeon-hole, where I found it according to arrangement. Bearing in mind the old adage, "Too many cooks spoil the broth," I determined to leave the matter in the honourable member's hands, supporting him with my vote, and canvassing honourable members in favour of the scheme—with, I must confess, very little success; and, whatever may be the opinion of the country generally, certainly a majority of the members of this House are not in favour of the scheme being tried. I do not know that it is necessary I should take action in this House with the sole object of strengthening my position in Waipa, and, should the honourable member for Auckland North consider it desirable from his point of view to do so, I am sorry if I have in any way interfered with his plans; but I will say, without fear of contradiction, that I am as anxious as the honourable gentleman himself that Mr. Vaile's scheme should have a fair trial under the supervision of those who will honestly endeavour to make it a success. This is not the first time I have said so in this House; and, so long as this eventuates, I do not care who gets the credit, merely contenting myself with giving what assistance I can towards that end. Now with regard to the Railway Board. One of the principal objections is that under its management wages may be reduced. I do not think there is any weight in that argument. One honourable gentleman who spoke recently, the honourable member for Port Chalmers, is, I believe, the manager of the Union Shipping Company. Has he been able to reduce seamen's wages below the average wage paid those employed outside that company; or do honourable members think that if the management were in the future under Government control it would give better results than at present, or that its shares would be more sought after? Certainly not; and when the railways are worked under a Board the employes will most probably follow in the steps of the Seamen's Union, no doubt receiving wages equal to, if not in excess of, those received by others undertaking duties of a like arduous nature. The price of labour will be subject to the law of supply and demand: if the supply is greater than the demand, prices must fall; on the contrary, if the demand is in excess of the supply, prices will be raised; and nothing can permanently interfere with that law. I did not intend to speak on this matter, and should not have done so but for the remarks of the honourable member for Auckland North, and will now merely again say, in conclusion, that I have as honestly endeavoured as he has to have Mr. Vaile's scheme afforded a fair trial.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—I did not intend to say anything upon this subject, and should not do so had it not been for the remarks of the honourable member for Port Chalmers. That honourable gentleman told us that if he had charge of the railways he could make them pay 4 per cent. Now, I have always been of opinion that we should get rid of our railways—sell them. We shall never do anything with them unless we do get rid of them, and I should be only too glad to assist the honourable member for Port Chalmers by giving him every facility to get these railways. If he will only pay 3½ per cent. for them, he will find me voting to give him them, if he has a syndicate to take them over. There is no doubt the railways, at the present time, are mismanaged; and, if the honourable member for Port Chalmers only travelled as I do, and have done for the last ten years, every day on the railways, he would see how they are mismanaged. I am not going into a number of matters with regard to their mismanagement, but will just give one or two examples. First of all I will take the question of return-tickets for what are called excursion-fares. If honourable members have been to Masterton they will know that between here and there there is a station called the Upper Hutt. During the holidays you can take an excursion-ticket to Masterton; but, if a person at the Upper Hutt wishes to get an excursion-ticket, he has to come fourteen miles to Wellington, and by so doing he will save 9s. on the transaction. He has to travel fourteen miles to Wellington, and then back again past his own door—twenty-eight miles in all—and then he will pay 9s. less than if he had taken the ticket at the Upper Hutt. If that is not curious management, then I know nothing about the management of any affairs whatever. Then, there is another matter which struck me as a curious thing. I remember a lady one day coming from the Hutt to Pitone. She was taking children with her, and wished to take a perambulator. She paid 6d. for her own ticket, and the perambulator was sent as luggage in the van, and was charged 1s. for. The same charges were made returning, so that, whereas the return fare for herself was only 1s., she had to pay 2s. for taking the perambulator. Then, I remember a person getting a ticket at the Hutt Station, wishing to go to a concert at Kaiwara, which, as we all know, lies some distance nearer the Hutt than does the Wellington Station. What was the result? He could not get a return-ticket to Kaiwara, but had to take a return-ticket to Wellington, and, by doing that, he made the journey 1s. cheaper than he would have done by taking the ordinary fare to Kaiwara and back. That is another instance of the curious management on these railways. Then, we will go into a bigger matter than these. There was a woollen factory started at Pitone. It was required that the machinery should be taken from Wellington to that factory, and it was found that the drays could take the machinery more cheaply from Wellington than the railway could. The railway authorities, Mr. Maxwell being the gentleman in authority at that time, were asked what they would take it for, and the owners of the drays were also asked; and it was found that the machinery could be taken more quickly and cheaply by drays than by the railway, although the line of road runs alongside the railway from here to Pitone. I may point out another matter. A railway was wanted to the Hutt Race-course. A number of gentlemen belonging to the Wellington Racing Club wished the line to be constructed, but they were unable to have it constructed according to their own plans during several Administrations, and when they asked what the price for it would be they were told £6,500. That was what Mr. Maxwell said would be its cost. When the honourable member for Kaiapoi came into office we interviewed him, and he allowed us to construct the railway in our own way. Sir, in three days our engineers had taken all the levels and arranged everything for starting the line; and in six weeks that line was completed, and was passed by the Government engineers as being equal to any of their own lines; and the line only cost us £3,100, or equal to £9 the half-chain, and I say the half-chain because I wish to point out what the Government did. The Government allowed us to construct the whole line, except the connecting half-chain, and they insisted upon doing that half-chain themselves. They had to put in points, which cost £14, so I will not take them into the calculation, but we supplied the rails; they had merely the half-chain of formation to make. Mr. Maxwell was at the head of affairs, and it took three engineers six weeks to peg out that half-chain. They had pegs in all directions, so that I do not believe any one of them knew which were his own pegs. Then they took six weeks to construct that half-chain—that is to say, it took them as long to construct the half-chain as it took us to construct the whole. And, when the bill came in, would you believe it—I am speaking facts, and the records can be produced to verify them—would you believe it, that half-chain cost £130! The honourable member for Port Chalmers, probably, rarely travels in a train, and, possibly, has hardly ever seen Mr. Maxwell; but, after these facts, will he tell us that that gentleman is a good manager of railways? I say it is absolutely absurd to say that anything could be more mismanaged than the railway-system of this colony. I could give a thousand such instances as I have given here—some of a trifling character and some of more grave importance—but I do not wish to weary the House. I merely rose to say that we shall be very glad if the honourable member for Port Chalmers will get a syndicate to take over the railways and give us twenty millions for them; and, whether the syndicate employs Mr. Maxwell or not, we shall be very glad to see him out of the public service.

Mr. MONK. — There is one more incident which I should like to add to the long list given by the honourable member for the Hutt. I had a letter from a gentleman the other day complaining of the railway management; and, as an illustration of the causes of dissatisfaction, he said that he could send two tons of bonedust from Auckland to Oxford for 11d. less than the freight charged upon one ton.

Mr. LEVESTAM. — I do not think the honourable member for the Hutt showed, by any incident he quoted, that the management of Mr. Maxwell had been bad. One instance he gave was that the Government had taken as long to lay down half a chain of line as the Hutt Park Company had taken to lay down miles; but the honourable gentleman did not say how many men were employed. However, what I wish to say is this: that on the second reading of the Bill I said I would not oppose it, as there was so large a majority in favour of it, but that when it went into Committee I would propose certain amendments. I remained here the whole of last night till past five o'clock this morning, and I did propose some amendments, but I could not get even a seconder for them. One amendment I wished to propose was that the power of lowering the wages of men employed on the railways should not rest with the Commissioners; but I could not get a seconder for that amendment. Therefore I moved for the recommitment of the Bill just now. The honourable member for Auckland North said that I seconded his motion for recommitment; but there he is entirely mistaken, for I certainly would not be a party to compelling the Commissioners to make a trial of Vaile's system in any way. That is all I wish to say. I tried to amend the Bill, and have offered no opposition to it, because I believe a majority of the people of the country, as well as of this House, wish the experiment to be tried, although I said to my constituents that I was not in favour of it.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES. — I wish to enter my protest against this Bill passing. Although a majority of the House appears to be in favour of it, I do not agree with the honourable member for Nelson that a majority of the people want it. It is simply a "fad" on the part of some honourable members that the management of the railways should be taken from the Government and given to a Board. That Board is spoken of as being a non-political Board; but it will be nothing of the sort; and, notwithstanding what the Minister of Justice has said about the Board in Victoria being non-political, I beg to say that a great deal of pressure is brought to bear on the Commissioners there, and the honourable gentleman knows it. He has quoted that Board as being a great success. It is a fact that for the first year or so, on the principle of the old adage that "new brooms sweep clean," they did their work well; but we have it on record that more frequent and worse accidents have happened on the Victorian lines since they have been under the management of a Board than ever occurred before. That simply arises from the fact that the Commissioners were put on their mettle to work the railways on the lowest possible scale, and so they put inexperienced men and boys into positions which ought only to have been occupied by good men. We see the result in the frightful accident at Windsor not long ago, which cost that colony £100,000, besides many valuable lives. I contend that the management of the railways should be under one head, and that head a Minister; but he should attend to that work alone, and not have a variety of portfolios, as is the case here. Our Minister for Public Works is also Native Minister, and I do not know what else besides, and it is impossible for him to attend to all the work. I contend also that outside officers of the department are bound down by too much "red-tape," so that they cannot move hand or foot. If the Minister for Public Works had been more liberal, and had given the Stationmasters and other officers in outlying places discretionary powers, our railways would have paid far better. The Stationmaster at Nelson, or Picton, or elsewhere cannot move hand or foot without consulting the head office; and then, probably, Mr. Maxwell is away in Auckland, or Dunedin, or somewhere else, and a delay of a week or a fortnight takes place before a reply can be got; and that is the cause of a great deal of the dissatisfaction with our railways. I believe it would be by far the best thing for the colony if our railways were sold. We could then reduce a portion of our national debt, and devote a fourth of the money to opening up the country with good roads. That would be the best thing to do; but, failing that, it would be well to lease the railways, or let people farm them; and then I venture to say that, instead of paying something under 2 per cent., they would pay 3 or 3½ per cent. The honourable member for Port Chalmers says that if we have a Railway Board it will make the railways pay better. I am not surprised at the argument of the honourable gentleman, for we all know that self-preservation is the first law of nature, and the honourable gentleman knows that these Commissioners will be in such a position that they will have to increase the rates from one place to another, and that will have the effect of increasing the traffic by the local steamers. I have very little more to say, except that there is such a difference between the circumstances of Victoria and of this colony that it is not right to draw a comparison between them. Here we have two islands altogether differently situated in regard to the management of their railways, and the result of this Bill will only be to increase centralism. The Chief Commissioner will have to be at Wellington, and the others will be flying all over the country, and will have to come here to consult their chief, so that the whole thing will really be managed from Wellington. If there is to be a Board at all there should be one for each Island. I venture to say that before this measure has been in operation twelve months the voice of the country will be altogether against it, and there will be appeals to do away with the Commissioners, and they will have to get some thousands for loss of office. I protest against this Bill, and will give it my strongest opposition.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I certainly think it is time this discursive discussing was dropped. I cannot agree with the last speaker, and am astonished at his arguing that the railways should be sold. What are the people in England endeavouring to do now? They are striving to induce the Government to buy the railways there, and there is legislation being brought forward in the House of Commons to regulate the tariff on the private railways. But I would ask honourable members to come to a vote on the question—if not for their own sakes, then for the sake of the little cherubs who are sitting up aloft, and who do not want to stay here till two, three, four, or five o'clock in the morning listening to discussions from which nothing practical can result. If we do not go to the vote at once, some of the most important Bills which the Government have brought forward this session will have to be carried with only some twenty honourable gentlemen in the House; and those who are now taking up the time in talking will not be here, but will have gone home to their beds.

Mr. ROSS.—I think the thanks of this House and of the country are due to the Government for making what promises to be a successful attempt to settle this difficult question. For the last three years the subject has been before the House and the country. In the Speech from the Throne in 1884 the House was strongly advised to make an alteration in the management of the railways. The same thing occurred in 1885, and frequently, in different ways, the question has been pressed on the notice of the country. I have no fear, such as has been expressed by some honourable members, that the constitution of this Board will have the effect of reducing the wages of working-men on the railways below the current rates. I think the working-men will reap a great advantage from the constitution of this Board. At the present time men working on the railways are liable to be moved about from place to place through political pressure being brought to bear. That will be removed, and the men will be placed in a better position. We are told that some of the best men have been taken away from the Hillside workshops and sent to other workshops in the colony frequently, without considering the circumstances in which those men are placed; and without considering in any way how they would be affected by the removal. They have, I have been informed, in some instances, been ordered to be removed to the Addington workshops, and, on their refusal to go, have been dismissed, in order to make room for persons from other parts of the colony. Employees who have been in the service for years, and against whom no charge of misconduct has ever been preferred, when vacancies have occurred which they were competent to fill, and to which they ought in fairness to have been promoted, have had to endure the mortification of seeing strangers appointed to those positions, their own claims being overlooked or ignored. I think that is a grievance which will be removed by the constitution of this Board. It is a tentative measure; and if it does not succeed, and if it is found necessary to recede from the position we have taken up, it will be easy to do so. I think we have arrived at a condition of affairs when the experiment should be made.

Bill passed.

PROPERTY-TAX BILL.

On the question, That the House do presently consider a resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, recommending that leave be given to introduce the Property-tax Bill,

Mr. TURNBULL said,—I should like to ask the Premier if he intends to take the second reading of this Bill to-night. It is a very important question, and I think the House should know his intention in reference to it. A great many honourable members think that the property-tax should be of a progressive nature; and it would be rather unfair to them that a Bill like this should be brought down without notice, and proceed to its second reading without their having an opportunity of discussing it. I therefore beg most respectfully to ask the Premier to let the second reading of the Bill be postponed until to-morrow. It involves a very serious question, and one that will, or, at any rate, ought to, occupy the time and attention of this House for a considerable period, because the time has come now when we cannot help noticing the inequalities which exist between the property-tax paid by different classes. We cannot avoid noticing the fact that a small number of men hold a large amount of property, and that they do not pay adequately towards the expenses of the country at the present rate of taxation. I am sorry that our taxation should not at once take the shape of a land-tax instead of a property-tax; but, if we are to have a property-tax, we can regulate the exemptions to such an extent as to make it really a land-tax. I should be very sorry to see a tax imposed on machinery or anything used for creating wealth; but there is a large amount of land and property held by a few persons who do not bear their fair share of the burdens which are put on the people. I venture to say that if we gave proper attention to Bills of this kind there would be no necessity for a Legislative Council. We passed a Bill last night dealing with a most important matter. That Bill was forced through the House as others have been, and the consequence is that we hear people say, "Look at the Legislative Council. What should we do without it?" If we gave proper time to consider our legislation in this House we could do away with the Legislative Council altogether. I ask that proper consideration may be given to this question: it is a most important matter; it is a matter in which a great many members are deeply interested; it is a question with which the welfare of the country and the progress of the country are inseparably bound up, because if we had a progressive property-tax I am sure that would conduce very largely to the prosperity of the country. A Bill of this nature is of so much importance that I would respectfully ask the Premier not to insist on its being read a second time until to-morrow.

Major ATKINSON.—The honourable gentleman is mistaken as to the nature of the Bill. It is not a Bill in connection with which we can consider the question of the incidence of taxation, nor is it possible, at this stage of the session, to open up a question of that character. It is quite certain that the House has determined that no alteration in the incidence of taxation shall take place this session; and, if it were not so decided, it is not upon such a Bill as this that the question could be discussed. It is a Bill merely to levy a tax upon the basis of the present Assessment Act. The honourable gentleman's remarks refer entirely to the Assessment Act, which is not before the House now. There is hardly a member of the House not prepared to grant to the Crown 1d. in the pound property-tax; and that is the only question raised by this Bill. I hope the honourable gentleman will see fit to withdraw his objections to the Bill proceeding.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Am I to understand that if one chooses to raise the question of whether there should be a difference in the mode of taxing—that is to say, that incomes of such-and-such an amount should be taxed, and so much above that amount so much—this is not the proper Bill to consider it upon?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; it is the Assessment Bill which provides for that.

Sir J. VOGEL.—This Bill provides for the amount which is to be raised, and, if it were desired to make a change, this would be the Bill by which to effect it.

Major ATKINSON.—No; that ought to be done in the Assessment Bill.

Sir J. VOGEL.—All I say is this: that this is a question to which I have given a great amount of consideration; and when we talk of absentees we must remember that there are two different classes of absentees. There are persons who have made fortunes in the colony and who are residing out of the colony, and some gentlemen who have made fortunes elsewhere and have invested their money in this colony. I do not think the honourable member for Timaru has considered the question as between those two classes. It must be remembered that ever since we commenced colonising the country we have, like other colonies, asked people in England not only to supply us with population, but also with capital. Now, it is incidental to the supply of capital by way of mortgage that property mortgaged should come into the hands of persons who lend money. No person who sent out money to be lent in the colony on mortgage would be unaware of the fact that there is a possibility of his having to purchase the property or become the owner of it; and therefore, if you put taxation on absentees generally, you put taxation on the introduction of capital by persons who would have no other idea than to send out capital simply to be advanced on mortgage, and who have no intention of coming to reside here; and these persons are doing good work by supplying capital, so far as the colony is concerned. Any one who knows anything of the history of the colony knows that we have always had held up before us the inexpediency of discouraging the introduction of capital; and if the Government can discover any means of distinguishing between the two classes I have referred to—of putting taxation upon those persons who have made their money in the colony and are spending it at Home, and not taxing those persons who have become owners of property in the colony not by their own will, but by force of circumstances, arising out of their having invested money in the colony—they will have solved a very difficult problem. I do not say that it is undesirable that we should tax those persons who, having made their money in the colony, are living out of the colony; but I think we should not be unmindful of the obligations which are owing to that different class of investors to whom I have referred.

Mr. MOSS.—I suppose that we shall have to swallow this Bill without due consideration; but I will take the opportunity of saying that this property-tax, which was brought to us as an old American system, is now entirely obsolete in America. It was never more than a local tax there, it was never used by the Federal Government as a system of taxation, and now it has been abandoned in every State except three or four. If this Bill had been brought down at a time when we could have fairly considered it we might have shown very good reasons for pursuing the same course here—of abandoning a tax calculated to divide classes, which is very oppressive upon the people, and is a very serious impediment to the progress of the country. We have not that opportunity, but I do not wish it to go forth that the House at all unanimously acquiesces in the levying of this tax as a matter of course.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—With regard to the question of the property-tax, I might point out that this system of raising and lowering the tax year by year is a very disturbing element in connection with the investment of capital in this colony. It is not like the income-tax at Home, which we know varies frequently, because the incidence is different. I know, as a matter of fact, that there is nothing which deters more the introduction of capital into this colony than the uncertainty which prevails in reference to the amount of the yearly tax. It is quite clear that no one can know, from time to time, what the taxation is going to be, and therefore borrowers and lenders cannot make their arrangements as they would like to make them; and I feel convinced that if we levied a property-tax at a certain rate, and fixed it for three or five years, great good would be done. I rise to direct attention to that subject, because I know that the present system has operated injuriously to the colony, and I venture to say that it will continue to do so.

Motion agreed to.

Bill introduced, and read a first time.

LOAN BILL.

This Bill was introduced and read a first time.

Major ATKINSON, in moving the second reading, said,—I am sorry there is not a larger House, especially on the Opposition side, since members of the Opposition have expressed themselves as exceedingly anxious to know the views of the Government on this subject; but there is no doubt that the Loan Bill, speaking broadly, meets with the entire approval of the Opposition, or they would be here to learn the reasons which I shall give, and give very shortly, for introducing this measure. I may say that the Bill has been introduced by the Government with very great regret. I am not letting the House unduly into secrets when I say that when I took office I was thoroughly determined, in my own mind, that, if possible, no loan should be proposed at all; but, after I had mastered the position, it seemed to me that a loan was absolutely necessary in the interests of the country. I myself was first convinced, and it took some time to convince the Government of the fact; and, apparently, the House is not yet convinced. I am not at all sorry to see this, because, in my opinion, it is a most excellent sign that the House will not consent to further borrowing without being thoroughly convinced of the necessity for it. I wish the House to understand that that was the attitude, first, of myself as Treasurer, and, secondly, of the Government, when they came to consider the question. We had to look at the responsibilities and liabilities absolutely incurred by the late Government; and, even putting them at a very moderate rate, before we finally came to a conclusion as to what public works should be carried on, we unanimously arrived at the conclusion that there was no possibility of avoiding the loan which we now propose. Now, Sir, I want the House to consider this question, if possible, from the point of view of the country, and not from the point of view of party. I want honourable members to look at it from the broad point of view of the interests of the country. The Government have very carefully considered the proposals which they have submitted to the House; and, as far as they can see, not only will very considerable inconvenience occur if any of the proposals which they have submitted are not carried out, but something more than inconvenience will be the consequence—there will be considerable loss to the country. The position of the country, in the opinion of the Government, is such as to require very careful consideration on the part of every man in this House, as to how far we can properly go in reducing expenditure under loan. The Government are therefore very anxious that the House should approach this subject, as I have said, not in a spirit of party but in a spirit of doing the best for the country, irrespective of party altogether. Therefore the position which the Government will take up, if the House approaches the subject in the spirit I have named—and I have no doubt it will—is this: They have carefully considered all the proposals they have submitted. It is possible that they may have submitted some proposals which the House in its wisdom may consider unnecessary—the House may say, looking at the position of everything, that it is better to stop and not go on with further borrowing in respect to them. When the House goes into Committee on the public-works estimates the Government is going to ask it to consider every item carefully, and to say whether, in the interest of the country, it will be right to stop this or that particular work and refuse further expenditure on it; and if, after fair discussion in Committee, without party spirit, the House determines that such and such works are not necessary, then the Government will accept the verdict of the Committee, and will be prepared to reduce the Loan Bill according to the amount that may be struck off in Committee. Now, Sir, that may be said to be a weakness on the part of the Government; but I think, after the large majority the Government have had on all their important measures, they are strong enough to come to this House and ask it to consider every one of these items irrespective of party, and only look at them from the point of view of the necessity of the position. We shall advance reasons why we have placed these particular items on the estimates, and shall then ask the Committee to consider dispassionately whether they are necessary or not; and, when the Committee has completed its labours, if any substantial reduction is made we shall be prepared to reduce the Loan Bill accordingly. I do not know whether I need say more on this subject. I had thought of whether it would be right to go into the whole question of how we borrow from one fund for the benefit of another; but, on further consideration, I do not think, at this stage, it is desirable to do so. It might open questions that would be irritating to honourable members. I may say that I myself am very much displeased with the power we have of borrowing from one fund and giving to another; but, after looking at the position of the various loans and the position of the General Account, it does not seem to me possible this session to make such an alteration as I should like to see. The engagements are so large, and the responsibilities so great, that I do not see how I could propose, as I should like to do, an immediate stop of this plan of using one loan for another, nominally under the power we possess of investing the surplus funds of a particular loan.

Major Atkinson

But, Sir, the responsibilities of the Government are very great. We have now enormous sums of money to provide against particular dates. I may say that in the month of April next we have to provide £1,800,000 on the London market. Now, when honourable gentlemen recognise that that has to be provided at the beginning of the year, when we have got no revenue in at all, honourable gentlemen will see the great difficulty of the position; but, after careful consideration, I do not see that we could gain much by opening up this question during the present session. But, in my opinion, this system of borrowing from one account in aid of another should be put a stop to at the earliest possible date. I am quite certain it is a vicious system, and the chief part of the Treasurer's time is taken up with contriving how to get hold of sufficient money to meet his engagements. That should be put a stop to. I find our liabilities are so great that it is absolutely impossible to deal with it this session, and therefore I do not propose to go further into the question at this time. But I must tell the House this: that it is absolutely necessary, as far as I can see, not to suddenly stop our public-works expenditure. I want to impress upon the House that the Government feel as strongly as it is possible for any member of the House to feel a repugnance to further borrowing. It is only from the necessity of the position to wind up the system we have got into at the earliest possible date that we propose this loan. I hope no panic will seize us, and that no heroic measure will be resorted to. It is proposed by some honourable members that we should immediately stop borrowing. That is what I call an heroic measure. If honourable members will look at the estimates they will see that, although there is considerable expenditure next year, it will consist almost entirely of liabilities.

Mr. SEDDON.—There is £43,000 for Canterbury and Otago over liabilities.

Major ATKINSON.—There is a very large amount for the West Coast which might be cut off if it were not for "engagements;" therefore we are obliged to make this provision. I do not want to raise a question of this sort, and if the honourable member for Kumara can show that there is £43,000 for any part of the colony, I do not care where, that we can reasonably cut off, I hope he will make the proposal in Committee, and he will receive the assistance of the Government in the matter. But, Sir, speaking with regard to this heroic policy, there are some members who say, "Put your foot down and take the consequences." We must look at it as business-men charged with the government of the country, and we consider that we are not justified in making a sudden stoppage of this very large expenditure which has been running on for many years; but we are now bound immediately to put our foot down and say we will bring it to a conclusion at the earliest possible date; and I think, if honourable gentlemen will carefully study the estimates, they will see that the Government proposals are such as to bring that system to a conclusion at the earliest possible date without creating something like a panic in the country. That the retrenchments proposed are very serious and effective nobody who studies our estimates can doubt. I do not doubt that the Government will receive the assistance of the Committee; and, if the Committee see their way to strike off any large works, and say they are not to proceed, but are to come to an end, the Government will willingly and carefully consider the matter; and if, after careful consideration, the Government think it right to do so, they will be prepared to reduce the loan to that amount: not in the way the honourable gentleman opposite appeared to twit us—namely, that we should allow the Committee to deal with us as it liked. We give a million as what we think a reasonable amount to carry on the service of the country; but, if the House determines to say that particular works shall be cut off, looking at the position of the country, we are not prepared to say that the Government, as a Government, will not undertake the responsibility of continuing administration when these sums are cut off. I hope the Committee will give the proposals of the Government fair and reasonable consideration; and if they are accepted, either in the whole or in a modified form, if they will effect that which we desire, we shall act in accordance with the wishes of the Committee, and so bring to an end this miserable system of applying loan-money to all sorts of works. We have got to put a stop to it. I hope the Committee will so vote that our proposals will have the effect of bringing to an end, and at the earliest possible date, this wretched system into which we have fallen.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Before moving the adjournment of the debate, it would be right to ask the honourable gentleman two questions, if he will allow me to do so. First, the honourable gentleman has to find £1,300,000 in April. I think he is making a mistake. That is the whole year's interest. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will tell me if he was referring to something more than the interest.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; to the £600,000 we have to repay the Bank of New Zealand—what I have got to find in cash.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The next point I should like to ask about is this: The Public Works Statement contains proposals for expenditure extending over three years and a half. The honourable gentleman said we should have an opportunity in Committee of considering each item. That will not test the honourable gentleman's proposals over three years and a half; or does he mean that it should test the proposals for this year only?

Major ATKINSON.—I think it will test it for the whole period, because, if the Committee determines that a work is not to go on, that work is struck out, and we have not to provide for it out of the loan. Supposing the Otago Central Railway is not to go on, they strike out the vote for this year, and we should not have to make provision for it in the loan. When the Loan Bill came down that would be struck out.

Debate adjourned.

PROPERTY-TAX BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—I move the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. SMITH.—I beg to move, as an amendment, That in the opinion of this House, in lieu of the proposed property-tax, there should be levied a land-tax, exempting all improvements, and an income-tax with a fair exemption. I would just like to say that I have no intention of taking the House by surprise; but until the half-hour adjournment I was quite unaware that this Bill was coming on to-night. It was not on the Order Paper, and I was not in the House at the time the Premier gave notice of it. During the last election this question of a land- and income-tax was brought up, and no end of candidates—both returned and defeated—pledged themselves to support a land- and income-tax. Two Ministers of the Crown—I read from their speeches—said they would support a land- and income-tax as against a property-tax, and I have now moved this resolution to give members an opportunity to vote on this question. Now, it may be said that this is a wrong time to bring this on—that it is too late in the session; but until the Property-tax Bill was proposed there was no opportunity of moving this resolution. I intended, in moving it, that it should take the place of the property-tax. It will be said, no doubt, that this question should stand over until next session; but, if it does, so far as this Parliament is concerned there will be no further opportunity of bringing this amendment forward, for this reason: We shall now, by passing the Property-tax Bill, affirm the decision of the new Parliament in favour of the property-tax, and, of course, that would remain and be passed from year to year until the end of the present Parliament; and again we shall have the same thing take place—that members pledge themselves to a land- and income-tax, but still vote for the property-tax, simply because they have no opportunity of voting in the direction they wish. Now, the question which this Parliament has to consider is, Which is the best, a property-tax or a land- and income-tax? Of course there are various reasons for and against each. The reason I object to the property-tax is that it is a tax that touches the improvements. Every person who has, by his labour, or by spending money on his land or property, improved that property, has to pay extra taxation. It is a tax on industry. If there is any tax that has driven people out of the colony it is the property-tax; for this reason: that it taxes a thing people pay money for—improvements; and the consequence, quite naturally, is that it drives money out of the country; whereas if there were a land-tax, exempting all improvements, people could borrow money for improvements, and improvements would not be taxed at all. This is one great reason in favour of a land- and income-tax as against a property-tax. Another reason is this: that an absentee landlord, who has perhaps a large landed estate, under the property-tax does not pay the amount of taxation he would pay if there were a land-tax—in this way: that the real absentee landlord improves his property to but a small extent. He very naturally wishes to take all he can out of the property, and therefore does not pay the amount he should, for by making very little improvements he escapes taxation. Not living in the colony, he escapes Customs duties, and if he does make improvements he escapes the property-tax very lightly; whereas if there were a land-tax he would pay equally, whether he improved or not. The improving and unimproving settler would pay alike; whereas they do not pay alike now, because the improving settler pays most and the non-improving settler pays very little indeed. I think for that reason every honourable member must feel that a land-tax, exempting improvements, is far preferable to the property-tax, which really taxes improvements, drives money out of the colony, and allows people who do not improve their estates to escape a great deal of the taxation of the colony which they should pay. That is the reason why I am in favour of a land-tax as against a property-tax. Then it may be said that a land-tax allows to escape a large number of persons who derive large yearly incomes from professions and otherwise. Well, that is the reason why I propose that they should be reached by an income-tax, and the revenue derived from that class will be then much larger than is got from them now by the property-tax. It is supposed generally that the great bulk of the property-tax is paid upon land; but it is not so. The great bulk comes from the tax on buildings, which are perishable things, and improvements, and more especially on goods imported into the colony, and therefore the great bulk of the people have to pay the greatest part of the property-tax. It may be said that the £500 exemption allows a large number of people to escape the tax. That is right as far as property they absolutely own is concerned; but they have to pay property-tax on nearly everything they buy. Sir, this is a very important question, and, without going further into it now, I hope the Premier will allow it to be debated, and enable honourable members to do so by letting the debate be adjourned till to-morrow.

Major ATKINSON.—I hope the honourable gentleman will see his way to withdraw his amendment. It would be utterly impossible to bring a land- and income-tax into operation in less than five or six months: that is to say, we should lose the £300,000 to be levied as property-tax this year. Now, we are all agreed that the property-owners are not to escape this year, and we are also agreed that we must get money to meet our engagements. It is my business to tell the House that if we go in for this change in the incidence of taxation we shall be in great monetary difficulties; and it is my duty to tell the House that at this stage of the session we cannot go into the question of the incidence of taxation. I ask the honourable gentleman, therefore, as a practical man, to withdraw his proposal, and let us deal with it next session. I am prepared to deal with it, and I venture to think there are arguments to be adduced on the other side which will not leave the honourable gentleman a leg to stand on. The matter has been argued out before, and no doubt it will be again; but I would point out that, in the face of the experience that we have had of the fall in the value of land all over the world, the honourable gentleman is proposing to put a special tax on land in this colony, while we have to compete with every other country in the world in which there is no special tax on land. A number of the honourable gentleman's theoretical arguments are quite beside the mark, when we remember that the proposal is that we should put our land, with a special tax on it, into competition with land all over the rest of the world that has no such tax on it. It is quite impossible that we can deal with the question at this stage of the session, or even pretend to approach it; and I therefore ask the House not to attempt to go into it. I think every one must admit that we must obtain revenue, and it is my duty to tell the House that we shall be in most serious difficulties if we cannot collect the property-tax within a short time. It is absolutely impossible to bring down a Bill enacting that there shall be a land- and income-tax and to provide the necessary machinery for the collection of it this session, and I therefore again ask the honourable gentleman not to argue this question this session when we have more important questions to argue. If the honourable gentleman goes on to press the question our only choice will be to either sit very late in the morning to get the Government Bills through or we must remain here till after Christmas. I venture to think that the common-sense of the House will say it is absolutely impossible at this stage of the session, and in the present financial condition of the country, to pretend to change the incidence of taxation now. I do not object to vote on the honourable gentleman's amendment if he likes to press it, but it will be putting a number of members in an unfair position, as many members who would prefer that there should be a land- and income-tax will be obliged to vote against the amendment, knowing it is utterly impracticable.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I am afraid the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government has pointed out a practical difficulty in the way of taking a division on the amendment. I think I am correct in saying that a land-tax could not be levied without another valuation being made—the existing valuation was not made in such a manner that a land-tax with improvement exemptions could be levied on it. Now, the valuation of the colony is not a trifling matter, as the last cost some £15,000. I was rather surprised to see by a statement in the newspapers that the honourable member at the head of the Government has given a sort of half-promise that another valuation should be made next year.

Major ATKINSON.—It has got to be made under the Property Assessment Act.

Sir J. VOGEL.—In my opinion it is a very costly business. I think the honourable member for Woodville might be satisfied with an assurance, if the Premier would give it, that, before a new valuation is made, the House shall have an opportunity of discussing this question; because, if an alteration should be decided upon, it would be very desirable to make it before the new valuation is commenced. If the Premier would give an assurance of that kind I think it would be well not to press the present amendment. Any honourable member moving such an amendment as this must look to the possibility of its being carried, and the carrying of this would simply prevent the property-tax from being levied this year at all, and it would be impossible to levy a land-tax in the present year. I therefore think the question is one that relates rather to the future. Sir, there is a great deal to be said as regards the amount required to be levied. Now, we are coming to a property-tax of a penny in the pound; and the only difference between the proposal of the present Government and the proposal of the late Government is this: that, whereas the present Government propose that the increased revenue to be derived from the property-tax shall come from the whole body of the property-tax-payers, we proposed that only some six thousand of them should pay the increase, the other twenty-one thousand escaping. We proposed that the people who own property of not more than £2,500 should continue to pay thirteen-sixteenths of a penny, and should have the benefit of the £500 exemption; but we proposed that the exemption should be abolished as regards the six thousand taxpayers whose property is over £2,500 in value. As compared with the proposals of the late Government, therefore, the present Government are largely favouring six thousand of the richest persons in the colony, and the burden which the late Ministry proposed to put on them the present Ministry propose to make twenty-one thousand of the poorer taxpayers bear. I can see no reason for this at all. There is no reason why people who pay the tax on large properties should have this £500 exemption; and it is nothing but the power which the class who would have to pay this can exercise which has enabled them to upset the proposals of the late Government and to substitute for them those of the present Government. There is not a shadow of doubt in my mind that it was that, and that alone, which upset the last Government. We were told over and over again that it was not the tariff or anything else which the Government proposed that was really objectionable, but that if we gave way on our property-tax proposals all the rest could be carried. But we would not do so, and the result was seen in the late elections, and is seen in the legislation during the present session, for no honourable gentleman on either side of the House can examine the policy which we are commencing this session without seeing very clearly that it is the aim of the Government to take away power from the people generally and place it in the hands of what are known as the privileged classes. Whether we look at their policy as regards elections, the attempt they are making to upset the liberal electoral laws now in force, their land policy, their Native-land policy—whether you look at it in almost any of the Bills brought down, it is evident that they are prepared to undo the work of many years past in favour of a small and privileged class. And this is an example of it to-night on this question of the property-tax, which we find is so settled as to realise the hopes of those who said to the last Government that if they gave way on that subject all their other proposals could be carried. This Government gives way on that question, and the twenty-one thousand are the sufferers by that yielding, and the six thousand richer ones are the gainers. I now come to another point. It is a question, to my mind, whether it would not be desirable to fix the amount of the tax definitely for a number of years rather than make a change each year, or at least let it be liable to change each year. There is always an uncertainty hanging over people, whether they are amenable to the tax or not, as to what its amount will be when next levied, and that uncertainty has an especially important effect with regard to the taxation upon mortgages. It is notorious that mortgagees, in order to protect themselves from the tax and against a possible increase of it, add  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. to the rate of interest charged, and that  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. represents 1½d. in the pound without the £500 exemption. This has gone on during the last few years, and it will continue to go on, and the unfortunate persons borrowing money have to pay a sort of insurance fund of 1½d., without any allowance for exemption, in order to protect the mortgagees from payment and possible increases of the tax. I could never understand—although I suppose there must be some reason for it—why there is a prohibition in the Act against mortgagees and mortgagers contracting between themselves as to who should pay the tax. In my opinion, as far as the property-tax relates to money lent on mortgage at all events, it would be well to fix the amount of the tax definitely for a period of years, or fix it at a rate which should not be altered except on from three to five years' notice of the proposed alteration. By this means the mortgagers would be protected from the excessive payments they have to make now. The question of an income-tax to supplement a property-tax is one which is well worthy of consideration. There is a class of persons who do escape taxation under the present system—persons who have large salaries which they do not invest in property, and who merely pay taxation through the Customs. That is a question which, in my opinion, is well worthy of consideration. I am bound to say, however, that I see there would be great difficulty in levying a general income-tax in substitution for the present tax upon personality, because it is difficult to know what should be considered income and what money that ought to be placed to the credit of capital. There are a number of important points on which I should have liked to touch, but it is too late in the session now to do so; but I think it would be well to simply ask the attention of the Government to the whole subject. There is no doubt that the property-tax affects not only the operations of landowners, but operations of all kinds; and I must point out, what I have mentioned earlier in the session, that we are now taking a higher rate of property-tax without increasing at the same time the tariff; yet the question will arise next session, when proposals are made to fortify the tariff, Should there not be simultaneously made an increase in the amount of the property-tax? In fact, I doubt if the Government will be bold enough to propose an increase in the Customs tariff without at the same time increasing the direct taxation. I think it would have been much fairer if the two increases had been made simultaneously, and that the large increase now being made in the property-tax—an increase of nearly 25 per cent.—should not have been made without an increase in the indirect taxation, which has fallen so much on account of causes which should lead to an increase, causes which are patent to honourable members, such as the improved habits of the people, and the fall in the price of goods amenable to ad valorem duties. That, I think, is the cardinal mistake the Government is making in not having increased the Customs duties simultaneously with the increase in the direct taxation; for if they touch the tariff next year, and, in consequence, increase the Customs duties, they will certainly be asked to make a further increase in the property-tax. The two systems of taxation go side by side; and if it be the case, as we have to consider is the case on account of the action adopted by the Government, that the direct taxation is insufficient as compared with the indirect taxation, it follows as a logical sequence that next year, if there is an increase in the indirect taxation, there must be further increase in the direct taxation. I am of opinion that a penny property-tax represents a very large tax upon income, even if we suppose that the whole of the property exposed to taxation was of a nature to return income. If you capitalise at 6 per cent., say, £100, to put the thing in its simplest form, that represents £6 per annum income, and 1d. in the pound represents 8s. 4d. Therefore, in order to get, on a 6-per-cent. basis, an equivalent in income-tax you would have to make the tax something between 1s. 4d. and 1s. 5d. in the pound on income; and that presupposes that the whole of the capital is employed and yielding taxable revenue; but, as a matter of fact, everything is taken, a man's furniture, pictures, books, piano, almost his clothes, so that it cannot be supposed that the whole of the property yields income or revenue. I think it will be seen from these figures that the direct taxation, as now proposed, is larger in proportion to the indirect taxation than it ought to be.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I hold strong views on the matter brought forward by the honourable member for Woodville. But I must certainly say, before I proceed any further, that I cannot understand the logic of the last speaker, the honourable member for Christchurch North. It seems to me that his argument only goes in this direction: that we are overtaxing those who can afford to pay taxes, and that the Customs tariff ought to be raised to equalise the property-tax. Well, Sir, while I admit that the tariff should be adjusted, I want to see it adjusted in the direction of giving work to the people. That is my view. Besides, independently of that, I think that wealthy people should pay more, or should pay equivalent to those who have less wealth. I think that is a fair way to put it. I mean to say this: I believe in graduated taxation, whether it is a land-tax or a property-tax. So far as a land-tax is concerned, the question was put to me at last election, and I said, as honourable members must know, that a land-tax at the present time is an impracticable thing to get as this Parliament is constituted at present.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why?

Mr. TAYLOR.—When it comes to voting directly, you will see why. My contention is this: that we should take the best next thing to a land-tax—get a graduated tax, so as to make those gentlemen who own two hundred thousand or three hundred thousand pounds' worth of property pay in proportion to their means. I do not see why a man of wealth, such as those persons I refer to, should only have to pay 3d. or 1d. in the pound, the same as a man who toils all his days to keep himself out of the workhouse.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No workhouses here.

Mr. TAYLOR.—If you have not got them now, you soon will have them. There are some in some parts of the colony. I trust that honourable members who bring forward measures of this kind will deal with that question from a practical point of view. I admit that the honourable member for Woodville is perfectly right in his views on this matter; but, looking at the constitution of the last Parliament and of this Parliament, he must know that this question is just now entirely outside the practical business of this Parliament, and that we have no opportunity of dealing with this question at the present time. So far as a land-tax is concerned, unless it is graduated, what does it mean? Why, if the property were valued fairly now, if the land were fairly valued, there is a land-tax at present derived from the land. But if you graduated the tax you would get a larger amount of income from those who can afford to pay it. I am not going to be a party in this House to advocate a scheme for what I might call the purpose of gaining popularity. If I thought I could get a land-tax I should be in favour of it, but I know that is impossible just now, and what I want is that the direct taxation, whether it be in the shape of a land-tax or a property-tax, should be graduated.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What is that?

Mr. TAYLOR.—There is a dictionary in the library. It shows very little for the intelligence of those who sit here that they should ask me the meaning of a word of that character. I never like to be rude,—that is well known; but

Sir J. Vogel

I must protest against ignorance of that character. I suppose we shall have the honourable member for Dunedin Central or the honourable member for Dunedin South getting up and objecting to either a land-tax, or a property-tax, or any other tax of a progressive character. I have heard the honourable gentleman say that we should pay £2,500 per annum to one man, when that sum would keep three hundred of his constituents if properly distributed. Fancy an honourable gentleman representing a democratic constituency holding these views and objecting to my views!

Mr. FISH.—Does the honourable gentleman refer to the honourable member for Dunedin South or to the honourable member for Dunedin Central?

Mr. TAYLOR.—The honourable member for Dunedin South. I have no doubt the honourable gentleman is fully primed to deal with this question. I simply say that I am in favour of a graduated tax, either in the shape of a property-tax or a land-tax, and I am in favour of taxing those who can afford to pay taxation. I am astonished at some honourable gentlemen. I must simply put it down to their want of, well—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Ignorance.

Mr. TAYLOR.—Just so. I only want to say this: that I trust the Government will carry their Bill without any further trouble. I say this is a waste of time to-night. You cannot deal with the land-tax. You know the difficulty, and if you like to take the penny at once we can settle it. You may preach and you may pray, and I do not object to that; but when you are before the people it is your duty to deal honestly with them. That is the way I do, and that is the reason I am here. I am not afraid of any views I express here. The people who sent me here did not send me to be mealy-mouthed. They did not send me here to advocate anything which I believed to be contrary to their interests; but I am sorry to say there are some honourable members here, returned upon that ticket, who do not exactly stick to their colours.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Name.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I am not going to be personal at all. I do hope that, instead of sitting here till four or five o'clock in the morning, we shall get on with the business, and not deal with matters entirely out of the range of practical politics.

Mr. BARRON.—I do not propose to go into this question of the incidence of taxation, but I simply desire to say that the honourable member for Woodville proposes to do a right thing at the wrong time. I hold the same opinions that the honourable member has embodied in this amendment which he now asks the House to consent to; but we cannot get quit of the knowledge of the fact that a large proportion of the year for which the Treasurer asks us to consent to this tax has gone by, and that the machinery which is necessary in order to give effect to the proposal of the honourable member for Woodville would have to be created, and cannot be created at once. If the honourable member will take the assurance which I heard the Premier just now give him, that we should have an opportunity of considering this matter next session—that he will bring it forward early and take the opinion of the House upon it—I venture to say he will find the Premier not exactly right in what he says, that the balance of opinion is in favour of the property-tax and against the proposal of the honourable member for Woodville. I hope the honourable gentleman, in the meantime, will withdraw his amendment, for it simply comes to this: that he will not be able to carry into the lobby with him those who sympathize with the proposal on its merits, apart from the considerations which must now weigh with us. The honourable member for Christchurch North represents the question of the property-tax as being the one question which accounts for the defeat of the past Administration. Well, Sir, unfortunately the catalogue of the shortcomings of the previous Government is not of that simple, concise, and comprehensive kind which the honourable member would indicate; nor does it include that item. Sir, if I were to read out a little list of the things which formed the indictment against the past Administration, I am sure I should read a number of things which every member of this House would recognise as each of them serious in itself, besides forming a part of those accumulated shortcomings which caused the country to adopt the decision of the past House in connection with the late Administration. But let the past rest. I only got up to say that I hope the honourable member for Woodville will not place in a false position those who are entirely in accord with him, but that he will withdraw his amendment, and take an opportunity next session of allowing the subject to be discussed and voted upon on its merits.

Mr. FISH.—I think I may justly say that no member of this House is more sincerely in favour of a land- and income-tax than I am myself, and I can corroborate the opinions given utterance to by the honourable member for Woodville in almost every particular. I also strongly believe the statement of the honourable member for Christchurch North with regard to the legislation this session, and the indications of the policy of the Government next session, as being in the direction that the honourable member for Christchurch North has mentioned. I am extremely sorry to think that it is so, and that the Government have a majority, apparently, to give effect to that policy. But, with regard to the question which the honourable member for Woodville has raised on the present occasion, I agree with the last speaker that the time for bringing it forward is inopportune. The objections made by the Premier to having it considered at this particular time are so thoroughly unanswerable that I think the honourable member himself must see that it is in the interests of the cause he advocates—and advocates very ably—that he should not press the matter any further. I do not propose myself to debate the question now, because that is quite unnecessary, and would only end in nothing. I trust the honourable gentleman, without giving up in any shape or form the principles he holds, will in the meantime withdraw his amendment, as the time taken up in its discussion now is entirely wasted.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—Sir, last election I made a point of ascertaining the views of the constituents on this subject—not only of those in my district, but of the constituents generally; and I found them unanimously desiring a repeal of the present property-tax and the substitution of a land- and income-tax. The property-tax is felt to be a very great hardship, especially to farmers and to persons who live in the country. There is no doubt that this property-tax is, as some honourable gentlemen said to-night, a tax upon industry; and I would just illustrate how that is so. I myself some years ago cut up some land into small farms, and have in my mind's eye now two men who took up land. One took up a particular section, and the other the adjoining section. There was no difference in the quality of these sections whatever. The one man paid his deposit and went away; I do not know that he has ever been near the land since. The other man paid his deposit, went on the land and improved it, cleared it, drained it, built a house upon it, and made it a valuable property—made it a property worth fully £500, so that he is now paying property-tax. On account of his labours on that land year after year he is now required to pay property-tax; whereas his neighbour, who has never touched his land at all, has had its value greatly increased through the perseverance and energy of his adjoining neighbour. That being so, I say that the property-tax is clearly a tax upon industry; and any tax upon industry is unfair, and should be avoided. We should give every inducement to people to settle on the land, and, instead of taxing them for the improvement of their land, we should try to encourage them to improve it. That is my view as to the property-tax. Then, what about the land-tax? I say a land-tax is a fair tax, and a tax we should, if possible, have. And I say, further, that if we have a land-tax the taxes that are derived from that land should be spent in the localities where it is raised, in making roads and bridges. I think if the land is to be taxed the revenue from it should certainly be spent in the immediate locality where it is derived. That is my view with regard to making use of the money derived from the land. Then we come to the income-tax, and I say that, at the present time, the persons who ought to bear taxation are not bearing it. There is no doubt that the proper form of taxation is that which bears equally upon all; and I say that it is most unfair to tax any particular class and to allow another to go free. It should fall on the shoulders of every man equally; and at the present time it is not doing so. If we had an income-tax, whom should we catch? Why, I do not care what town you go into in any part of the colony, there you will meet bank managers, managers of insurance companies, Judges, highly-paid officials, Ministers of the Crown—

these and other persons who have enormous incomes—

An Hon. MEMBER.—Solicitors.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—No; they have but very little; they are pretty well cut down by legislation: but you may have solicitors too. These men very often lease houses, and do not pay more through the Customs than an ordinary labourer who has a family to maintain—

Major ATKINSON.—What do they do with their money?

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—Some of them gamble it. But we need not go into particulars: there are other ways of spending it which are not beneficial to the colony. These men you meet every day: they are to be found in almost every half-dozen people that you meet; they have large incomes, and pay nothing to taxation; they have not a halfpenny-worth of property in the place—they lease a house, and that is all the property they have. I say that these persons should be taxed. Then, again, we have persons residing in foreign parts. I myself know of persons residing in London who are drawing immense incomes out of the colony; some are drawing as much as £8,000 a year; and are they paying taxation? Not a bit. There they are at Home enjoying themselves, and drawing the lifeblood out of this country. This kind of thing has gone on for ages past, and will go on for generations in the future unless we get a Government in power that will alter the incidence of taxation. I was in hope when I read the Financial Statement that I should see something about the repeal of the property-tax and the substitution of a land- and income-tax; but no, there was not a word of this kind, but only a proposal to put more on the present property-tax. If the amount of revenue is falling off, it is a very easy matter to raise it by doing something to the property-tax. Then, again, I say, if we do not do away with the property-tax, why have this distinction of the £500 exemption? Why not do away with it? I should have to pay the extra tax myself; but I should not mind that. I am sure that this £500 exemption is a most iniquitous thing, and if that were done away with we should raise another £40,000 a year: and in these times, when retrenchment is so necessary, and our income so small, I think we ought to look at these things, and, if we do not have a land- and income-tax, we should do away with the exemption under the property-tax. But there is not a word about that in the Financial Statement either. I feel, with the honourable gentleman who has moved the amendment, that we should be doing right to press it; and that it is a proper thing to have a land- and income-tax, and do away with the property-tax. The honourable member for Christchurch North stated that he saw some difficulty about fixing the income of individuals. I do not see any difficulty about this at all. Each individual has to make a declaration as to his income, and you will find that most persons put their incomes at a trifle more than they are, instead of putting them at less; so that, if a few should happen to put their incomes at a little less than they are, this would be made up by the increase which others would place on their incomes. No man cares to have his income thought to be less than it really is; there are few men who like to make themselves appear to the world worse off than they really are. Therefore I do not think there would be any difficulty in arriving at a fair estimate of what the incomes of the taxpayers would be. Under the present property-tax I have known the most unfair things to be done. Many methods are taken of evading the payment of the tax. If a person finds he is taxed too heavily he puts debts against himself to the amount of £2,000 or £3,000, and then the amount upon which taxation is levied is reduced. I shall support the honourable member in this, and I hope he will call for a division, so that we may show through the pages of Hansard who those honourable members are who will support a land-tax and income-tax as against a property-tax. Beyond this I will not say more, because I believe the Premier is correct in what he stated. I believe that, if we were so disposed, it would be impossible to alter the incidence of taxation this session; but I hope we shall see our way to alter it during next session of Parliament.

Mr. TANNER.—I hope that this amendment will be withdrawn. I cannot agree with the last speaker that it would be at all a test of those in favour of a land- and income-tax. If this matter were to go to a division it would not indicate the views of honourable members on the subject. Every one agrees that the time is inopportune for going into this question; there is a great deal of Government business before us, and we must get on with it. I will not say a word about the subject itself. Although I hold strong opinions in favour of a land- and income-tax, I wish it clearly to be understood that if this goes to a vote I shall vote against the amendment. As I have said, I am strongly in favour of a land- and income-tax, and I ask the Premier, who has suggested that this important question should be left to stand over to next session, whether the Government will bring in a Bill to introduce a land- and income-tax in substitution for the property-tax, so as to bring the question before us, or whether the Government prefers that a private individual should do so. There is no doubt that a policy of such importance should be brought forward by the Government, and I ask the Premier whether he will bring it forward in such a shape that it can be discussed. This is a new House with a number of new members in it: let us, then, have the question brought before us again of a land- and income-tax as against a property-tax, and no doubt the question will be settled for years.

Major STEWARD.—As a member who has been working on the same side of the House with the honourable member for Woodville for years, I would ask him not to press this amendment. Although I entirely agree with him as to the advisability of a land- and income-tax as against a property-tax, for reasons which I should be prepared to argue at length on the fitting occasion, I submit that it would place us in a false position to ask us to go into the lobby with him on his amendment. I tell him plainly that it is impossible, if we were to carry his resolution, that we should give effect to it this session; and if we carried it against the proposal for a property-tax this year we should place the colony in a very difficult position, which we have no right to do. I ask him to look at it from that point of view, and not to put us in the position of having to vote against him on a proposition with which, on its merits, we agree. I also agree with him that the progressive principle should be included in the proposition; but I submit that it has been shown conclusively that the present is an unfitting occasion on which to bring forward such a proposal. He will not succeed in ascertaining the relative strength of the two parties,—that in favour of a property-tax and that in favour of a land-tax and income-tax,—because many who support the latter will find themselves compelled to vote against it.

Captain RUSSELL.—I shall best be consulting the wishes of honourable members by not discussing the various points which have been raised, but by saying the few words I have to say on this property-tax. I would merely say, in regard to some of the arguments brought forward, that I believe those whom it is desired to touch under a land- and income-tax are the very persons who would escape taxation under the proposition of the honourable member for Woodville. I speak with bitter experience, from having had to pay both taxes, and I say that any improving settler is exempted under a land-tax, and has to pay pretty heavily under a property-tax. I would therefore recommend the House to leave the property-tax as it is. Now, there are various reasons which I think are specially worthy of attention in discussing this matter. The deserving man who goes up-country is not so exempt from taxation as the man who stays in the town and puts his money into bricks and mortar. But I will not go into that question. I feel very strongly that we are doing wrong in not reducing the exemption. I think the Government is wrong in that respect; but I do not suppose I shall carry the House with me. Unfortunately, Colonial Treasurers are anxious to extort every pound out of our pockets in the shape of taxation; and, so as not to make that taxation not so hateful as it would otherwise be, they resort to indirect means, and through the Customs they impose a taxation which would not be tolerated if it were imposed directly. An eminent financier says the best system of finance is to spend as little as possible, and that that form of taxation is best which is smallest in proportion. That is the true policy; but we shall never arrive at that until we impose more direct taxation than we do at present. My vote will always be given in the direction of reducing the Customs tariff and increasing direct taxation. I say that because I believe it would be in the interest of the country generally that taxation should be direct, and I say it as a taxpayer myself, because I believe by that means the taxation would be reduced. I am extremely anxious that the exemption should be reduced. Logically, it ought to be done away with altogether; but one cannot expect to get what is logical, and therefore I would reduce the exemption to £240, under which system, with 1d. property-tax, every man with that amount of property would have to pay his £1 yearly; and the result would be a great benefit to the country. I disagree with the honourable member for Christchurch North, who states that he considers the great advantage of the property-tax proposals of the late Government over those of the present Government was that the late Government proposed to reduce the number of people who paid the tax from twenty-one thousand to six thousand. That would be a great mistake. The wider you distribute the area of taxation the better for the country, and the more you approach the principle that the best system of finance is to spend as little as possible, and that the taxation should be small in proportion. Unless you go direct to a man's pocket and make him pay his tax in coin you will not get him to really understand that he is being taxed. Every one who is at all acquainted with local government knows that the man who has to pay his half-crown rate immediately makes a great outcry. If that man goes into a town he buys himself a new suit of clothes, and, possibly, a pound or two of tobacco; but he does not realise that he is paying ten times as much taxation as he does in having to pay his half-crown rate. He will go home well contented with his suit of colonial tweed or pound of tobacco, and will not believe that he has paid far more to the revenue than he paid in his rates. My object would be to make taxation as straightforward as possible. I believe it would even be a good thing to introduce into this Bill a clause prohibiting a man paying his taxes by cheque. We know that even the most prudent man will "stick up" an account at his tradesman's without thinking of what he is doing, but if you ask him to spend £1 he will at once button up his pocket and walk off. That is what we should endeavour to teach the people of the country in respect to taxation. I believe we should impose direct taxation, not simply for the purpose of reducing taxation, but for the purpose of bringing it home to the minds of the people that they are paying taxes. I have no doubt it will be said, "You are proposing this in the interest of the rich; you are punishing the poor, inasmuch as you want to abolish the exemption." No such thing. I am exceedingly desirous to relieve the poor, and I will show how that can be done under this very proposal which I am suggesting. It could be so arranged that the poorest would be exempted, while those who have realised property to a certain value would have to pay the tax. Men's labour should be exempt before you exempt any realised property; and when I speak of "labour" I do not care whether it is the labour of a man's head or of his hands. It must also be borne in mind that the greater proportion of the property-tax that would be levied on the sum I propose should no longer be exempted would be paid by those who already pay property-tax; and for those who do not pay it but would have to do so I would remit Customs duties to an amount equivalent to the property-tax imposed. By that means you would reduce the taxation on the necessities of life to the very poorest classes, while those who ought to pay property-tax and who have hitherto been exempted would get an exemption to a greater extent than they do now, though in an indirect manner. As for the richer classes, they would not object to an increased property-tax, because they would know that the number of persons who paid the tax would be very much increased, and there would be a more careful watch kept over the Colonial Treasurer, so that the tax would not be imposed to so large an extent as it would be if you reduced the number of persons who had to pay it. Our object should be to make every taxpayer follow the actions of the Treasurer closely. Every one who holds a seat in this House knows that throughout the country there is a feeling that taxation should be increased. At every election you will see that the people are crying out for increased taxation; but the moment you make people realise the fact that they have to pay the tax, by having to put their hands in their pockets and pay up their pound, you will introduce a large number of people who will at once be deeply interested in a system of economy. However, there is no use in attempting to do anything this session, but next year I shall certainly endeavour to get the exemption reduced to £240.

Mr. GRIMMOND.—We could very well continue this discussion till five o'clock in the morning, advancing arguments on one side or the other. The honourable member for Woodville, I believe, has determined not to withdraw his amendment. Whatever may be said for or against it, I am not disposed to vote against it. We have wasted too much time already, and, as it is evident that a large majority will vote against the amendment, I hope we shall soon come to a decision on the question.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I should not rise at this hour of the morning were it not for the fact that I understand the honourable member for Woodville intends to take a vote on the question. This is a question in regard to which constituents expect their representatives to be consistent, and I wish to state my reason for the vote I shall give. My opinion is that, at this late stage of the session, it is an impossibility to accept the amendment of the honourable member for Woodville, even by those who are in favour of a land- and income-tax. The matter is so serious, as far as I know and can understand the subject, that I do not think it would be advisable for the country to do what the honourable member for Woodville wants; for this reason: that we have not for the last eight or nine months collected any property-tax, and the Treasurer looks to the property-tax to assist in making up the deficiency in the revenue. Now, to do what the honourable member for Woodville wants would require the whole machinery for the land-tax valuation, also the whole machinery for the assessment of incomes throughout the colony, and to get that machinery into motion and the assessments made eight or nine months would be required. So that we shall be here again in session before the Colonial Treasurer could get any revenue out of a land- and income-tax in any shape or form, and before we could get that machinery into motion. I am satisfied the Treasurer could not get any revenue from it. I think the proper course would be for those who are in favour of a land- and income-tax to move a resolution in the House in the early part of next session. I do not suppose any private member could introduce a Bill for this purpose without the consent of the Government, and I think the proper course would be to move a resolution, and then the question could be discussed in the House. If the Government were prepared to carry it out they could do so. I am in favour of a land- and income-tax, and when the proper time comes I shall be willing to support it. But it is not possible to do it at the present time. I have had some experience as a property-tax assessor and a land-tax valuer, and from that I know pretty well the circumstances of the people assessed, and I have no hesitation in saying that the property-tax is not as fair as a land-tax; but a land-tax without an income-tax would allow a large number of persons to escape. I say, from my experience, that they would not put down their incomes as low as they are. My experience in valuing was this: that some of those least able to bear taxation put the valuation of their property at a greater amount than it was really worth. I found that in some cases, where people wished to keep up their credit, they put down their property at a higher value than it was worth. I have known a man pay taxes on £2,000, and six months afterwards he was bankrupt; and I know of a man in the same town and street who was in a good position, and did not care to keep up his credit in that way, and, although his property was more valuable than the one referred to, he put it down at a lower amount. My experience was this: that those who were not so well able to afford it paid more taxes than those who were in a position to pay more. However, it is a subject on which a great deal could be said on both sides, as to whether an income-tax and land-tax or the property-tax is the best. My object in rising was to say that I intend to vote against the amendment, for the reason that I do not think it possible to have it carried before the next session of Parliament. If the honourable member for Woodville then moves a resolution in the House I shall be prepared to support it.

Mr. COWAN.—I wish to state that I also am in favour of a land- and income-tax; and I regret that the honourable member for Woodville is not willing to withdraw his amendment, and I regret this more particularly because, if he forces it to a division, I shall be compelled to vote against it. I think the time inopportune, and the necessities of the country are such that such a resolution could not now be given effect to. The altering of the incidence of taxation would occupy a good many months, and it is impossible that effect could be given to this amendment. Although I am in favour of the principle embodied in the Bill, still I shall feel compelled to vote against it.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I shall go into the lobby with the honourable member for Woodville. I consider the alteration of the incidence of taxation one of the most important subjects that this House could take in hand; and, although honourable members say it cannot be done, I maintain that we have done nothing whatever in the legislation of the present session. We have passed two or three Bills, but Bills which really do not benefit the country. I believe I am right in saying that the land-tax has been a source of great progress and wealth in Victoria. Sixteen or eighteen years ago the Berry Government brought in a Bill which the Melbourne Argus stated would retard the progress and settlement of the country; and yet Victoria is a most prosperous colony! We find there hundreds of thousands of acres occupied by a large and industrious population; and the same result would follow if we introduced a land-tax into this colony. I consider the property-tax a tax on industry and energy, and one calculated to keep down the people of the colony. I ask, how are those large and wealthy landholders in the colony who have benefited to a large extent by the prosecution of the policy of public works and immigration—how are they to be got at, in order that they may contribute their just proportion to the revenue of the country? I contend that these are the people who should contribute to the taxation of the country more largely than they do. I say, put the saddle on the right horse. If there were anything wanted to convince me of the justice of a land-tax, I should be convinced by a small extract from the Evening News of Hawke's Bay, which I will read:—

"The writer of those terse and ably-written 'Notes' in the Freeman's Journal has the following in the last issue of that well-conducted paper:—"I have read with much interest the following telegram about the sale of a small portion of Mr. Tanner's property at Riverslea, in Hawke's Bay: "Messrs. Hoadley and Co. to-day continued the sale of the Riverslea Estate, Hastings. Out of 1,000 acres 300 were sold, realising £45,000. Time did not permit any more to be offered, and the balance was reserved for private sale. The following is a summary of the sale yesterday: 278 small allotments realised £20,000; seven lots of five acres each, from £80 to £90 per acre. The total area sold was 199 acres, realising £23,144, or an average of £212 per acre." A very satisfactory sale indeed—for the owner. Then I turn up "Doomsday Book" and see what Mr. Tanner's property was valued at, and come upon this line: "Thomas Tanner, sheepfarmer, Riverslea, Hawke's Bay, 5,776 acres, £105,110, Hastings." And then I marvel at the property-tax valuations; land assessed at £18 an acre fetching at auction £212, and understanding why some people love and many hate the property-tax. Twenty years ago all Heretaunga was let to Mr. Tanner for £600 a year. I had better, perhaps, not say what I was going to say, and let Judge Richmond state what followed. After Messrs. Ormond, Braithwaite, and Purvis Russell had joined Mr. Tanner, "the rent was raised to £700 a year, and finally, on an extension of the area included in the lease, to £900 a year. After the block had passed the Court a legal lease was granted, bearing date 24th April, 1867, for the term of twenty-one years, at the yearly rent of £1,250 for the first ten years and £1,750 for the remainder of the term." This lease, it will be observed, would not be yet up, and had not the shares been purchased Mr. Tanner's sale could not have taken place. He is a dull man who cannot draw his own conclusions. I would state them in precise and fitting terms were I master well graduated enough in the English language to do so—that is, provided our tongue gave scope enough for such a purpose. Our readers will at once see how the purchasers of this Riverslea property have hampered themselves. They will have to pay a property-tax now very much greater than that which the previous owner, Mr. Tanner, was subject to, and yet surely the mere cutting-up of the land cannot have enhanced its intrinsic value to so great an extent. This Riverslea Estate, too, is part of the celebrated Heretaunga Block, that block which has been the fruitful cause of so much litigation. Referring to this block, the Press says: 'Suffice it to say that it kept the best society of Hawke's Bay in a condition bordering on civil war for years, filled the pockets of a generation of lawyers, and afforded the materials for some of the most terrific declamation ever heard in the New Zealand Parliament or on the New Zealand stump. Is it not recorded in Hansard—which never lies—that, with reference to Heretaunga, a young and fervid politician, stung by an allusion to his poverty by one of the purchasers, solemnly declared that he "would rather own a small estate honestly acquired and securely vested than be the trembling lord of a principality the title-deeds of which were signed in blood and rum, and sealed with as many crimes as they had signatures"!' "

Now, Sir, that shows the absurdity of the property-tax as compared with the land-tax. Had a conscientious person been there to value the land he would have assessed it at £180 an acre. Here it brought an average of £212. That is one very strong argument that the land-tax is by far the fairest and most equitable tax we can have. Then we come to the income-tax. That tax is also a fair tax. It is well known that there are many professional men in the colony making large incomes and paying nothing. I quite agree with the honourable member for Hawke's Bay that the property-tax exemption should be reduced to £240, if that tax is continued. I shall vote with the honourable member for Woodville if he calls for a division.

Mr. KELLY.—During the late elections this was one of the great questions before my constituency, and I was pledged to support a land- and income-tax. But I think the present time is not the proper time to bring the question forward, and I therefore intend to vote against the amendment, if the honourable member for Woodville does not withdraw it. The argument adduced by my honourable friend on the right is in favour of an income-tax as against a land-tax, because the figures he quoted show that the land of the honourable member for Wai-pawa was valued at £18 an acre, and it brought £212 at auction.

Mr. TANNER.—There is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. KELLY.—I am sorry to hear it. I consider that if the Premier were to state that he was prepared to go on with the discussion of this question, and adjourn for a week and let honourable members come back, he would get many honourable members to support an adjournment. I do not think that these motions should come on at such a late period of the session, and I think those who are opposed to the Government should give what assistance they can to get the business through. Every one wants to get away before Christmas, if he possibly can. I do not think the honourable member for Inangahua would like to come back after Christmas. Although I am pledged to vote for a land- and income-tax, this is not the time to bring the question on, and I shall therefore vote against the amendment of the honourable member for Woodville.

Mr. GRIMMOND.—The Premier has frightened honourable members by saying that he wants a million and a half in April next; and a good many who are in favour of a land- and income-tax are afraid to vote for the amendment now because it would jeopardize the finances of the colony. Every time the House has met it has been urged that it is not convenient to have a land- and income-tax; but in the course of next year we shall have the valuation for the property-tax on. The House should say next year whether it is in favour of the property-tax or a land- and income-tax. I am in favour of the latter, and will do all I can to bring it in force in this colony; because the property-tax has clogged the wheels of industry and blocked enterprise. I am sure that the returns obtained by the honourable member for Timaru will show that the great bulk of the landed property is held by outsiders, and a land- and income-tax will reach those people. I intend to support the amendment of the honourable member for Woodville.

Mr. HOBBS.—As the honourable member for Woodville declines to withdraw this amendment, I want to say just one or two words upon it. I want to know where has been the sincerity of the honourable member for the Hutt during the last three years. Where is the sincerity of the late Colonial Treasurer, who got himself into office on the understanding that he would bring in a land-tax and an income-tax? Certain honourable members voted to turn out the previous Government because they would not bring in a land-tax and an income-tax, and the late Colonial Treasurer and his colleagues were put in because they promised to do so. Then, after eighteen months, he told us that the people had got accustomed to a property-tax, that there was a great deal in being accustomed to a tax, and that therefore they would not disturb it. I can understand, and very clearly, what this little "move" is: it is only a diversion to take up the whole evening, as has been done before. I want to enter my protest against this proceeding. The honourable member knows very well that he will hardly get another member to go with him into the lobby; and he should not waste the time of the House in this way.

The House divided on the question, "That the words 'the Bill be now read a second time' stand part of the question."

Amendment negatived.

On the question, That the Bill be now read a second time,

Mr. TURNBULL said,—No one feels more the position of the Treasurer in this House than I do on the present occasion; I speak with all sincerity. I know the position the colony is in is most critical, and I know the honourable gentleman would never have uttered the statement he did to-night in that respect unless he was well convinced of its truth; and I speak with very great regret on this occasion. My object in speaking is this: I have always held and declared strongly that taxation upon property should be of a progressive nature, and, although the Premier has told me that that question should not be raised on this Bill, but only on the Assessment Act, I should be sorry to see this Bill pass without giving expression to my views on that point. We are now going to inflict very great injustice on property-owners generally; because I hold that we should not have dealt with this question at all unless at the same time we deal with the Customs duties. By doing that we could have assisted property to a certain extent, because when dealing with the question of taxation it is right to treat all classes fairly, and not to unduly favour one class. In dealing thus with the property-tax a very great injustice is inflicted on a large portion of the community. I hold, as I say, that this taxation should be of a progressive nature. When we consider the large indebtedness of the colony, and the very large proportionate sums that have been expended in conferring great benefits upon property, I say it is only right that property should bear the heaviest portion of the burden of taxation in the colony. From official papers put before honourable members last session it appears that 1,800 people hold rather more than one-third of the taxable property in this colony. The proposal of the late Colonial Treasurer was that the increase in the property-tax should fall on 5,000 of the richest property-owners in the colony, persons owning £8,000 and upwards each. If the exemptions were increased the payers of the property-tax would be still fewer, and the property-tax would become virtually a land-tax on a few large holders. If we look at papers placed with one of the present Treasurer's Financial Statements we shall find this: that about 1,800 people hold property to the amount of £28,000,000, while the bulk of the taxation falls on 32,000 people who own an equal amount. I say that this taxation being laid on the smaller people is most unjust. It is not merely a question of the value of the property held by this small number of people, but the injury which these people are doing by holding the large amount of land which is not put to any satisfactory use. I pointed out the other night that there were ninety people who hold estates which aggregate 2,250,000 acres, and the consequence is that all the wealth which should come from that soil or property to enrich us is lost to the State, because the land is not only owned by a few, some of whom live out of the country, but it is also locked up against the population which might live on it. That land might carry a hundred thousand people. These are the things which we should consider in connection with the question of taxation and the large burdens that we are going to lay on the people. It should be one of the questions that should be taken into consideration by this House. No doubt it may be said that the honourable member for Woodville would have an opportunity of bringing forward this question next session, when it might be fairly considered; but it is very difficult for any member of this House, however skilful he may be in the use of the rules of this House, to get a question of that sort before the House, so that it may be fairly considered. Even supposing that he gets it on the Order Paper, and it is called on, the question is probably talked out before a decision can be come to on it.

Mr. TURNBULL.—If you do it ever so early in the session you find your motion is talked out, and that there is no opportunity of getting any decision at all in the matter. At the present time there are 1,182 people who own from 1,000 to 5,000 acres of land; there are 171 people who hold from 5,000 to 10,000 acres each; there are 141 people who own from 10,000 to 20,000 acres each; there are 273 who own from 20,000 to 50,000 acres each; twenty who own from 50,000 to 100,000 acres each; and seven who own over 100,000 acres each. This land, proportionately, yields very little in the shape of taxation; and we might well consider on this occasion whether we are doing justly in bringing down a tax which, though it taxes each person equally so far as the rate of the tax is concerned, does not tax them equally so far as regards their ability to pay, and the benefit that they derive from the money expended in the colony. The late Premier stated in his place in this House, and the late Colonial Treasurer stated in his place here to-night, that what really caused the downfall of the late Ministry was simply this: that they proposed to make these people pay progressive taxation. And of that there cannot be the slightest doubt. The late Treasurer said just now—and he was not contradicted—that, if he would have given up his property-tax proposals, anything else the late Government might have proposed in the way of revising the taxation could have been carried—that everything else would have been carried if they only would have abandoned this particular proposal.

Mr. FISHER.—No.

Mr. TURNBULL.—Well, that was stated by the late Colonial Treasurer to-night; and if the honourable gentleman who says "No" had been in the House at the time he would have heard the statement, and then would have been his time to have said that it was not correct. I heard that statement, and I believe it was the fact. At any rate, we have no right to doubt any man's assertion made in this House and before the full House; and it would have been more courageous in the Minister of Education to have challenged the statement when it was made rather than to do it when the honourable gentleman making it was out of the House.

Mr. FISHER.—We challenged them in the country. That was the proper place.

Mr. Turnbull

Mr. TURNBULL.—"We challenged them in the country!" Why, the people in the country never heard it. This is the place to challenge them. Do you want to go behind the people's backs? Here is the place to have things of this sort brought out, and not in the country. If you wish to correct a statement it should be corrected at the time. There is not the slightest doubt about the enormous pressure brought to bear against the late Government by the great monetary and landed corporations and the large landed proprietors, and that that was the main reason for the change. The honourable member for Caversham says that he has a long list of what the late Government did. But what public man is there who has been before the public for years, like the late Colonial Treasurer, who has not committed blunders? We are none of us perfect; and to say that a man who has occupied important public positions for many years has made mistakes is only saying what might be expected of him. But I am afraid that, to use the language of Shakespeare, the honourable member for Caversham is a chronicler of small beer. Great actions he takes no notice of, but trifling errors he brings before the public in glaring colours. By the returns placed on the table it seems that there are 1,140 people—absentees—who own nine million pounds' worth of property; and, then, you have companies who hold another five million pounds' worth; so that these two bodies—the absentees and the companies—alone hold nearly fourteen million pounds' worth of property. And, considering the large advantages they obtain from the expenditure of public money, I should like to know why this House is not warranted in saying to these people, "You must pay a progressive property-tax." I cannot see any reason why a progressive property-tax should not be enforced. In the first place, these people have the largest properties in the colony; and the wealth which those properties give all goes out of the colony. Then, as regards the mortgages, they are drawing out of the colony all that is produced. Unfortunately, many of the mortgages were made when wheat was bringing 4s. 6d. a bushel. It was unfortunate not only for those who mortgaged the property but for those who advanced the money that such heavy advances were made at that time. The position now is that the persons who borrowed cannot pay, while those who advanced the money find the securities are not worth the money which they advanced. Still, the fact remains that all the money that is made in the colony goes to these mortgages; and I can see no reason why the colony should not obtain revenue from the persons who draw this wealth out of the colony. At the present time we are simply going to ruin. Let us look at the position of the colony as plainly as we can. We find that the private indebtedness of the colony is, in the first place, under the Land Transfer Act, something like £31,000,000. I am not going to anticipate a debate on the loan, but honourable members who talk about loans must remember that, if we do not borrow as a colony, individuals must do so. The private indebtedness last year increased by two millions of money; so that it will be an actual necessity, whether the Loan Bill goes on or not, that one of two things will happen: Either the Government must borrow, or private individuals must borrow; and I say that private owners are in this position in this country: that they cannot borrow any more. Of course it may be said that this is simply a transfer of old mortgages to new; but I will ask any honourable gentleman who takes up this Land Transfer paper and looks over it whether the figures I have given do not represent the actual new indebtedness. There is £31,000,000 there; then we go to the banks, and find that they have advanced £15,000,000—£11,500,000 advanced on personal property, and upwards of £3,000,000 on bills discounted—that is, £45,000,000; then, it is well known that on the Stock Exchange debentures have been floated from private companies to the amount of another £10,000,000: in round numbers this accounts for not much short of £57,000,000. Then, we know that our private bodies have borrowed to the amount of another five millions; so that the interest which we have to pay out of the colony on our indebtedness amounts to about three millions a year. Taking it at a very low rate of interest, we have to pay no less than that sum annually for the indebtedness of the country. Of course there is this to be said: that we have borrowed fourteen millions from ourselves—that is admitted. But take this fourteen millions from the private indebtedness and you will find that it takes nearly three millions a year to cover the amount that we have to send Home to pay interest due by private borrowers. This is one of the great evils of the country. It is one which any statesman ought to take into consideration at once; because—it does not matter how wisely the affairs of the colony are conducted, what economy is shown—so long as individuals are allowed to incur such large indebtedness on the landed property of the colony nothing but ruin can ensue from it. Leaving out of the calculation the £1,700,000 of interest which we have to pay on our own debt, that is the amount that has to be paid on account of private indebtedness. The question now is, What have we to come in with which to pay that amount? All that we have is what we can produce; and, when we have paid the million and a half of public indebtedness, all that we have got is about seven millions of money to pay the yearly ten millions that we have to pay for interest and for what merchandise we require from the Home-country.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I should like to rise to a point of order. I do not know whether the honourable member for Timaru is in order in repeating a speech which we have already heard so many times during this session.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There is no point of order in that.

Mr. TURNBULL.—My object is to get this House to recognise the position that this country is in. I feel that there can be no salvation for this country, nothing to lift it out of its present difficulties, until the Government come down with a strong and merciless hand to tax this property—these large properties which are the cause of the misery that now exists in the country—until they are taxed to such an extent that the proprietors are compelled to break them up and throw them open for the use of the people. Let me ask, What does this 2,250,000 acres mean? Take two millions of acres, and what would it produce to the country, even at the low price of wheat now? What is the wealth shut out from the country now by this land being occupied by sheep, instead of producing grain? It is quite true that grain is at a low price, and it is natural that men should enter into that branch of industry that will pay best; but I say there are questions arising under this state of things which affect not merely the welfare of individuals, but the welfare of the State; and I am convinced that, unless steps are taken in time, there is no hope of our being lifted out of our present difficulties. We are now driven, as the Treasurer has told us, to every kind of shift to do what, in homely language, is expressed by the phrase “make both ends meet.” We are carrying out what we call a system of retrenchment; but what is that but taking money from ourselves? There is not a penny saved by this system of retrenchment but what we are taking from ourselves, and that is going to increase the miseries and misfortunes of the country. There may be £20,000 accumulated by the savings of individuals out of all the moneys paid away in salaries, and the remainder of the money will be taken out of circulation, increasing the miseries of the people. Why are the Customs duties falling off to such an extraordinary extent? Some of that decrease may be traced to the more economical habits of the people, but a great deal of it arises from the fact that the people simply have not the power to spend. With our Customs revenue falling off, what are we doing? We are retrenching—that is, taking money out of circulation. The imports were a million less last year, and we may reckon now that £500,000 a year more will be taken out of circulation; and there is no doubt that this will increase the falling-off in our imports. If any one will just look over the bank accounts he will find that within twelve months discounts have fallen off to the amount of one million. This seriously affects the whole community. In a small community like this you cannot take a million out of circulation without affecting the whole community very much. And now we are going to take another £500,000 out of circulation, and to reduce the public expenditure at the rate of £1,000 per day almost, that is to say, to the extent of £270,000 a year, and to make a reduction of £27,000 a month in the public-works expenditure. Sir, I maintain that some system of progressive taxation should be adopted. Of course it may be pointed out that this is not the proper place or time to enforce this. But I do not think it is possible at any time for any individual private member to do anything in the way of increasing taxation; yet still I think this is one of those subjects to which attention should be called. An honourable gentleman asks what is the object of this. What was the object of the prophet, what was the mission that he was sent on? "Go, tell this people, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear." I reckon it is my duty, whether members stay in this House to hear it or not, it is still my duty, as a member of this House, as far as I possibly can to state the real position of the country. Now, it appears that 341 people in this colony hold property amounting to 16,871,666 acres. These are the people who, I say, ought to pay the progressive property-tax. We should get at these people. These should bear the burden of the country. Who have received the benefit of the large public expenditure, and who are locking up our railways from being used, our telegraphs from being used, and our Customs duties from being increased? These people hold human nature in abomination, for, if they advertise for a man to help them in occupying the large holdings, he must deaden himself to all feelings of humanity or he will be scouted. If he has, unfortunately, taken a wife and has a family he has no chance of getting a home. These people are shutting up the country against settlement. I pointed out the other night one estate of 40,000 acres that has only ten single men upon it; and it is some of the most fertile land in the colony! If that estate were properly occupied it would carry a population of some two thousand or three thousand people, and would add to the Customs revenue a sum of £6,000 a year. And what is it now contributing? It is contributing £60 a year through the Customs, and whatever the property-tax may be. If that property were cut up and settled, instead of being occupied by people paying £60 a year it would be occupied by people who would pay through the Customs at the very least £8,000. I say that no individuals have any right to hold property to the injury of the State to that extent. And no sophistry can ever prove that those men have a right to hold these lands. I would be one of the last to interfere with any one holding land to any extent if he chooses to pay the State the loss suffered through such holding; but, at the same time, the State must not be allowed to suffer because any one chooses to hold land and to lock it up against settlement. It is the object of this Government—and it is why they are placed on those benches, though they do not know it themselves—it is the object of those who pull the strings, the loan companies and banks, to keep them on those benches that they should unduly protect property and prevent it bearing a fair share of the public burdens. I will give a list of ninety estates in the South Island alone. There are in—

		Estates.	Comprising— Acres.
Cheviot	..	3	170,000

Now, it is estimated that the whole population these ninety estates carry, at the present time, giving the most liberal estimate, is not more than 2,700 people—that is, so far as can be ascertained, the number of people living on that large amount of land. It is an average of thirty souls to each estate, and I think that exceeds the average. What would be the consequence if these estates were cut up into reasonable farms? They would give us 15,000 decent-sized farms, and those farms would carry 100,000 people. I appeal to the Colonial Treasurer to see to this. These owners are depriving so many of a living upon the lands; and, while the bulk of the population are bearing burdens heavy and grievous to be borne, no more is demanded from the owners of these large estates, who have a monopoly of wealth, than from a man who has got a small fifty-acre farm. I say that where the State gives to individuals a monopoly of wealth it is perfectly right that those people should contribute to the State according to the extent of that wealth.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON moved, That, in order to provide for the management of the library during the recess, the resolutions in force during the past recess shall be in force during the coming recess, namely,—(1.) That the members of both Houses of Parliament residing in or within fifteen miles of Wellington be the Library Committee for the approaching recess; three to form a quorum. (2.) That the list of persons to be admitted to the full privileges of the General Assembly library during the recess be the same as that during the past recess. (3.) That visitors may, on application to the Chairman, be admitted to the library for the purpose of reference. (4.) That literary workers or students of a special subject may, at the discretion of the Chairman, be permitted to take out specified works on that subject.

Motion agreed to; and it was ordered that a message be sent to the House of Representatives asking for their concurrence in the motion.

PUBLIC BODIES' LEASEHOLDS ACT.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that the printing of the report would not be an expensive matter; it was very short.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the report upon Petition No. 28, of twenty-two settlers of Wyndham, praying for amendment of 'The Public Bodies Leaseholds Act, 1886,' be referred to the Government for their consideration, and be printed."—(Hon. Colonel BRETT.)

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said there was no objection to the printing of the report, so far as the Government were concerned. He might, however, take the opportunity of saying that a Bill was now before Parliament, and he hoped it would reach the Council, which would, he thought, meet the case in question.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN pointed out that the motion was more than that the report be printed—it was also that it should be forwarded to the Government for consideration.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS thought there would be no use in printing it, as it contained nothing. He moved, That the words "and be printed" be struck out. It was quite sufficient that it should be referred to the Government.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL submitted that to print the report of the Committee without the petition would be like printing an answer to a conundrum without printing the question. He suggested the adjournment of the debate until the Council had had an opportunity of considering the Bill referred to by the Hon. Mr. Stevens.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN thought that the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Reynolds would meet the necessities of the case.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPHARD was satisfied that the words "be printed" got into the report by a clerical error, because the Committee never intended that the report should be printed, for, as the honourable gentleman had said, there was nothing in it at all.

Amendment carried.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

OWHAOKO CASE.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL, in moving the motion standing in his name, said,—Sir, this is another question of printing, but it is one on which I think the labour will be of a little more use to the Council than in the other case. In the early part of the session a paper was, on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Shrimski, laid on the table relating to the Owhaoko lands, which purported to be the evidence in Court of the hearing of the Owhaoko-Kaimanawa lands. This paper was laid on the table and ordered to be printed. It is numbered Legislative Council No. 1, but is referred to in other papers as G.—4. It is an extract from the evidence, which the Council will perceive has nothing to do with the case which was before the Court. The evidence given in this paper simply relates to the mode in which the application for a rehearing was withdrawn. It was not, I submit, evidence such as should have been taken by the Court, and was, moreover, an injustice to absent persons; and it was not such as I think it is fair to leave alone amongst our records. Therefore it is that, with the permission of the Government, I have gone through the papers, and have moved that they be laid on the table. According to this evidence Dr. Buller is said to have supplied the Natives with drink, so as to get their signatures; and also to have substituted one paper for another, so that, when the Natives were really signing a paper withdrawing their application for a rehearing, they thought they were signing an application to have their names registered among the owners of the block. This evidence, if you come to look into it, is merely hearsay evidence; and the man has the audacity to utter what I believe to be lies in the presence of the Court, but he does not profess to speak from his own observation, but simply states it as something he has heard. And, of those who were stated to have been made drunk by Dr. Buller's rum, two were present in the Court and were not examined; and subsequently the Court would seem to have recognised the irrelevance of this so-called evidence sufficiently to think it not worth sifting. But, at the same time, I think it behoves us to put on record whatever we can which tends to show how it is that such prominence has been given to such a paper as this Legislative Council paper No. 1. Subsequently to this, the Attorney-General has read a letter from Mr. Warren, manager at Owhaoko, contradicting the reports contained in the evidence. The papers to be laid on the table are to meet the object I have in view; and if the Council pass the resolution I shall with pleasure submit to the examination of the Hon. the Attorney-General as to which of the papers shall be printed in extenso, and which shall simply be printed in a condensed form;

so that the paper as printed and laid on the table will be a recital of the circumstances connected with this case. The budget supplied by the Native Office is more bulky than I expected. I should, in justice to the officers of that department, state that the papers were made so bulky through everything relative to the case being placed with them, so that hereafter there might be no suspicion whatever that any papers relating to the matter had been suppressed. With this understanding, that the printing of these papers shall not necessarily involve the printing in extenso of the whole of these papers, many of which are unimportant, I move the resolution standing in my name.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the further papers on the Owhaoko case be printed."—(Hon. Mr. MANTELL.)

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I have no objection whatever to the motion; but it seems to me the Attorney-General might have saved a great deal of trouble and discussion in this matter. When I moved that these papers be printed the Attorney-General took objection to it, and stated that while he was in this Council he would endeavour to reduce the cost of printing. But he ultimately agreed to have a single paper printed. Even the judgment he refused to print; and now we are asked to have the whole of the documents which have been laid on the table printed. The Attorney-General refused to have them printed at my request, and I find now that he is perfectly willing to allow the papers to be printed at the request of another honourable gentleman. I think I have as much right to receive courtesy and attention from the Government as any other honourable member in this Council; and I say, by acting as he has done, he has shown party feeling, and has not treated me as he should have done. I am not making an apology: I merely want to show the Council the manner in which some honourable gentlemen are treated compared with others. If the cost of printing one paper at that time was too much, I do not see why the expense of printing the whole should be reasonable now. I fail to see why the Attorney-General allows this motion to be put without saying a word about the matter.

The Hon. McLEAN.—I am afraid the paper which has been printed necessitates the printing of further papers. I am sorry that the Government should have allowed a paper such as the one referred to to be printed and circulated. I know nothing of the circumstances of the case, but I say that the printing and circulating of such a paper as that is not fair to the persons concerned. One's nature rebels against such a thing; and, whatever the circumstances may be, every man is entitled to fair-play, and I certainly think that, by the printing of this document, the party concerned has not had fair-play. Whatever may be the cost of printing, it is only just that these further papers should be printed and placed alongside of the others. I believe the whole thing has been a mistake. I do not think the honourable gentleman who asked for these papers to be printed really realised what he was getting printed at the time. I am sure he did not realise it, or he would not have asked that the papers be printed. It is one of those cases in which people make a mistake, and it is too late to rectify it after the papers are in print.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I did not know the contents of the documents. I merely asked that the whole of the papers in connection with this case should be printed. The Attorney-General refused that request. I saw the letters of Judge Fenton and Sir Walter Buller, and they raised my curiosity, and therefore I wanted to know the rest of the case.

The Hon. Captain FRASER.—I would suggest to the Hon. Mr. Mantell that two other members of the Council should select the papers that should be printed, so that it might not be thought that the printed papers are simply an ex parte statement.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—In reference to the Hon. Captain Fraser's suggestion, I may say that I think it is an excellent one, and I shall be glad to consent to such an arrangement. My only object has been to endeavour to get further light thrown on the matter. I agree, however, with the Hon. Mr. McLean that it is a great pity these papers were ever printed at all. I do not think the Hon. Mr. Shrimski has any reason for complaint in the matter. I fancy that the papers for which he moved were prepared for laying on the table before the session began, and that the present Attorney-General had no time to look into the question. I am happy to say that I believe the Government will consent to the judgments being printed; and it is very important that they should be printed, because the first judgment—that delivered by Judge Mair, a brother-in-law, I believe, of the gentleman maligned in this paper—was entirely upset by the second judgment—that of Judge Wilson. Among other discrepancies, I see that in the first judgment Renata Kawepo was awarded eighty or ninety thousand acres. It appears that on the second judgment it was held that Renata Kawepo was not entitled to anything. These judgments will probably not occupy more space than four sides of an Order Paper, and I think everybody would admit that they should be placed on record, so that those who wish to estimate the value of a Native Land Court judgment may have, at any rate, two specimens alongside of each other for comparison. It may guide us hereafter.

Motion agreed to.

WELLINGTON COLLEGE AND GIRLS' HIGH SCHOOL BILL.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN said he wished, before the Council proceeded to the orders of the day, to call attention to a mistake which occurred last evening in the division-list on the Wellington College and Girls' High School Bill. He was always ready to fight a Bill when he was opposed to it, but he did not like to take advantage of any mistake which might be made in the taking of a division on the Bill.

Therefore he would ask the Hon. the Speaker to request the Hon. Major Wahawaha to say how he voted on that occasion. The Interpreter informed him (Mr. McLean) that the honourable gentleman voted for the Bill. If that was so, it made this difference: that the Bill was carried by one vote instead of being defeated by one vote. Standing Orders 79 and 80 referred to a case such as this. These Standing Orders were as follow:—

"79. In case of confusion or error concerning the numbers reported, unless the same can be otherwise corrected the Council will proceed to a second division.

"80. If the numbers have been inaccurately reported, the Council, on being afterwards informed thereof, will order the Journals to be corrected."

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said if there had been any error he was sorry for its occurrence. At the same time, he might say he took down the names as the votes were being taken, and he arrived at precisely the same conclusion as the Clerk did. He had heard since, however, that some members understood that the Hon. Major Wahawaha had voted in a different manner from that in which he (Mr. Waterhouse) understood the honourable gentleman to vote. If any exception was taken to the vote it should have been taken at the time. It was too late to take exception afterwards. In this case, he did not think any exception could be taken now, because, after the motion for the second reading was negatived, the words were then added, "this day six months." That was agreed to by the Council without any division at all. If there was any reason to suspect an error, that was the time to have called attention to it. If honourable members had called for a division upon the second question being put, that would at once have removed the difficulty. The second question was undoubtedly carried without any objection being urged by any member of the Council.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said that what the honourable gentleman stated was quite correct. He would ask how it would be possible for any member to challenge on such an occasion when he was not in possession of the division-list. It seemed to him to be obviously impracticable. The motion for the second reading having been declared negatived, it appeared to him that it would have been a waste of time to take a division on the subsequent question. If the honourable gentleman voted with the "Ayes," the Bill was practically carried; and, therefore, if that was correct, owing to an unfortunate mistake the decision upon the question had absolutely been carried in a different way from that which was declared.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said that in taking down the numbers on the division referred to he made the result exactly the same as the Clerk had done; but he could not hear distinctly which way the Hon. Major Wahawaha had voted, and he put him down with the "Noes," on which side the Hon. Mr. Taiaroa had voted. The Hon. Major Wahawaha had given his vote very indistinctly, and that accounted for the difficulty.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said that he had counted the voices as they were given. He counted the Hon. Major Wahawaha's vote as "Aye," and it was only after the meeting of Council that he saw that the honourable gentleman had voted with the "Noes." Of course it was impossible for him to know that until he saw the list.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said he made a remark at the time that the Hon. Major Wahawaha had voted with the "Ayes."

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES said the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse took down the numbers, and he (Mr. Holmes) asked the honourable gentleman what the result was, and he replied that the Bill had been lost by one vote—that was to say, there were 14 "Ayes" and 15 "Noes"; and this was before the Hon. the Speaker had announced the numbers.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER said he took down the numbers carefully. He made 15 "Ayes" and 14 "Noes." He himself voted with the "Noes." His counting of the members was different from that announced by the Speaker.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL supposed that there could be no practical outcome of this difficulty beyond some honourable gentleman moving that the resolution be rescinded.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON said the Hon. Major Wahawaha was present in the chamber. There were a number of honourable members who had given evidence as to how the honourable gentleman had voted. Why not ask the honourable gentleman himself? He (Mr. Swanson) did not like the present method of voting adopted in the Council. If the Hon. the Speaker said, "'Ayes' to the right of the chair, and 'Noes' to the left," and then honourable members went to different sides of the chamber, an error such as had happened could not occur. He often fancied that he saw some honourable gentlemen on the other side of the chamber who took notice as to how the vote was going on his side, and voted accordingly.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI said he was sitting close to the Hon. Major Wahawaha, and he knew that the honourable gentleman voted with the "Ayes." He (Mr. Shrimski) took down the numbers as—Ayes, 15; Noes, 14. He agreed with the Hon. Mr. Swanson that the method of voting carried on in the Council was anything but right. Honourable members on the other side of the chamber were always watching the way in which gentlemen on his side of the chamber were voting, and they sometimes regulated their votes accordingly. It was not a fair system of voting at all.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE thought that the best remedy would be this: that the Standing Orders Committee should consider the method of voting adopted in the Council. There was always some doubt about the way in which the voices were given, and if, as the Hon. Mr. Swanson suggested, members went to the right or the left of the Speaker, there would not be any question as to how the honourable gentlemen voted. He might remind the Council that some years ago this matter was brought forward, and it was decided then that the present method should be adhered to. He would give notice of motion with reference to the matter.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND said he took the numbers, but his tally did not appear to agree with that of any other honourable member. He made the numbers 16 "Noes" and 14 "Ayes," so that the Bill was lost by two votes. He remembered a previous discussion having taken place in reference to the method of voting. On that occasion he suggested that honourable members, when they were voting, should advance to the table and make a mark against their names on the division-list. In that way he did not see how a mistake could occur, at any rate so far as the Clerk was concerned in the matter. If a member made a mark in the wrong place, that would be his own fault.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN would like to explain that in bringing this matter before the House he attributed no blame to the Clerk, because certainly it was most difficult for him to hear some of the voices at times. He really wondered that officer was so correct as he was. He did not intend to take any further action in the matter, but he simply wished to see fair-play.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I would call on the Hon. Major Wahawaha to say in which way he voted on the occasion referred to.

The Hon. Major WAHAWAHA said that on the last division before the adjournment on the previous evening he had voted with the "Ayes," but perhaps his voice was not heard.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said he had the division-list before him, and there was no doubt that, according to the statement of the honourable gentleman, the division-list as announced by the Speaker did not accord with the voices now alleged to have been given on that occasion. The Hon. Major Wahawaha was recorded as having voted with the "Noes." The honourable gentleman now informed the Council that he had voted with the "Ayes." The voices of honourable members were frequently given so inaudibly and indistinctly that it would require greater precision than almost anybody possessed to be sure that a mistake was not made. There could not be any blame attached to the Clerk: at the same time a mistake had been made. The mistake on this occasion had altered a vote of one particular member, and the result which was declared was therefore entirely different from that which the Council intended. It was very much to be deplored. He felt in very great difficulty on this question as to the remedy. It was of essence that notice should be taken of a mistake at the time. At the same time, that rule had been made, he had no doubt, under the influence of a different mode of voting from that which prevailed in the Council—that was to say, a mode by which members went into a lobby, by which means were afforded of detecting a mistake. He was left with this difficulty, which he frankly asked the Council to consider: Standing Order No. 80 said, "If the numbers have been inaccurately reported, the Council, on being afterwards informed thereof, will order the Journals to be corrected." That, if interpreted accurately, would go against the principle that there and then notice must be taken of any inaccuracy. Therefore he felt very great difficulty in this question, how the suggestion which had been thrown out by the Hon. Mr. Mantell, that the resolution should be rescinded, could be adopted. He should like to take time to consider how far that could be done. He had frankly stated how his mind was affected by the circumstance; and he would like very much, if the Council would allow him, to take time to consider the point.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said, perhaps it would come within the scope of the Hon. the Speaker's consideration to consider also whether, in the peculiar circumstances of the Bill having been ordered to be read a second time that day six months, that motion could also be rescinded.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said that was the very point about which there was a difficulty.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY said that was the point he was going to draw the attention of the Hon. the Speaker to in considering this subject. Although the Bill had been lost, they would assume, by a mistake, a subsequent motion was made that the Bill be ordered to be read the second time that day six months. This motion was carried, and the motion appeared on the Journals of the House. He was glad to hear that no blame could be attached to the Clerk of the Council. He believed this was the first time that such a thing had ever happened.

Debate adjourned.

A. OWEN.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said that before the orders of the day were called upon he would desire to ask the leave of the Council to withdraw a petition which he presented yesterday. At the time that he presented the petition he saw that it complied with the provisions of Standing Order No. 17, which stated, "Every member presenting a petition shall acquaint himself with the contents thereof, to ascertain that it does not contain language disrespectful to the Council, and that it be in a convenient form." He was not aware, until the matter came up for discussion, of the provisions of Standing Order No. 23. That Standing Order provided that "No petition containing serious charges affecting the integrity of individuals shall be ordered to lie upon the table unless the member presenting the same shall intimate that he will propose to the Council a resolution in support of the charges." He desired now to withdraw the petition, as it contained charges which he was not prepared to follow up with a resolution without further inquiry into the charges it made.

Leave granted to withdraw the petition.

NATIVE LAND ADMINISTRATION BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—When I moved the adjournment of this debate yesterday, it was for the purpose of giving honourable members an opportunity of considering the importance of this measure. I must confess that, notwithstanding the fact of my honourable friend the Attorney-General arguing that delay was dangerous to a measure of this kind, I am not at all sure that the best thing to do even now would not be not to pass this Bill, for various reasons which I will endeavour to explain. My honourable friend pointed out that to cause any delay in the passage of any measure of this kind, at this time of the session, would be dangerous to the Bill. I agree with him; but he has had twelve or thirteen weeks, in which time he might have produced this Bill and brought it under our consideration. But no; it was allowed to remain until the very last days of the session, and then we are asked to assent to the passing of this Bill without giving it that consideration which its importance deserves. This Bill, to my mind, is a reversal of the whole of the policy of the last Ministry with regard to Native-land administration; and the honourable gentleman has given us no reason for the reversal of that policy. I understand it is argued that no reason has been given on the other side why this policy should not be reversed. That is a very poor argument indeed; and I say that, in connection with such a measure as this, we should have had some explanation. I am convinced, however, that my honourable friend's heart is not in this Bill, because, in moving the second reading, he did not show that usual vigour which characterizes him when he takes up anything he has at heart. The Bill is intended to enable certain transactions to be completed. Under the existing Act they are prevented from being completed; but by this Bill it is intended to allow certain purchases of Native lands to be completed. The Council have not before them the evidence—which, I regret, was not taken in shorthand—of the Chief Judge, who was examined before the Committee, when it was clearly shown to us that several persons made application for the completing of their titles, and they were absolutely refused by the Judge; and by the passage of this Bill this decision will be interfered with. It is intended by the present Bill to extend the time in which the purchase may be completed till July next, and that in the meantime the Bill shall only continue in force up to the end of the next session of Parliament. There is one objection which I have to this Bill of a very serious character, and that is that it interferes with the decision of the Supreme Court. That decision may be right or it may be wrong; but there is a place where that could be tested, and I submit that this is not the place to do so. I would also point out that the Act which this Bill is intended to repeal is called "the said Act;" and, notwithstanding the repeal, section 4 of the Bill refers to the said Act, and keeps it in operation. I have endeavoured to understand it, but have failed to do so. It is an open secret that the object of this Bill is to enable certain persons to complete transactions in regard to Native purchases; and the lists which are on the table of this House, if honourable gentlemen will go through them, will show exactly the position. They are instructive as showing how far honourable gentlemen may probably desire to get something done for themselves. These papers, in fact, speak for themselves. I will not refer to them further. I think the honourable gentleman will be best consulting the interests of the country by not going on with this Bill. A serious objection was taken yesterday to the Native Land Administration Act of last session—that the Bill placed the Natives in a very unfair position in regard to their lands; but I think that this Bill would place the Natives in a far worse position, because very few transactions have taken place in the colony in regard to Native lands, and that is the only reason that the honourable gentleman gave to the Council in moving the second reading of the Bill. I would suggest to him again, if he would accept my advice, which I do not suppose he will, the advisableness of allowing this matter to remain where it is.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—Before you put the motion, Sir, I would like to say that it seems to me that, after the trouble we have gone to in obtaining this information for the Council, no one seems to take any interest in it. As far as I am concerned, I have only done my duty, and if honourable gentlemen do not desire to take any interest in the matter I am quite satisfied.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—I must say that I am not altogether satisfied with the position of this matter at present. [Several sentences inaudible in the gallery.] Although, no doubt, I am in most perfect ignorance in regard to all matters connected with the chicanery, and deceit, and rascality of which we have had occasional signs, and of which we hear a great deal as of frequent occurrence in association with dealings in Native lands by private parties, yet in a case of this kind, where we have an Act on the Statute Book which embodies the distinct principle authorising the Government to act as the trustees in dealing with Native lands, I think I may be allowed to be able to form an opinion quite as worthy of attention as that of any honourable gentleman who may have had more special experience in this matter. I have experienced on former occasions that the Act which we deliberately placed on the Statute Book in 1886 was one which embodied a right principle, and I say that to depart from that principle by any alterations now, more especially in the proposal under consideration to repeal that Act, would be to inflict injury on the Maori inhabitants of the colony. Holding these opinions very strongly, and not at all seeing sufficient reason why the proposals of this Bill should go further than suspending the operation of the existing Act, I can see that the result will be the ultimate extinction of the Act, although the Bill proposes to terminate at the end of the next session. I say we should make a very great mistake in acceding to such proposals. [Speaker inaudible.] If the Bill were one proposing to confer power on uneducated men of our own race to deal with lands which they occupied in a similar manner, I am quite certain some time would elapse before their education would be sufficiently advanced to enable many of them to take advantage of it. I doubt very much whether, in the present state of the colony, they would have found a valuable market for any lands they had to sell. It seems to me, for these reasons, it would be undesirable to make any alteration in the law. It is in order to admit of transactions which were stopped by the passing of the last Act—to admit of such transactions being revived again—that the proposal now before us is made. I am quite certain of this: that no possible harm can arise from a delay in this matter. It is all but certain that another session of the Assembly will be held in the course of a few months, and I hope that by that time the Attorney-General, who is thoroughly familiar with all questions of this kind, will have had time to consider in what way the present Act should be amended, and that he will prepare such a measure as will be more acceptable to the Natives, and work more smoothly than the present law. In order to give my honourable friend time to prepare a well-digested measure on this subject, I move, That this Bill be committed this day six months.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND.—I desire to express my full appreciation of the sympathy which the honourable gentleman who has just addressed the Council has always shown in matters concerning the interests of the Native race. If I did not think that these interests were really best consulted by repealing the Act of 1886, I should not support this Bill. Thirty years ago, if the Government of the day had been able to treat with the Maori population, the establishment of a system based on tribal committees was a possibility; but in the altered condition of the race and its surroundings this is no longer possible. There are no longer the communistic habits amongst the race which were predominant forty years ago. The race has been sifted with fire. English gold flowing over the country has modified them very materially. I do not think it would be right to allow the transactions under the present Native Land Acts to be shut up for any length of time. The Natives, or a very large number of them, are living on what they can get for their land. That is a point which is, of course, a very serious matter for reflection, and one which any Government ought to have constantly before its mind, and not go to sleep upon, because the time cannot be very far distant when that source of subsistence to the Native race must cease. Until the Government have time to consider the matter fully I think it is expedient that we should do away with the Act, which, to my thinking, was, I might say, primâ facie one which would not work; and practice has shown that there is no disposition on the part of the Natives to take advantage of its provisions. The Native Affairs Committee, to whom this Bill was submitted, felt that they would be doing less than their duty if they were to recommend the Council to pass the Bill through all its stages without a very distinct intimation with regard to this point—namely, that they consider it a very temporary measure. The last clause of the Bill, which has been recommended by the Committee, is to the effect that the Act shall continue in force until the end of the next session and no longer. Thereby they throw on the Government the responsibility of bringing forward a Native-land policy next year. We have, at all events, long experience and a quantity of machinery at our disposal, and it will be difficult to do worse than we have done in the past. The clause saving inchoate transactions needs examination. Every one who looks at the question must very much regret that he has to take a pessimistic view; but, if a pessimistic view is the right one, it behoves us to take it home and do the best we can. I hope the Council will make up its mind to go on with this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—The Hon. Mr. Menzies said the Natives would not be satisfied; but the Natives will never be satisfied with any Bill in which the Government retains the right of pre-emption. What they want is to deal with their own lands, and I doubt whether the Parliament is inclined to give them that privilege again. The honourable gentleman wishes the present Act to get a fair trial. When that measure was before Parliament nobody ever expected that it would succeed; but some honourable members did try to get that measure on the Statute Book because it brought back the right of pre-emption to the Government, and gave the right of sale to the Government through the Waste Lands Boards. It was predicted that it would not work. Any one looking on the face of that measure must have known it was impossible for it to work—that the clauses constituting the Native Committees could not work. I should like to see the Committee clauses struck out of the Act. If that cannot be done I do not see much objection to this Bill, because it really brings matters back to the Treaty of Waitangi, and we shall be in the same position as we were in after that treaty. If we cannot do what I should like to see done, at all events we shall get a “clean sheet,” and be ready to start legislation fairly; and the Government will be compelled to bring in a Native Land Act next session, because this Bill cannot last past next session of Parliament. I do not think we can do much harm by placing this Bill on the Statute Book. As for those people who have got a certain time under the Bill in which to complete their transactions, whether they get two or three months more or less I do not think matters much. I know nothing of the transactions referred to. I am happy to say that I have never had anything to do with Native land, and I am thankful to say that

Hon. Mr. Menzies

I have had very little to do with any land. If a certain time is given to these people to complete their arrangements, a few months more or less will not alter the principle that they have a right to do so. If a certain time is given, they will know that they must complete their arrangements in that time, and they will endeavour to get the matters settled. Land is not looked upon at the present time with the same hunger that it was a little while ago. Land now is only worth what people can make out of it. A great number of those who have gone into Native-land dealings will be ruined through their transactions; and I never could see the force of this craze for buying Native land. The method of acquiring it is such that a person can never tell whether he will pay 5s. or £5 an acre for the land. It is startling to look at some of the old Native-land purchases and see how much money has been paid away. I must admit, however, that there were times when it was very desirable that roads should be made through these lands, and probably the best thing that could be done was to spend money on the lands in this way. We have now reached a time when there need be no fear of further trouble with the Natives. It is time now that we should treat them firmly, fairly, and honestly, and treat them as we treat other people. The sooner we come to do that the better it will be for the Natives and the better for ourselves; and they should pay rates towards the support of roads when money is spent to make the Native lands more valuable: at all events, it ought to be charged on the land, no matter at what time the land is sold. I still think we should allow this Bill to proceed, notwithstanding the disadvantages we labour under in dealing with the Bill now.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—It will be remembered that when I moved the second reading of this Bill I proposed that we should go into Committee and discuss the Bill in Committee; and I think it would have been much better if we had done so. I stated the grounds on which the Government brought forward this Bill; but, apparently, these grounds have to a certain extent been forgotten by some honourable gentlemen. Therefore I trust the Council will bear with me, although a good deal of what I say now will be but a repetition of what I said on the second reading of the Bill. The first part of the Native Land Administration Bill, as I have already pointed out, has reference to the future, and the second part of the Bill refers to the past. When this Bill was proposed it was thought that, in shutting up altogether the old mode of dealing with Native lands, past transactions should have an opportunity of being completed, and therefore some distinct clauses were introduced providing altogether for the past. The early part of the Bill refers entirely to the future—to the mode in which the land should be disposed of. I do not think there is much necessity for the Act to be repealed, or that it very much matters whether it is repealed or not, simply for this reason: that it has been entirely inoperative. There has not been a single case under it, so I am informed, and there is not likely to be one. I may say, for my part, I should be quite willing to let the Act remain on the Statute Book till the Government can come down with an amending measure; but the Natives have been pressing that the Act should be repealed. Those who have watched the Order Paper of the House of Representatives will have noticed that the Native members there have given notice of repealing the Native Land Court Act and the Native Land Administration Act in particular. I am quite sure of this: that, whatever we do in reference to Native lands, unless we carry the feelings of the Natives with us we shall do no good whatever. My honourable friend said that when the Native Land Administration Act was introduced it was said that it would not meet the views of the Natives, and that the Natives would not come under it. I myself stated that, I believe, in this Council. The result is that the Government, in bringing forward this part of the Bill, have done so in deference to what they consider the wishes of the Natives. Deputations from different parts of the country have waited on the Premier and Native Minister, and I understand that another deputation is waiting to see them now. These deputations have requested that the Native Land Administration Act should be repealed. The Hon. Mr. Menzies says that I shall, no doubt, be able next session to introduce a Bill which will be perfectly satisfactory to all parties. I will just shortly remind the Council of the different Native-land laws which have been in operation for the last forty-eight years. We began by reserving to the Crown absolutely the right of pre-emption. Nobody was permitted to deal with the land of the Natives in any way. That was under the Treaty of Waitangi and under the Act passed in the early days of the colony prohibiting the purchase of Native lands; and subsequently it was rendered penal to "squat" on Native lands, or to use them in any way. We then went from that extreme to the other extreme. Proclamations were issued by Governor Fitzroy for the purpose of allowing people to deal with the Natives, waiving the Crown's right of pre-emption in favour of certain individuals. Everybody who asked for this right got it; and that lasted for, I think, about twelve months. Sir George Grey then came, and reverted to the right of pre-emption altogether. So in five years we had three different systems. This went on for several years, until the General Assembly was established and the new Constitution Act came into force. What happened then? We began meddling with the right of pre-emption. There was a demand throughout the country by both Natives and Europeans that the right of pre-emption should be modified, and that the Natives should have opportunities of dealing with their lands themselves. These facilities were from time to time increased. That continued for some time. In 1865, I think it was, an Act was passed enabling Europeans to buy Native lands; and the Government and private persons, in purchasing these lands, were in competition with each other. That, I think, was about the worst system we ever had. The next step was a Proclamation, when Mr. FitzGerald was Native Minister, declaring that all the Government Native Land Purchase Commissioners were withdrawn, and it was declared that the Government would make no further purchases. That went on for some time. At the same time facilities were afforded for private purchasing, and in 1873 an Act was passed facilitating purchases but putting certain restrictions upon the purchasers. That continued till recently, when the present Administration Act was passed. This Act goes exactly in the opposite extreme. It prohibits any purchase from Natives direct, and provides for Natives selling lands through the Crown. We have tried all these systems. It is perfectly clear that the country must have been dissatisfied with them, because the Legislature, which represents the feeling of the country generally, has made all these alterations from time to time. During the last thirty or forty years there have been, I think, thirty-one or thirty-two Native Land Acts passed. If I were asked—and of course I know something about the matter, because I have been in Parliament when most of these Acts were passed—if I were asked to frame a Bill which would please both the Maoris and Europeans, I should admit my inability to do so. I do not think it is possible for any one to do that. It was promised in the Governor's Speech that a temporary measure should be brought in suspending the operation of the law as it stands at present. And it was stated that a permanent measure should be brought in during next session of the Assembly which, I think the Premier said, should be satisfactory to everybody. The Premier has promised that the matter shall be dealt with next session, and that in the meantime the Natives will be consulted in different parts of the country and asked what provisions they would like to have under the new Act. I predict that the answers will be as various as the tribes are numerous. It will end in the Natives in one part of the colony asking for something which is not wanted in another part; and I do not know that any advantage will come from inviting the Natives to express their views on the subject. I am quite satisfied that it will be impossible to produce a Bill which will satisfy the tribes in the different parts of the colony. However, that is a matter to be tried. This Bill has been introduced in deference to the wishes of the Natives themselves. I think it is a matter of no moment, so far as the repeal clause is concerned, with regard to future dealings with Native Land Acts. There have been no transactions hitherto under the present Act; and I am quite satisfied in my own mind that no transactions will take place under it. It was framed, I think, rather without consultation as to the wishes of the Natives on the subject. I think the Natives have determined, so far as they can, that they will not have other people meddling with their lands. They are jealous of the Government meddling with the land; and, in fact, they are jealous of any interference with their land in any way. I have no doubt that that will be found to be a very great difficulty in dealing with the question. I need not go into what has to be done in the future. Future inquiries will show what is to be done. I need not now pursue this part of the subject any further. If my honourable friend thinks it is not desirable that the repeal clause should be passed, he could simply move that the clause be struck out. That would not injure the remaining part of the Bill. I come now to show why the second part of the Bill is required. Under the Act of 1873 and subsequent Acts the Europeans were authorised to purchase land from the Natives under certain restrictions, and one restriction was that they should not be able to get a title to the land from the Crown, or be able to prove their claim, unless they had got every Native interested to sign a deed. Persons have bought land in this way from time to time. Where there were but a few Natives many transactions have been completed; but in other instances a large number have not been completed simply because of the very large number of Natives interested in the land, and the exceeding difficulty of getting the signatures of so many. In fact, in many instances it has been found impracticable, if not quite impossible. Probably twenty, thirty, forty, or even a larger number of Natives would execute the deed, but the signatures of many others had to be obtained. Clauses 32 and 33 of "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886," provide the most stringent prohibitions against private persons acquiring land from the Natives except under that Act, and impose most severe penalties on those who break the law. Of course, this absolutely, by itself, would have stopped all these parties who had partly purchased according to the law from completing their titles. This, of course, it was felt by the Government of the day—by the Government of which my honourable friend Mr. Buckley was a member—would be a great injustice, as no doubt it would have been. And therefore it was necessary that some provision should be made to enable those parties to complete their titles; and if they could not complete the titles in a certain time they were to go to the Native Land Court and have a division made between the Natives and themselves. There was a good deal of difficulty about the matter, no doubt. Provision was made by sections 24 and 25 that, whenever any person had made a purchase, he was to apply to the Court, and, if he proved that his transaction was a bona fide one, and a fair value had been given, then he was entitled to have a partition of the land between himself and the Natives. But he was allowed six months after that to complete his purchase; and after that the whole matter was to be wound up by the Native Land Court hearing the case, and giving to the Natives their portion of the land, and giving the Europeans that share of the land which they had purchased. No doubt this was a reasonable and fair arrangement so far. The matter came before the Assembly, and I had communications with my honourable friend Mr. Buckley and with Mr. Ballance on the subject, and also with the Judge of the Native Land Court; and we endeavoured to frame clauses which would carry out this object—that is, to wind up all these past transactions within a given time, and provide that no transaction was to be entertained which had not been commenced before July, 1886. A number of cases were brought on and certificates were given under section 24, and in other cases persons paid money to the Natives and got additional signatures to their deeds from time to time, as allowed by the Act. A case then occurred in Gisborne—the case of Seymour against Macdonald—in which an application was made to the Native Land Court for the purpose of getting a certificate under the Native Land Administration Act; but in this case the certificate of title which had been obtained from the Native Land Court contained a restriction on purchase. The Native Land Court came to the conclusion that they could not grant the certificate under the circumstances, the land having been recommended by the Court to be made inalienable. Mr. Seymour was dissatisfied with this decision, and brought the matter into the Supreme Court. It came before his Honour Mr. Justice Richmond, and he gave judgment; and that judgment had the effect of entirely destroying the intentions of the two clauses 24 and 25, which were especially framed to meet such cases. The Judge came to the conclusion that the clauses which were passed by the Legislature with the full intention—and were framed for the purpose—of allowing persons who had purchased land held under certificates of title to come in in order to get their cases dealt with, could only apply to those who held under Crown grant. The number of people who held under Crown grant was extremely limited; the large number who had claims were those who held under certificates of title. The consequence of the judgment was that it stopped the operations of the Land Court, the intention of the Legislature was entirely frustrated, and people who had been induced by the legislation of 1886 to take a great deal of trouble in completing their titles and preparing their cases to come into Court with a view of obtaining partitions were entirely disappointed and completely thrown overboard. That is the position in which the matter stands at the present time. There are now, in a list which was shown to us in the Committee, something like three hundred claims in various parts of the country, some referring to blocks of many thousands of acres, down to an acre. These claims now are unsettled, and the parties concerned have taken all the necessary steps up to a certain point, and were proceeding with their cases when the decision of the Supreme Court came and entirely upset them. Mr. Seymour was not satisfied with the decision of the Supreme Court, and he went then to the Court of Appeal, and the Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the Judge; and the consequence has been that nearly the whole of what has been intended to be done under clauses 24 and 25 of the Act has been swept away. There are no means now of proceeding, and the whole thing is in absolute confusion. A question was raised as to whether it was fair, under these circumstances, that these people should be given additional time in order to complete their titles. Personally, I think a little longer time should now be given. I cannot understand the limitation of the clauses to those under Crown grants—a point not decided by the Court of Appeal—to decide the case on the restriction point; but I dare say the Judge knows very much more than I do, and I am not going to discuss this question. But it appeared to me to be an interpretation which the Act does not bear. I say this because, with my honourable friend, opposite, and with the parties engaged in the matter, I assisted in drafting these very clauses; and the object of the Act, as everybody knew at that time, was that all these old transactions should be wound up as speedily as possible, and that no new transactions of a like kind should take place: and most specific penalties were prescribed for anybody who broke the law. As I have mentioned, the object of the law was to prevent the commencement of any new cases; but those persons who had made their purchases in accordance with the law were to be allowed to wind up their transactions by having a partition of the land between themselves and the Natives. Under all these circumstances—whatever view the Council may take as to that part of the Bill which provides the mode in which all Native land shall be acquired hereafter, whether that shall be preserved as it is or not—I submit to the Council that, if they do nothing else but provide for the winding-up of past transactions in the way intended, they will be doing no more than justice to those who have entered upon such transactions in accordance with law. This was intended under the Act of 1886; and since that Act was passed these people have an additional grievance—that the law was not sufficiently clear so that they could complete their transactions as intended. The Council, in considering the Bill which I wish to go into Committee upon, can separate the two parts of the Bill. The former part of it has reference to future transactions. This, to my mind, will be inoperative; but if it did operate it could do no harm whatever, and I shall be satisfied that it should continue, and that it should be the only law by which Natives can sell their lands in future. But this is a matter entirely separate from the subject of past transactions, and therefore when we go into Committee on the Bill the question to be considered is, whether the provision made as to future transactions is one that should be maintained or not. The provision made in the Bill before the Council is that nobody is to be allowed to purchase land from the Natives except the Crown between this and the promised new Act of next session passing. Everybody is absolutely prohibited, and everything done unauthorised by law is declared to be void and illegal. This is in accordance, to that extent, with what the Natives desire; and the whole matter is to be considered before next session, and some Bill is to be prepared providing for the future. Therefore, whether the Administration Act of 1886 is to remain on the Statute Book or to be repealed is of little consequence. I did not interview the Natives on the subject, but the Premier and Native Minister did, and they particularly impressed on the Natives that there would be no mode between this and next session of selling the land unless it was sold to the Crown—the Natives were given to understand that there was no mode by which they could deal with their land, and the whole matter would have to stand over till next session; and I understand that it was their desire to accept these views. As far as myself and the Government are concerned, it is of no moment whether the present Act is allowed to remain on the Statute Book, or whether it should be repealed. Therefore this part of the Bill is entirely separable from the other. I ask the Council to allow the Bill to go into Committee. When we discuss this question, we can discuss it better in Committee than now, because, having spoken once, I cannot answer points that may be afterwards referred to, and I can do so in Committee. There are not many people who really do or care to understand the Native question, and therefore I prefer that all matters relating to the question be discussed in Committee, and the whole position be debated and perfectly understood; and then we could discuss both branches of the subject, and especially as to what it is necessary to do under the circumstances in order that these first transactions may be wound up and agreed to, as was the intention of the Legislature in 1886. I say that the two questions—the past and the future—are entirely separable, and I hope that they may be discussed fully. Different views may be taken in regard to them, but I do think that they are deserving of the careful consideration of the Council. My honourable friend proposes that this Bill should be laid aside for six months, and that all those people who have spent their money in preparing their cases to come before the Court shall have had all their trouble for nothing. I think that would be a great hardship. Whatever is to be done should, in my opinion, be done speedily, for speedy justice is the best kind of justice. No doubt those people have spent very considerable sums of money in the purchase of their lands, and I am quite sure that many of them will never see their money back again under any circumstances, and in these hard times it is very desirable that whatever claim they may have should be inquired into and settled without delay. It would be an unfair and unreasonable thing to allow the matter to stand over for another six months; but if the Council will go into Committee the matter may be more fully discussed, and if they think that the Bill should not, in its present or any other form, be passed, it would be quite competent for them to decide in that direction. Had the Hon. Mr. Menzies known the result to the country his amendment would have, I feel sure that he would not have moved it. It would cause a breach in all the expectations which the Government have held out. I therefore now ask the Council to go into Committee and let us proceed with the matter. I do not wish to press the Council. If members want time to consider it, they ought to have time. It would be quite competent in Committee, when discussing the questions, to move that progress be reported with or without asking leave to sit again. But do not let us say now that we shall consent to the amendment that the Bill be committed this day six months. Let us consider the claims of the persons who are interested. I think that will be a fair and reasonable thing to do, and we shall be inflicting an undue hardship on them if we throw out this Bill.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now' be retained."

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY BILL.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Sir, it is now my duty to move the second reading of a measure of first-rate importance—the construction of a railway which will add value to more than two millions of acres of land, and practically add a new province to New Zealand. The Council will have the opportunity, by adopting my proposal, of accomplishing a work which has been called for very earnestly for many years past by a large proportion of the inhabitants of the southern part of the colony. It has been for many years a cherished desire in that part of the country to have this work completed; and so strong has been the feeling in favour of its prosecution that members of Governments have been rejected, and I may almost say that Governments have been defeated, in consequence of a prevailing feeling that this work has not been prosecuted with proper vigour. The Council now has the opportunity of getting that work proceeded with on terms so reasonable that I believe they will not be rejected. By means of this Bill the work, it is believed, can be constructed, and will cost the colony not one farthing. According to the evidence of the Surveyor-General, the sacrifice of land by means of which this work can be constructed will only lessen the pastoral revenue of the colony by £5,000 a year; and I shall show that this sum will be more than made up by the construction of the railway giving additional value to the Crown lands. Ten years or so ago there was a Bill introduced into the House of Representatives called the Strath-Taieri and Clyde Railway Bill. The object of that Bill was to obtain the construction of most of this line by means of an endowment of land. Four hundred thousand acres of land were to be set aside and were to form the endowment by means of the sale of which the money was to be got by which this line was to be constructed. That proposal was to make the railway only as far as Clyde. The present proposal is of a more extensive character—namely, to carry the railway to Lakes Wanaka and Hawea. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Ormond, Pyke, De Lautour, Macandrew, Hislop, Carrington, Fisher, Bunney, Larnach, and Stout. The Committee very exhaustively inquired into the character of the proposal, and the evidence taken by it was most valuable. Mr. Donald Reid was then Minister of Lands, and he was examined by the Committee. I find in the evidence the following question put by Mr. Macandrew, and Mr. Reid's answer:—

"35. Mr. Macandrew.] I would put this general question: Assuming the interior of Otago is to be opened up, are you of opinion the line by Strath-Taieri is that which would affect the greatest area of available country?—Clearly the line by Strath-Taieri is the line that will do the greatest good to the interior of the province; it will open up the greatest area of land for settlement, as well as meet the requirements, in my estimation, of the interior districts; it will bring them in direct communication with the chief seaport."

Mr. Reid gave other evidence of a valuable character; and Mr. McKerrow—who is now Surveyor-General, but who was then Assistant Surveyor-General—also gave important evidence. He says,—

"From North Taieri to Strath-Taieri is a piece of extremely difficult country. The line would require to pass up a steep rocky gorge, where there would be enormous steep cuttings and the bridging of tributary streams."

"130. What is the length of the first section which you say would be so difficult?—About twenty-four miles from North Taieri on to Blair Taieri."

"131. And from Blair Taieri to Hyde?—The construction would be very easy. It passes up a beautiful level valley a distance of sixteen miles. Then from Hyde to the Taieri Lake, a distance of nine miles, it would be ordinarily easy, neither very difficult nor very easy, and a fair average. Then from the Taieri Lake to the Rough Ridge it would also be a very easy construction—a distance of sixteen miles. Then from Rough Ridge to the Poolburn Gorge, a distance of, say, eleven miles, the construction would also be very easy. Then from the Poolburn Gorge, a distance of about three miles, the construction would be extremely difficult, passing through a deep rocky gorge, which cannot be avoided. Then from the Poolburn Gorge to Clyde, a distance of about twenty-four miles, the construction would be very easy. Then from Clyde to Cromwell, a distance of thirteen miles, it would pass through a gorge where the construction would be the average in railway-construction along the river-bank.

"132. The second question is this: What is the character of the country through which this line would pass?—We will take it in the same sections. From North Taieri to Blair Taieri the country may be described as semi-pastoral, semi-agricultural, the pastoral predominating. From Blair Taieri to Hyde it passes through a very fine agricultural district. From Hyde to the Taieri Lake the country is again semi-pastoral, semi-agricultural. Then from the Taieri Lake to Rough Ridge on to Poolburn the country may be said to be half agricultural and half pastoral. It is a great level plain; rather a high elevation, probably, for growing wheat. Then from Poolburn Gorge to Clyde it passes through a very fine valley (Manuhirikia), of which a belt four or five miles wide may be said to be all agricultural. Some of it is very shingly, but under irrigation and perhaps shelter it would grow oats."

"133. In speaking of this country between Rough Ridge and Poolburn, what kind of country is that?—It is country I have described now as semi-pastoral, semi-agricultural, and I believe it would grow oats very well; but it is at a very high altitude, varying from 1,200ft. up to 2,000ft."

"134. Now, what would you say was the total area of land available for agricultural settlement from North Taieri up to Clyde, that would be rendered accessible by the construction of such a line?—There will be 1,200,000 acres opened up."

"135. Agricultural?—Oh, no; mixed."

"136. How much would be rendered accessible for agricultural settlement?—I did not consider that point, but I think I might say a fourth of it, or perhaps a third. We do not know what will grow there, because at one time they thought wheat would not grow beyond Taieri; then we shifted to Clutha; then to Queenstown, which is now one of the finest wheat-growing districts in the colony."

"137. Your answer is that it would render available 1,200,000 acres?—Yes. Of that 1,200,000 acres the whole of it is Crown land with the exception of about 40,000 acres, which is a very important point."

"138. Of these 40,000 acres how much is the education reserve?—I excepted the education reserve."

"139. Is the 40,000 acres beside the education reserve?—Yes. I think it would be more nearly 30,000 acres when I consider it."

"144. Mr. Hislop.] Do you think only a portion of the land would be opened, namely, that alongside the railway-line?—I should think it would double the value of the land tinted on the map. This Strath-Taieri Hundred was opened up and advertised, and a lot of Taieri settlers went up and started farming, but they found they could not work two establishments on account of the hilly road intervening, and came back. The Strath-Taieri land is at present unavailable for settlement on account of its inaccessibility.

"145. Are these mountains to the west side of the railway?—They are mountain-slopes.

"146. Can it be said the railway will open up this country?—Yes, up to the watershed.

"147. But not beyond it?—No.

"148. Mr. Macandrew.] You say that this line would render available 1,200,000 acres?—Yes.

"149. Have you any idea what would be the ultimate value of that land, assuming the line were made, per acre?—I really believe you could sell 400,000 acres at 30s. an acre, that is £600,000, and the remainder would sell on an average at 15s. an acre: that would bring it up to £1,200,000, after the railway is constructed.

"168. The Chairman.] Beyond Cromwell, do you know the country; how far towards the West Coast?—Up to the forest of the Makarora.

"169. Would that open up a large area of land?—It would. There is 1,065,000 acres from Cromwell to Makarora Bush.

"170. Supposing the railway be carried so far as Cromwell at present, would that be beneficial, and calculated to assist in opening the country beyond Cromwell that you have described?—Certainly.

"171. It is the natural outlet for all the country in that valley?—Yes.

"172. Mr. Macandrew.] And from Cromwell to Lake Wanaka it is almost dead level?—It rises in forty miles about 300ft.

"173. The Chairman.] Can you tell us the elevation at the head of Lake Wanaka?—The lake itself is put down at 1,089ft. That is a mistake. It is only 920ft. The land at the head of the lake is only a few feet more.

"174. What is the elevation of Cromwell?—700ft.

"175. There are no hills to go through—no cuttings, no bridges?—Yes; a bridge would be required where you cross the Clutha once.

"176. Not near Cromwell?—Yes; you must cross the river near Campbell's Station, Wanaka.

"177. Then, there would be only one bridge of any formidable dimensions?—Yes.

"178. Can you tell us the elevation of the Haast Pass?—1,700ft.

"179. That is the highest point between Dunedin and the West Coast by that route?—Yes; it is the only true pass in the Middle Island; the rest are going up and over spurs. There is no end of timber at the other side of the pass. From Lake Wanaka to the West Coast it is dense timber. It is important you should know that the Strath-Taieri route passes through lignite deposits which are extensive. They are adjacent to it all along. But for that lignite the diggers would very likely have had to give in long ago."

I am reading this because the evidence of Mr. McKerrow is of the greatest importance amongst that given to the various Committees which have sat on this question. Now, Sir, this is the evidence of the present Surveyor-

Hon. Mr. Oliver

General. Many of the witnesses also gave very important evidence, but I will not detain the Council with that. Well, the report of the Committee was as follows:—

"The line viâ Strath-Taieri commands the largest quantity of Crown lands available for settlement, presents the fewest engineering difficulties, passes entirely through Crown lands, and has the great advantage of being the nearest and most direct line from the interior to Dunedin. It has been shown in evidence that this line will directly open 1,200,000 acres of Crown lands, of which it has been variously estimated that from 400,000 to 500,000 acres are immediately adapted for agriculture. In addition it affords railway communication for 1,065,000 acres of land above Cromwell, which is the natural outlet for all the traffic of the basin of the Clutha River and the Hawea and Wanaka Lakes. This line possesses the further recommendation of having been selected by Mr. Blair, the District Engineer, after a personal inspection of the several proposed routes, as the best in an engineering and economical point of view; and Mr. Blair's opinions are fully sustained by the evidence given before your Committee by the Surveyor-General, Mr. Thompson; the Assistant Surveyor-General, Mr. McKerrow; Mr. Roberts, merchant, of Dunedin; the Hon. the Minister of Lands; and the Hon. Sir Francis Dillon Bell. The highest summit-level on this line would be 1,500ft., and it is worthy of remark that, from Cromwell to the West Coast at Jackson's and Open Bay, the highest point to be surmounted is only 1,700ft. above the sea-level—namely, in the Haast Pass; and the continuation of this line to the West Coast is only a question of time.

"Your Committee have therefore agreed to report—"That the route to Cromwell viâ Strath-Taieri is unquestionably that which opens up the largest area of unsold land available for pastoral and agricultural settlement.

"That the respective County Councils of Taieri, Maniototo, and Vincent, failing the Colonial Government undertaking the work, are prepared to do so, on condition of a given area of land being placed at their disposal, and to hand over the line when completed to the Government.

"That the Committee recommend the construction of this line to the favourable consideration of the Government; and, failing the Government undertaking its construction, it is absolutely necessary, in the interest of settlement, that the work should be forthwith proceeded with, either by the counties concerned or by a private company; and that, in either case, with a view to accelerate the progress of the work, and of diffusing employment throughout the district, the work of construction should be commenced at each end of the line, and at one or more points in the centre, simultaneously.

"And your Committee further recommend—"That a Bill should be introduced into Parliament during the present session, so as to give effect to their report without delay or loss of time, which in the present condition of the labour-market would, in the opinion of your Committee, be injurious, if not disastrous, to the best interests of the country."

' That is the report of the Select Committee which was appointed to consider the Strath-Tairi Bill more than ten years ago. The Bill was passed by the other branch of the Legislature, and came up to this Council, and the second reading was moved by Sir John Hall. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Hon. Mr. Miller, the Hon. Mr. Bell, the Hon. Dr. Pollen, the Hon. Colonel Whitmore, the Hon. Mr. G. Buckley, and the Hon. Sir J. Hall. The evidence taken by this Committee is very interesting, as well as that which I have read to the Council, and repeats, to a very great extent, the evidence which I have read. The conclusion to which this Committee came was, generally, to this effect: that this line is the best line of railway for opening up the lands of Otago, and that the mining interests are large and important, and that there are many points fit for settlement which until the railway is constructed there is no hope of bringing into occupation. I will read a portion of the report of the Committee to the Council:—

"The Committee approve the principle of reserving land for the construction of the railway, provided that the reservation made shall in each case be of an extent and character sufficient to insure that no charge for the construction of the line shall fall on the revenue of the colony.

"That as regards Otago the whole interior basin of the Upper Tairi, Manuherikia, and Upper Molyneux is practically locked up from profitable settlement by not being made accessible to the seaport, and is at present unsaleable at anything like £1 per acre, but that the proposed railway would render the land certainly saleable at a price above that limit."

This being the report of the Committee, the Bill would have passed this Council but for the unfortunate fact that the Committee saw fit not only to report in favour of this line, but to attach to the Bill several other lines of railway. That insured its rejection: and the loss the country has suffered from this rejection has been very great. Were it not for this, the railway would have been in use by this time, and would have proved of most valuable service to the colony. Well, Sir, in 1878, the year following that in which the Bill was introduced, this line of railway was adopted by the Government. It was recommended to Parliament, and was included amongst the railways authorised by Parliament. Money was voted for it, and it was begun; and every year since that time sums of money have been voted for it, and the work is now being prosecuted. The sums of money which have been voted are very large, but I am sorry to say that the sums spent are not so large. In the year 1878-79 there was £55,000 voted; in 1879-80, £120,800; in 1880-81, £68,000; in 1881-82, £36,000; in 1882-83, £50,000; in 1883-84, £130,000; the following year, £165,000; and the next year, £126,000; and in 1886, £140,000: making, altogether, a total of £891,400. This sum was voted for this railway. The expenditure upon it to the last date on which accounts were furnished amounted to £328,207, with a further liability of £66,554; so that the total amount actually spent on the line was £394,761, or, in round numbers, £400,000. Now, we have a proposal by the Minister for Public Works the other day, in his Public Works Statement, for a further expenditure, beyond the liability of £66,000, of £105,000—that is, to spend £170,000, bringing up the total expenditure on this line to just half a million. Well, Sir, the work done by means of this large sum is decidedly of an unremunerative character. Unless the railway is carried farther into the country, all this money will be absolutely thrown away, because the point at which it is proposed by the Minister to stop this railway, as a Government railway, is only forty miles in all, and just goes over the frontier of this promised land. The expensive character of the work and the difficulties which have been encountered in the construction of this line will be easily learned. The average cost per mile up to Middlemarch, the Government terminus, will be £12,500, while the ordinary cost per mile of Government railways is an average of a little under £6,000. Now, Sir, the result of this expenditure is that in a few months—some time about next September—we shall have twenty miles of the railway open for traffic, leading to a point which, I think, will scarcely warrant its opening for traffic. There is thirteen miles further which is partly made, and the Government propose to construct seven miles beyond that, bringing it up to forty miles, to Middlemarch, and there stop it. The principal difficulties of the line, however, have been overcome by the expenditure that has already been made; and the difficulties which will be met with in the prosecution of this work over the remaining 140 miles will be very few and trifling, compared with those which have already been encountered. The proposal is to prosecute this railway at the average cost of a little under £6,000 a mile. The route has been surveyed, and even working plans have been made, and for the last three or four years have been lying complete in the Government offices; and the cost of the whole line, beginning at Middlemarch and ending at Lakes Wanaka and Hawea, is a little over £800,000. And now to continue the history of this undertaking up to date. Owing to the want of energy shown by the Government in the prosecution of the work, the three County Councils through whose districts the railway was proposed to go joined in appointing what they called a commission to inquire into the character of the line and report upon it. The Commissioners reported in June, 1881. The report is a valuable one as showing the opinions that were come to after a more or less complete inquiry by gentlemen whose names are known to nearly every member of this Council. The Commissioners included Messrs. Bathgate; Henry Clark, who for years past had been one of the most useful and respected members of the Otago Land Board; Mr. Donald Reid, formerly a member of the House of Representatives and a Minister of the Crown; and Mr. Horace Bastings, also a former member of the House. I will trouble the Council with one or two extracts from their report, so that the Council may know the opinions of men who went over the ground and made an examination of the condition of the country, and so on. In paragraph 3 of the report they say,—

“A general view of the importance of the line may be realised from the following facts: It would start from the Main Southern Trunk line, only seven miles south from Dunedin, thus having at one terminus a population of 45,000. The district to be traversed contains at present a number of industrial centres, including the Boroughs of Alexandra, Cromwell, and Naseby, and the Townships of Pembroke, Albertown, Bendigo, Bannockburn, Clyde, Ophir, Drybread, Tinker's, Cambrian, St. Bathans, Hill's Creek, Kyeburn, Hamilton, Hyde, Middlemarch, and Hindon. The population numbers about 10,000, all actively engaged in agricultural, pastoral, and mining pursuits, and in the various trades and manufactures necessary for such a population. There are twenty-three post-offices, ten branch-banks, and twenty-five schools, having thirty-six teachers and 1,503 scholars. A Resident Magistrate's Court is held at eleven different localities. Three newspapers are published locally—viz., the Mount Ida Chronicle, the Dunstan Times, and the Cromwell Argus. The annual valuation of the Counties of Vincent and Maniototo, including boroughs, is £84,424, although nearly the whole of the land is still part of the waste lands of the Crown.”

Then follows a long paragraph about the importance of the agricultural and pastoral interests; but I presume the members of the Council know something of the character of this district, so that I will not inflict upon them more of this report than I can avoid, it being simply my object to give a general review of the character of the land. The report states,—

“The various settlers examined spoke, without exception, of the remarkable fertility of the soil, and concurred in stating that from 30 to 50 bushels per acre of good wheat have been obtained, and from 35 to 70 bushels of oats. Turnips and other root-crops thrive excellently. Such is the superiority of the climate for the growth of cereals that places situated at an altitude at which grain would not grow in Britain were found to yield productively. Wheat was shown to us at Naseby of good quality which had been grown at a height above the sea of 2,000ft. Mr. Roberts states in his evidence in relation to the high land in the Hindon and Silverpeak districts, ‘Good crops are grown 1,500ft. above the sea: oats and magnificent turnips.’ The height of Strath-Taieri plain at its lowest point is about 625ft. above the sea.”

Hon. Mr. Oliver

Then the Commissioners go on to show the drawback which settlers encounter who try to pursue agriculture, owing to the distance from market to the sea. They say,— “Cultivation, beyond what is necessary to supply local wants, is subjected at present to the prohibitive drawbacks of distance from market, and cost of carriage. We found in several instances two years' crops on hand. These drawbacks were the only complaints made by the settlers. They praised the climate and the fertility of the soil, and were all desirous to increase their area of cultivation, if facility of communication could be obtained.”

I shall not detain the Council any longer by reading this evidence, but it was necessary to give the Council some idea of the character of the country to be penetrated, and I thought that these reports would show it to us more concisely than I could. The report of the Commissioners is here, and a map attached to it, which I will lay on the table for the purpose of having it consulted by honourable members. It shows the proposed route, and the character of the land. I have also a similar map, which I have from the Surveyor-General, and it may possibly carry greater conviction to the minds of honourable members, although I have ascertained from the Public Works Department that his map attached to the report of the Commissioners was furnished by that department. That brings the evidence in favour of the line up to 1881. There is a very important item of evidence—which I should like to submit to the Council—contained in the report of the Surveyor-General presented to the House on the 10th July, 1885. It is a report on the Crown lands for future settlements. The Surveyor-General reports as follows of the districts concerned:—

“Nenthorn and Strath-Taieri, and Deep Dale Run (part of), 80,000 acres: Well-grassed land, from 600ft. to 2,000ft. altitude, well adapted for farms from 200 acres to 500 acres—one-half for agriculture and the other half for pasture. This country has been shut out from Dunedin and the coast by intervening hills. On the opening of the Otago Central Railway it will only be from forty to fifty miles from Dunedin by rail.

“Upper Taieri or Maniototo Plain (level and upland), 150,000 acres: Open grass-land; at present held in runs which can be resumed for settlement on twelve months' notice. Altitude of plain 900ft. to 2,000ft. Cereals and root-crops grow well. 10,000 acres at present open for application on settlement conditions. It would be premature to open more land until the Otago Central Railway is extended to the plain.

“Ida, Manuhirikia, and Upper Clutha Valley, 250,000 acres: Similar country to the above, and also held on pastoral lease; should not be opened until country is more advanced. About 20,000 acres of it surveyed, and now open for selection on settlement conditions.”

I shall finish the evidence drawn from official sources by referring to the report of the Waste Lands Committee of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred this Bill in May last. The following is an extract from the evidence given before that Committee by Mr. McKerrow, Surveyor-General:—

"1. The Chairman.] It is the wish of the Committee to learn—first, the quantity of land which would be affected under the concession-clauses of this Bill; next, as to the quality of the land and its availability for settlement—how much of it is agricultural and how much pastoral land. Will you be good enough to make a statement on both these points, and afterwards answer questions that members of the Committee may ask you?—Yes. From this Bill I observe that it embraces that portion of the Central Railway from Taieri Lake to Lakes Wanaka and Hawea. The distance is about 110 miles. The Bill further states that all land within fifteen miles each side of the railway is to be considered in connection therewith. That includes an area of 1,820,000 acres, of which there are 170,000 acres of freehold and public reserves, leaving of Crown lands 1,650,000 acres. For the convenience of the Committee I have divided the line into two parts. It will be more convenient to do so, considering the nature of the land through which it passes. From the Taieri Lake to Clyde is a distance of sixty miles. Of Crown lands there are 1,030,000 acres. Of this area, 830,000 acres may be deemed pastoral, and 200,000 acres agricultural. Taking that portion of the land from Clyde to Hawea, a distance of fifty miles, there are of Crown lands 620,000 acres, of which 570,000 acres may be deemed pastoral and 50,000 agricultural land. In both cases I estimate the agricultural land at £1 per acre; the pastoral land in the first division, from Taieri Lake to Clyde, at 12s. 6d. an acre; the division between Clyde and Hawea (pastoral land) I estimate at 10s. an acre. The whole cash value of both divisions, pastoral and agricultural, over the whole line, as above stated, is about £1,000,000 sterling. Next as to the nature of the land. The railway-line begins at Taieri Lake, running through a large tract of level country called the Upper Taieri Plain, thence to the Ida Valley, thence to Manuherikia, thence through the Gorge to Cromwell, thence to the Upper Clutha Valley. These valleys are all very similar in respect to the quality of the land, being mostly of a gravelly soil, with a deeper soil along the margin of the mountain-slopes. Speaking as regards its suitability for agriculture, it might be described as possessing a light sweet soil, that yields crops admirably in moist seasons; but, as the climate of all the interior of Otago is rather dry, there is always an uncertainty of gathering in the crops from year to year. But wherever irrigation has been resorted to and there is water available the security of crops is a matter of certainty. Wheat will grow in this district and ripen well, in good selected spots, up to an elevation of 1,800ft.; oats to an elevation of 3,000ft. But, as all the level land, or that which is likely to be cultivated, is under an altitude of 2,000ft., that may be deemed to be the limit of cultivation.

"30. I have your report here—the report of the Surveyor-General made in 1885 [C-5]. You recommended that these lands should not be sold, but should be held in suspense until the railway is built. Will you tell me the meaning of the word 'advanced' used in that report?—Until there is more population, and until the conditions of the country should be altered.

"31. You did not think that certain lands should be sold until the railway was extended to the district?—Yes. I should like to explain to the Committee what I might call the reason of giving this return at all. It was obtained by Mr. Montgomery; and the direction given to me was not to draw up a general scheme at all, but to say what particular land would be suitable for agricultural purposes. Had I been free to give a general report I would, as I am now pointing out, have stated that it would be an unwise thing to give this land for purely agricultural purposes although it is agricultural land. The land must be associated with the high country if the most is to be taken out of the district.

"32. You spoke just now of the 'light soil.' will you give the Committee some account of the bulk of the crops grown there?—Yes. On the Crown Terrace, at an altitude of 1,800ft., they have grown wheat for several seasons, as much as 50 bushels to the acre. Oats they have grown—I hardly like to repeat the quantity to the acre, but, according to reports, as much as 100 bushels has been grown to the acre. The Crown Terrace is a flat piece of land, of a virgin soil. It has grown crops for a few years, but I do not think it will continue to do so unless fertilisers are added. But, coming to the district of Sowburn, Maniototo Plain, a digger there brought in water from the hills, and gave the land a good soak to start the crops. I never saw finer crops of wheat, oats, and barley than he produced. The elevation was about 1,000ft. These crops were grown on land that you would decidedly call 'light.' The soil consists principally of mica-schist, which, where it is decomposed, is well adapted for growing fruit. The finest fruit in Otago is grown up in the Clutha district.

"33. Mr. Whyte.] Can water be brought on to this land?—Yes; at the bases of the hills the farmer can take it in little streamlets from the snow-fed rivers. I might say that, in calculating the future capacity of the country, the question is not so much the nature of the soil as the amount of available water and the facilities for bringing it on to the land.

"34. Mr. Pyke.] There is a great deal of lime there?—Yes.

"35. There are what they call travertines there, which have the effect of an open-air hothouse upon growth?—Yes."

I think I have adduced a sufficient amount of evidence to show that this country is eminently suitable for settlement, and that at present it is undeveloped owing to the want of easy communication. The idea embodied in the first attempt—the Strath-Taieri and Clyde Railway Bill—the idea of using the land as a means of obtaining the construction of railways has never been abandoned. It will be in the memory of honourable members that two or three attempts have been made to use land for this purpose. In 1881 the Railways Construction and Land Act was passed, and the Otago Central Railway was included in the schedule as one of the railways to be made under that Act. There were, in all, five railways included in the schedule to the Act, which the Government were empowered to enter into contracts for within a certain limited time. But, as honourable members know, the only railway which has hitherto been constructed under the Act is the Wellington-Manawatu Railway. The reason for the limited application of that Act is not far to see. It is that the endowments authorised by that Act are not sufficient to induce capitalists to embark their money in such works. The endowments in land which the Government were empowered to give under that Act amounted to 30 per cent. on £5,000 a mile. The endowment which this Bill proposes is 33 per cent. on a sum slightly less than £6,000 a mile. But, as I shall show, the endowment given to the Wellington-Manawatu Railway Company was really much in excess of this 30 per cent. on £5,000 a mile, for the Council will remember that very expensive works had been begun in the neighbourhood of Wellington, amounting in cost to between £30,000 and £40,000; also that plant had been imported for that railway, and that the work and a portion of that plant were handed over to the Wellington-Manawatu Railway Company. And, in addition to that, they had power given to them to reclaim from the harbour thirty acres of land, which they did at scarcely any cost, by using earth from the tunnels for that purpose, and thereby they got a very valuable endowment. I find that this sum they got in excess added to the 30 per cent. contemplated by the Act amounted to just the same thing as the 33 per cent. on the slightly larger estimate per mile with which it is contemplated in this Bill to endow this railway. Thirty per cent. on £5,000 a mile is £1,500, and 33 per cent. on £6,000 is £1,980. The difference is £480. One hundred and eighty miles at £480 a mile amounts to £86,400; and I think honourable members will find, if they properly estimate the value of the works, the plant, and the reclamation given to the Wellington-Manawatu Railway, that the extra endowment would bring up the endowment to just the same as this Bill proposes for the Otago Central. As to the character of the Bill, as I have already said the Government is empowered by it to enter into a contract with a company, syndicate, firm, or person for the construction of the line, and to endow the company with a portion of the land developed by the railway. The amount of the endowment on the estimate of £850,000 will be £280,500—that is to say, 33 per cent. I should say that this endowment is to be selected from a distance of fifteen miles on each side of the railway, and the company is to have alternate blocks with the Government. The area within the fifteen-mile distance is declared by Mr. McKerrow to be 1,820,000 acres, and, deducting the portion of the land already sold and the reserves, it amounts to 1,650,000 acres. And if you estimate the lands given and which will be taken by the company at 15s. per acre, the endowment will consist of 374,000 acres, or about 22 per cent. of the Crown lands within the fifteen-mile limit. That will leave the Government 78 per cent. of the lands within the fifteen-mile limit; so that, by giving the company 22 per cent., the railway will give to the remaining 78 per cent. a far greater value than will bring it up to its original value before the railway was made. I think that is quite evident. The valuation of the land to form this endowment is to be made by the Surveyor-General on the side of the Government and by a person appointed by the company, and, in case of their disagreement, by an umpire. But the value of the land is not to be less than 10s. an acre. There is also this provision in the Bill: that the land is not to be sold in large blocks, or at the will of the company. It is to be sold in accordance with the land-laws of the colony at the date when it is sold. The mining lands are not to be granted, so that that industry is protected by one or two clauses which seem to me to anticipate every objection from that quarter. These are the principal points in the Bill. The remainder, and by far the larger part of the Bill, is almost a copy of the Midland Railway Bill, and relates to the method of issuing debentures by the company. I will point out that this Bill is exceedingly modest in its requirements. It is exceedingly restrained in its dealing with the land and with the general interests of the country; and all I can say is that, by means of it a company with sufficient capital can be induced to make this railway, we shall obtain a most useful and long-desired work at really no cost at all as far as we are concerned. The land itself is good, and only awaits the construction of this line for agriculture, horticulture, and very many industries, as well as the most important industry of mining, to be encouraged and developed. The people of the world will be permitted, by means of this line, to have access to some of the most beautiful scenery which the earth contains. There is one other point which I will just refer to, and that is the present depressed condition of the colony, a matter which is by no means to be lost sight of, considering that we are spending close on £70,000 a year for the employment of the otherwise unemployed. That of itself is a consideration. If this great work can be achieved by the means which I have attempted to detail to the Council, I am sure that all will agree that the work should be proceeded with. I move, That the Bill be read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND.—I wish to give my reasons briefly for voting for the second reading of this Bill. Of course I am already familiar, as I suppose most honourable members are, with the documents from which such copious extracts have been read by the honourable gentleman in moving the second reading of the Bill. If I had never looked at one of these documents I am bound to say that the honourable gentleman has so skilfully arranged his extracts, and has made out so good a case for the second reading of the Bill, that had I been in doubt which way to vote I should most decidedly have become a convert. Even allowing a considerable margin for enthusiasm in the description of the country through which this line is proposed to be taken, still there is no doubt that the report of the Commissioners describes a magnificent country—though they do not say all the land is of surpassing richness. They do not say it is all fit for agriculture. I think what they tell us is much more promising than if they described a merely agricultural country. What is it that makes France such a rich country? She has a fine climate and a fine soil. This it is which makes France so rich: that she can grow such a diversity of crops. If one crop fails there is another to fall back upon. This it is which enables the small landed proprietors in France to pull through in all seasons, and under discouraging circumstances which would be the ruin of small landed proprietors in England, who rely upon a crop of one character only. The land in question will produce in abundance corn, fruit, and wool of superior quality. I am very glad indeed that it is proposed to carry another line into the interior of New Zealand. I wish we had more lines penetrating into the interior of the country. Owing to the manner in which the colony was settled the temptation has been too great to follow the level land and lay down railway-lines along the coast, competing with the steamboat traffic to the great injury of our coasting trade. Our railways seem to have done all the injury they possibly could do the coasting trade; and then, as if to give a lift to the coasting trade again, we spend hundreds of thousands upon harbours, to the injury of the railways we have constructed at such enormous cost. The rising generation of New Zealand has become so effeminate that it has no stomach to take a sea-voyage. People must get into a comfortable railway-train and be carried upon these easy-going lines over level country along the coast. Of course we shall hear the usual cry, that it is a bad bargain for the colony. We heard the same cry the other day about the Midland Railway. It was said that the colony was going to give away too much valuable land, although it sometimes suits the book of these gentlemen to denounce the land as perfect rubbish, which will ruin any company that has anything to do with it. Now, I have no doubt we shall be told that all this valuable land is to be given away to an outsider, and that nothing is to be left to the colony. But the same thing was said in regard to the Wellington-Manawatu line. It was then said, "What a bad bargain it will be for the colony! what a lot of money these people will make in selling the land!" Let them make money. I wish they may make money. Theirs is the enterprise, and theirs ought to be the profit. But for every pound they make will not the colony be richer by many pounds? The plutocrats of the colony will not like this. This is not their idea of settling the country. Their idea of settling the country is shutting up country and dividing it into sheep- and cattle-runs. New Zealand must have a large accession to her population and capital before long, or it will be in a very bad state. This, in my opinion, will bring an accession of both population and capital. Therefore I hail the appearance of this Bill with very great satisfaction. It will not tempt the settlers of New Zealand to embark their capital in the railway, because, unfortunately, we are too poor to embark money in it, and the interest likely to be returned is not sufficient temptation to us. That interest, although it is small, may be sufficient to tempt persons in England to embark their money in it; and let them, by all means, do so. The proportion of land to be given I consider is very moderate. I would give away every acre we have got to persons who are capable and willing to occupy and cultivate it. I would not look to the land as a source of profit at all. I know some people think that we ought to keep an enormous reserve of land. I have heard it said that if we go on parting with our land we shall be the less able to raise loans on the London market, and that the land ought to remain as security for the foreign bondholders. Nonsense! The best security for the foreign bondholders is the progress and improvement of the colony. Every man who comes out here with money and settles on the land and increases the amount of our exports adds to the security of the colony. If we had not an acre of waste land left, yet, so long as we were an industrious people, so long as our exports were progressing satisfactorily, we should have the best security to offer to the foreign bondholders. Depend upon it the people in England do not inquire how much land we have in New Zealand as security. They turn to our exports and ask, "Are their exports on the increase? Are the people of New Zealand industrious?" Those are the questions which are more likely to be asked. The honourable gentleman has dealt so thoroughly with the matter that he has left nothing further for any one to say in praise of the Bill. He made out, in my opinion, a very good case for it; and I think it will be of very great benefit to this colony if this Bill is allowed to be read a second time and to become law during the present session. I shall have very much pleasure in voting for it.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—I am not one of the great sheep-farmers, but I am one who at all times take an interest in what comes before this Chamber. As regards the private railways constructed under either the District Railways Act or the Railways Construction or other Acts, I have always recorded my vote according to my conscience. The honourable gentleman who moved the second reading of this Bill ought to be complimented on the very able manner in which he discharged that duty. No doubt he has taken a great deal of trouble to make himself thoroughly acquainted with what he was laying before the Council. The promoter of the Bill also ought to be congratulated; for I sincerely believe that it is one of his most earnest desires to see this railway carried out. He has worked for a number of years in that direction, and at last he has succeeded in carrying the Bill through the other Chamber. Before going any further, I would ask those honourable gentlemen representing the Government in this Chamber whether they are supporting this measure or not, and I shall wait for an answer. There does not seem to be any answer. I will therefore give my reasons for asking the question. I have asked a simple question, and I expected to get an answer. It seems to me that the Government did give permission for this Bill to be introduced, because no measure of this nature can be introduced without the sanction of the Government. Any Bill dealing with the lands of the colony must have the sanction of the Government. Hence, I presume the Government has given its sanction for the introduction of this Bill. It appears that the Government intended to support this Bill, because they set aside a day for discussing the measure in the other Chamber. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the Government are in favour of passing the Bill. As far as I am concerned, I have only a few words to say. I would not have spoken so early, or have assigned any reason for the action I intend to take, if it had not been that I intend to go south, and I do not wish to give a silent vote on this matter. Therefore I intend to say a few words on the subject. The honourable gentleman who introduced this Bill, as I said before, deserves great credit. He made the district appear almost a Garden of Eden, and showed that everything good and beautiful is to be found in it. I am very happy to hear it. I know a contractor, on whose word I can depend; he is a close neighbour of mine, and has had a contract upon this very line; and I am bound to take his word, because I have no cause to think that what he stated was not the truth. He told me that it was one of the worst lines ever undertaken by the colony, and one which would never pay.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—That is true, as far as the line has been already constructed.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—Then we go a little further. If the line will not pay for the first forty miles, I should like to know how it is going to pay beyond that point. We are told by the honourable gentleman who introduced this Bill that it is intended to take the railway up to Lake Wanaka. I suppose the honourable gentleman knows very well that there is already constructed a railway which can take passengers up to Queenstown, in the Lake District; and the construction of another line will, in my opinion, be a waste of public money, even though it should be proved that anything would hereafter be returned to the Crown for the outlay. We are then told by the honourable gentleman that it will not cost the colony a penny. If it will not cost the colony a penny, I suppose land is to be picked up for nothing; if so, I cannot understand how people find such difficulty in getting hold of it. I ask the Government, as I have already done, whether they are going to support this Bill or not. I have also said that they have given the promoter cause and reason to believe that they would support it. I suppose they have an object in view; and I may say that, if I am not divulging secrets—though I did not think it was a secret—I was told in the lobby, within a few hours after the passing of the Bill in the other Chamber, that the Bill was a bad Bill and that the Bill ought to be rejected; and I, not wanting to participate in any further information, or to listen to what my informant wished to say, told him that I declined to be present any longer, and left him. But he told me that the gentleman who told him this was a Minister of the Crown, who had said that the Bill was bad, inasmuch as it was not constructed on the lines of the District Railways Act or the Railways Construction Act, but on the lines of the Midland Railway Act. If this is so, why do not the Government try to drop the Bill and effect an alteration in accordance with their views? But there is more behind this. The Government wanted to remove the responsibility of the shoulders of the other Chamber and place it on the shoulders of the Council. I say such conduct as this is very reprehensible. In my opinion, as far as the line is concerned, it will never pay; and the giving land to a company for the purpose of constructing the line will have the effect of leading us deeper and deeper into trouble, the same as was caused by the Midland Railway Act. In my opinion we ought to try and stop new constructions of this character. If the line is likely to pay, then by all means let the Government carry out the work; and if it is not good enough for the Government it cannot be good enough for the company, who, if they undertake the work, will be ultimately coming to Parliament and asking for compensation. I therefore intend to oppose the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—My honourable friend who has introduced this Bill has done so in such flowing language—taking this language from the celebrated Commission—and has read the extracts from the Commissioners' report in such a way that I began to think that I knew very little of the country through which the railway would pass, although I have been over it over and over again.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—So have I.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—Sir, my honourable friend has put forward in glowing terms the great bargain the colony is to make by handing these tracts of land over to a syndicate. Now, what is a syndicate? A syndicate consists of a few men clubbed together in order to get money out of the ignorant people in England by a scheme out of which they hope to make a very large profit themselves. That is what a syndicate is. Syndicates have taken a very large amount out of our loans and our necessities. Syndicates, it appears to me, are going to make large amounts out of these railways now; and, whoever the poor unfortunates may be that embark in these undertakings, I have no doubt the syndicates will make money out of them. I believe, myself, in putting a thing fairly to the people, and making a bargain fair to both sides, and then standing or falling by the bargain. The honourable gentleman has read out of the Commissioners' report a number of extracts; but my honourable friend was once a Minister of the Crown, and one of the first steps the Government of which he was a member did when it came into office was to appoint a Commission to go over all these lines and see how far the Government would be justified in constructing certain railways through the colony. The Commissioners examined the Otago Central Railway-line, and in their report there is a list of railways which are "not recommended:" among them is the Otago Central Railway.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Yes; for construction by the colony.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—If it was not a good thing for the colony to construct, how could it be a good thing for any other body to undertake? I will just read this report of practical men. The report that has been read is the report of the interested people through whose lands the line is proposed to run. The report of the Commission I have referred to is as follows:—

"We are of opinion that the circumstances and requirements of the colony do not warrant the construction of this costly line of railway, for which the engineer's estimate is £1,100,000. But a very small proportion of the land through which the route has been surveyed is at all fit for agricultural purposes, and the population spread over the district is far too limited to afford encouragement for an expenditure so large as that proposed for this line.

"The works through the Taieri Gorge, a distance of over thirty miles, are of a very difficult and expensive nature, consisting to a great extent of a succession of curves through rock-cutting; and, as there is no access from the country on either side, this portion of the line must remain totally unproductive.

"When the necessity arises for a railway to tap that part of the interior of Otago which comprises the Maniototo Plains, the Ida Valley, the Dunstan District, and the Upper Clutha, careful surveys should be made with a view to find a cheaper and shorter route, and one which would pass through a smaller extent of unprofitable country. From the evidence brought before us upon this subject, we think special attention should be given to the survey of the country between Livingstone and Naseby, as a line by this route would shorten the communication between the interior and a port of shipment by many miles.

"We desire to express our regret that so much money has already been spent between Hindon and Mosgiel, as from our examination of the line we can come to no other conclusion than that it would be for the best interests of the colony to abandon it. The entire undertaking is, in our opinion, uncalled-for, and should not have been commenced."

An Hon. MEMBER.—Would you read the names of the Commissioners?

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—They were Messrs. Oswald Curtis, J. M. Clark, Edward Pearce, John Reid, and Edward G. Wright. Any one who had gone through this district and had seen the terrible country which the line has gone through would have hesitated before adopting this route. It ought to be a great attraction to tourists. I would point out, however, that there is another line, made up the Shag Valley, which could have been reached at the same point, the Taieri Lake, through to the Maniototo Plains. It has been stated that the money spent on this railway is £400,000, and I think that the line ought to be completed up to the Taieri Lake. But even the best friends of the railway admit that it will not pay more than working-expenses for some time. I shall be pleased if this turns out to be the case, and I think it is worth completing to the Taieri Lake, and I shall support the completion of the railway up to this point, seeing that the railway has been commenced. Now, Sir, I wish to ask why we should be requested to pass this Bill without submitting it to a Committee and without carefully examining the Bill. It is almost word for word a copy of the Midland Railway Act which has led the colony into such trouble—trouble that we are suffering from now, and which we do not know the end of. Negotiations are still going on. We passed amending resolutions, which are to be embodied in a Bill in reference to the Midland Railway. But I understand that even these are not considered satisfactory, although we have departed very much from the provisions of the Act, and given greater facilities to the people to carry on the line. And, when we are in trouble with another company, why should we take that Act as a pattern for this Bill? I am not prepared to go this length, much as it may be desired to get this railway made. With regard to the District Railways Act, it was introduced by the Government of which I was a member, and the responsibility for which I am prepared to accept. This Bill was introduced for the purpose of resisting a treble pressure that was brought to bear upon the Government for the construction of political railways. We introduced a Bill with what was thought were all the safeguards possible, and we thought we had effected the object we had in view. But what was the result of this measure and of the railways made under it? The colony has had to possess itself of them in order to get out of the trouble. Then there was the Railways Construction Act—an Act for which I am in no way responsible, and which I exerted every effort to defeat. But it was passed into law, and it is on the Statute Book now. The present Bill has been taken out of this Act word for word in regard to a number of sections; but that Act has safeguards which do not appear in this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—What safeguards?

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I could give a list of them. But why not accept the Bill under which the Manawatu Railway was made?—a railway that has good prospects before it. The company have got bush lands for sale, and they have about 40,000 acres of valuable swamp lands, which, I believe, will only be valuable as a whole when a great deal of money has been spent on it in order to make it valuable. No doubt when this money is spent it will be a magnificent property; but the company will have to spend the money in order to attain that object. Now, the Railways Construction Act was carefully thought out and debated; and why should we not construct the present railway under this Act? Or why not allow the land—which is good grazing-land—through which the line would run to be sold for the purpose of making the railway?—and then the railway could belong to the Government. Certain County Councils have offered to make the line and hand it over to the Government on certain conditions. But I say that, when we are going into the London market to borrow for the colony, it will look bad to go there at the same time to ask a syndicate to make our railways. It would look as if we were having a scramble for railways under the land-grant system. It has been stated that an arrangement will be entered into with a company, and I would suggest that the company might take the railway already made and pay the colony for it. Then they would be allowed to make what they could out of it. With regard to what has been stated about the land in the neighbourhood of St. Bathans, and the difficulty of getting the grain to market, I may state that the chaff grown there is sold at £6 per ton, while chaff is sold at £2 5s. in Dunedin: this is a strange contrast. I was part owner of a place near there in which we used to grow oats for the use of the place. Some years we had a very good crop indeed, but several years our crop completely failed. It was high ground, and the crops were very uncertain. But I will say that a part of the ground in the high country grows particularly good root crops; and at Dunstan and down the Clutha Valley they grow fruit of all sorts of a remarkably excellent description. I was sorry to see the introduction of the ten-shilling clause in this Bill. This clause was inserted by us in our wisdom in the Midland Railway Bill. How did we come to put in this ten-shilling clause? We did it for the purpose of protecting ourselves; but, instead, it has been turned against us. It has been construed to mean that we actually pledge the colony to give a bonus of a million and a quarter to the Midland Railway Company; and now we are taking this clause and inserting it in the present Bill. What I objected to in connection with the Midland Railway contract when it came before us was the circumstance that it emphasized the fact that the company were entitled to this bonus of a million and a quarter. The trouble that has been caused by this matter is great, and we are not out of it yet. Let us therefore consider this matter carefully before we commit ourselves to anything of this sort in the future. If my honourable friend succeeds in passing this Bill I take it that he will be simply standing in the way of the Government constructing the line up to a point where it is thought desirable the Government should do so. I have no doubt that if the Bill passes the Legislature the £105,000 which is to be voted in connection with this line will not be spent. Let us have this money spent first; let us get the line made to Middelmarsh, the point where they are prepared to go, and then we will talk about the other portion of the line. My honourable friend told us that the land at Strath-Taieri is very good and valuable. That is quite true; but, unfortunately, it is all in the hands of private individuals; so that we shall certainly not gain anything from that. Land is at a great discount now, but it is not likely to continue so. I do not like the idea of throwing big blocks of land into the hands of people when we are trying to effect settlement of the land. My honourable friend also stated that this work would provide work for the unemployed; but how many would remain in the country if they could come into town and get 4s. 6d. a day? I think we should encourage a spirit of self-reliance among the settlers of the country—a spirit which is the bone and sinew of any country. I have seen some of the unemployed, when they get their money, go and drink it at the publichouse. They work in a day about as much as a good man could do in a quarter of an hour. I have stood and looked at them at work in Dunedin. There are, however, some amongst the unemployed for whom one's heart beats in sympathy—men who have families and are suffering from adversity. The country ought to make its people self-reliant, and they ought to go into the country and settle down. If they have their piece of land there is not much need for them to buy much, for they can grow all they require for their sustenance. Farming is in a bad state in the colony at the present time. New Zealand, however, is not down yet. New Zealand will come to the surface. Its climate, resources, and other advantages will make the place good yet, and we shall not be disappointed. I do not wish to detract from the railway. I do not wish to prevent any one voting for it who desires to vote for it. I have never spoken to any one with the view of his not voting for it; but I like to see a thing placed fairly and properly in all its bearings before the Council. Then honourable members may take their own way and vote as they deem proper. However, if honourable members vote against this proposal I think they will do what is right, for it will mean holding over the matter for proper inquiry until next session of Parliament, at all events. It is a matter which should be still further thought over before we go into it. If you start railways under land-grants there will be a large number of railways to come; and I feel myself that, if this Bill is got through, and the railway is put into the hands of a syndicate, it will be hung up as has been done before. These people have had to be paid money in order to get rid of them. I believe, myself, that if these people who are wishing for this railway keep this Bill forward, it is the right way to prevent their getting the railway for some time. I therefore believe, myself, that we should get the Government to make the railway, as funds have been provided for it as far as Middlesmarch; and then we should consider how we are going to make the rest of the line. My opinion is that, rather than hand over the line to a syndicate, we should set aside the land for the railway. If it is not good agricultural land it is good grazing country. At all events, it is well worth 15s. an acre. As my honourable friend has stated, it ought to average pretty well that. If we set that land aside and sell it for the railway the line need not be a large charge on the colony, and the colony will then itself possess the railway. If the line paid working expenses without interest it would do a great deal of good in opening up the country, and the colony would then be possessed of the line, and could use it along with the other railways.

Debate adjourned.

FIRST READINGS.

Native Land Court Bill, Maori Real Estate Management Bill.

PORANGAHAU BLOCK.

The report of the Native Affairs Committee was brought up on the petition of Te Teira Tiakitai and eight others, stating that, as there seems to be a wide difference between the original judgment of the Native Land Court in the Porangahau Block and the judgment in the rehearing thereof, and after viewing the evidence which has been submitted, the Committee consider the application for a further rehearing a reasonable one, and recommend that it should be granted; and the Committee further strongly recommend that rules should be laid down by the Native Land Court for the guidance of the Judges of that Court in respect to Native custom and usage.

On the motion, That the report be referred to the Government,

MR. HUTCHISON said this was a matter of considerable importance, and if the House would give the subject some consideration it would be seen that the recommendation of the Committee was one which would have a most mischievous effect especially on the Maori mind, which was always responsive to anything in the shape of facilities for litigation. The facts of the case were, briefly, as follow: Certain Natives preferred a claim to a block of land known as Porangahau. Their claims were heard before a Judge and an assessor. The judgment was not acquiesced in, and the various parties made application for a rehearing, which was granted. The rehearing came on before two Judges and an assessor. On this occasion the judgment of the Court upset that of the previous Court; and now an application was made by petition to the Legislature that the case might be again reheard. It would be known to honourable members that there was no right under the law to a second rehearing; and if this application for a further rehearing were granted it would open up an important aspect in the matter of Native claims to land. It seemed more than doubtful to him if the Committee could recommend compliance with such a petition as this, unless, indeed, corruption or partiality were alleged—charges which had no place whatever in this petition, the ground of the application simply being that there was a difference of opinion among the Judges. The practice of former Native Affairs Committees appeared to have been in agreeable contrast with the action of the present Committee. He found that in the session of 1885 there were twenty-two petitions presented to the Legislature for rehearsings, which the Committee dealt with in one report by stating that they did not see their way to adjudicating upon rehearing cases which had already been dealt with by a Court of law; and in the session of last year there were a number of petitions praying for rehearing, and the Committee invariably reported as to these that the subject was then before the House in the shape of a Bill,—which had since passed into law as the Native Land Court Act,—and they did not deem it necessary to make a report. That Act provided that judgments on rehearing should be final and conclusive; and he apprehended that to open the door, as this report would do, to petitioners to unsettle judgments which by that Act were to be final and conclusive was to circulate invitations to Natives all over the country to revive claims that should be considered finally settled. It might be that the Natives ought to have some other recourse than that provided for by one rehearing; but, if so, it ought to be provided for by Act, and be applicable to all Natives, and not merely to individual cases, at the will of a Committee which was in no sense a judicial body. In this particular instance there was reason for concluding that it was not judicial in its action. The petition was promoted by the honourable member for Napier, whose attendance at the Committee was limited to the consideration of this particular case.

MR. KELLY.—No.

MR. HUTCHISON said he had searched the minutes, and such was the conclusion he had arrived at; but if he were mistaken he would be glad to withdraw the remark. However, the honourable member for Napier was careful to attend the meetings of the Committee while this petition was being considered, and he might say that the honourable gentleman was mainly responsible for the recommendation of the Committee. The amendment would be that the report should be referred back to the Committee for reconsideration, for he thought it was quite clear that the Government should not encourage an application for a rehearing in any particular case. It might be proper for the Government to consider whether it was right that more than one rehearing should be granted in all cases if desired; but it would be a very vicious principle to establish that a rehearing might be obtained in particular cases, especially when the ground for the application was merely that there was a difference of opinion among the Judges.

Mr. KELLY, as Chairman of the Native Affairs Committee, thought it right to say that the honourable member for Waitotara had not put the matter fairly before the House. He had stated that the honourable member for Napier was present only at those meetings of the Committee at which this petition was heard; but he (Mr. Kelly) could say that the member for Napier was present certainly on one or two occasions before this petition was heard; while, on the other hand, he knew that the honourable member for Waitotara was not present during the whole of the time that this inquiry was going on. As the honourable gentleman said the Committee had no right to make such a report and the Government had no power to grant a further rehearing, he did not see the necessity for the honourable gentleman occupying the time of the House in connection with this matter. He hoped the House would not send the report back to the Committee; because the Committee had taken the evidence of the Chief Judge, Mr. Lewis, Judge Mackay, and others. A great deal of evidence had been taken—which, in view of the importance of the matter, he intended to ask the House to allow to be printed—and he did not see how the Committee could come to any other conclusion than that at which they had arrived. The Committee had reported in a similar manner upon another petition, in reference to a block of land on the East Coast known as "Waipiro." This block of land was a very valuable one, and the conclusion at which the Committee had arrived was, in his opinion, a just and right one. The Judge who first heard the case and gave a decision upon it had been connected with Native affairs in the North Island for a great number of years, and he had given judgment for certain Natives to the extent of 2,500 acres; whilst the other Judge gave a decision against the parties who got the judgment for 2,500 acres, and gave the whole block of 42,500 acres to the other party, the latter Judge being a gentleman who had little or no knowledge of Native matters in the North Island. The decisions of the two Judges were entirely opposite, and he thought that justice could not be done unless there was a rehearing; and the Committee thought that, in a matter of this sort, the Government should see that justice was done.

Mr. ORMOND said the honourable member who had moved the amendment had chosen to refer to him by name in connection with this matter, and he would like to say that the reason he took an especial interest in the petition was that, being resident in the district where the case was heard, he thought it was a most extraordinary judgment, and he took interest enough in the matter to go to the Committee and hear what took place, and he was one of the majority who reported that, in their opinion, this was a proper case in which to grant a rehearing. That was the whole of his connection with the petition. The case was a very important one to the Native people, and he demurred entirely to, and hoped the House would not agree to, the doctrine started by the honourable member for Waitotara, that the Natives should have no right to petition the House for redress for their grievances when they considered that a wrong had been done to them. That would be the effect of following out the line of argument adopted by the honourable member—that, because a rehearing had been once granted to them, the Natives should have no right to come to the House and ask for relief for a wrong done to them. He held that the Natives had a right to come here, and that the House had a perfect right to consider their case if the facts were shown to justify it. The petition was inquired into by a full meeting of the Native Affairs Committee, and the division showed that six were in favour of this report and two against, the honourable member for Waitotara being one of the dissentients. The Chairman was also present, and made up the number to nine, but he did not vote. The case was a very important one. The block of land in dispute was of very great value, being some forty or fifty thousand acres in extent. The first judgment—given by Judge Mair, whose acquaintance with Native custom was well known—was in favour of the petitioners to a certain extent; but the judgment of that Court was superseded by that of a Court presided over by a gentleman whose sphere of duty had been in the South Island, and who was not so well acquainted with the Native custom in the North Island. The judgment of the first Court was overruled on this ground: that mana could not be permitted in connection with such a claim, that being the ground on which the claim had been allowed by the first Court. The House would see that there was something to be said against this valuable land, worth, he should say, £150,000, finally being dealt with by Judges of the Native Land Court. The whole question rested on their own individual opinion of what was the Native custom, and what the Native customs would allow them to consider right. The Committee had the Judge who gave the judgment and also the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court before it, and it came out in the inquiry that the gentleman who was the presiding Judge at the rehearing was of opinion that the Native Land Court had not, in its past experience, given to this mana any weight, whereas the Chief Judge, when asked immediately afterwards what had been the practice of the Court, said there had been very few judgments given by it in which this mana had not been a leading principle in the adoption of the judgment. There was this peculiarity in the case: that a large property was deliberately taken away by the judgment of the Court, acting on an entirely different principle from what had influenced the Courts in dealing with Maori lands in the past, and the judgment was in an entirely different direction from that which the Court had formerly given. Attached to the report of the Committee was a strong recommendation to the Government that they should take steps to insure in the future that there should be laid down some rules by which Judges could be guided; and he thought that nothing could more clearly show to the House the necessity of having rules for the guidance of Judges than the dealing with this particular case. It seemed a monstrous thing that, by the judgment of one or two men, they were able to do away with rights in a large property like this simply on a matter of opinion, and that opinion opposed, as it had been in this case, to the general judgment which had guided the Courts in all cases before. He had given a very brief outline of the case, and had shown by the evidence of the Chief Judge that he was of opinion that the question of mana was one which had been recognized as something that ought to guide the Courts, whereas the Judge who had given judgment in this case was of opinion that it was not. In this respect alone he thought the Natives had a grievance, and that it was a proper thing for the House to agree with the report of the Committee. The Committee was strongly of the opinion expressed, and so were a majority of the Native members present. He did not think the House should take this very unusual course of referring the report back to the Committee.

Major JACKSON said, if he understood the remarks of the member for Waitotara correctly, they indicated his belief that the honourable member for Napier was personally interested in this matter. All he (Major Jackson) could say was that he had never heard of the petition until it came before the Committee, and, so far as he knew, he had never spoken to any one of the petitioners. That being so, he hoped the same charge would not be laid against him; and he might say this case had been very fairly considered, and, according to the evidence, no other conclusion could be arrived at than that which the honourable member for Napier stated had been come to by the substantial majority of three to one without the Chairman voting, who was also in sympathy with this report. It was correctly stated that these people had no appeal from the second rehearing. If they had had that right of appeal the House would not now have been troubled with their case. It was because the law did not permit them to appeal, and they felt aggrieved, that they applied to Parliament for redress, and he thought the House should grant them the necessary relief. It was said very great interests were at stake; but the fact that the interests were large had not weighed with him. What had impressed him was not the magnitude of the interests, but the claim for justice and relief being a just and reasonable one. This judgment was given, in the first instance, by one Judge, and afterwards reversed on similar evidence by another Judge: that was to say, one Judge interpreted the mana custom one way and another Judge another way. If it were possible that Judges could do that, then it would depend to a great degree upon who was the particular Judge that heard the case as to who should inherit the land. He thought, with the honourable member for Napier, that it was highly necessary there should be laid down by authority some general direction regarding Maori customs within which judgments should be given. Judge Mackay, who reheard this case, stated that invariably his judgments were based upon who held the land at and prior to 1840, and that claimants must show they or their ancestors had a good title to the land at that date, since which, he held, it could not be amended. The petitioners in this case showed that their ancestor, about 1840, had sold land under the same mana they relied upon in this case, which sale had not in any way been questioned; and there was little doubt that, had those to whom the land was last awarded disputed this title of mana, they would have inherited a fate similar to that which befell the rods of the magicians who withstood Moses—they would have been also swallowed. He thought that a great many sales of land had taken place between 1840 and the time when the Native Land Court came into operation, and it would be found that they were the most satisfactory sales that had taken place. He did not know of a single instance where one had been disputed—that was, one conducted by the chief who held the mana, which, in this particular instance, had been ignored. He thought early Governments had done a great deal of harm when they systematically endeavoured to kill the mana of the chiefs, under which, instead of having each individual claimant to deal with, they had only to arrange with one. When the land was sold in this way there was no dispute about it. That these people did sell the land under a similar tenure there was no doubt; but the trouble was that the Judge ignored the question of mana in his judgment, whereas the Chief Judge told them that this was the only instance he remembered where mana had not been recognised when established.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Major JACKSON said his memory might be bad, but that was certainly his impression; but, at any rate, he did say that in a very great many other instances it had been recognised. These people ought to be able to get redress, and he hoped the House would adopt the report of the Committee, and that the Government would give effect to it.

Mr. TAIPUA might say that the Native Affairs Committee had gone into this matter very thoroughly, and had considered the case in all its bearings. At the first hearing a certain portion of the land was awarded to the people on account of the mana; but the second judgment reversed the first one. It was on the ground that the hearings were diametrically opposed to each other that it was considered better to have another hearing. The Chief Judge of the Native Land Court was before the Committee. He (Mr. Taipua) asked him if he was not aware that another block dealt with by the Native Land Court had been awarded to Renata Kawepo on account of mana; and he said it had been, and also that other Courts were in the habit of awarding lands on account of mana. Mr. Mackay admitted that there was some force in mana, provided that it was accompanied by occupation of the land; but he said that he did not think that mana alone, without occupation, could have any effect. These were the reasons which induced the Committee to believe that a third hearing would be beneficial. He thought the House should consider that in any case where the interests were very large there should be two or three hearings if necessary. For this he thought a precedent had been established by the number of hearings in the case of Hauturu, or Little Barrier, which was only a small block. Seeing that so many hearings had been granted for that small and insignificant island, why should not three hearings be granted in the case of a much more valuable block? He had to express satisfaction with the conduct of the Native Affairs Committee, and with the way they had been in the habit, lately, of inquiring into Native grievances, and doing their best to redress them. He thought if they shut up the Native people from obtaining a rehearing it would probably lead to fighting amongst themselves. In the case of the Maungatutari Block, where the rehearing was refused, the Natives took up arms and built pas; and it was only by the persistent efforts of the chiefs that peace was maintained. He expressed his fullest sympathy with those Natives who took the consequences of coming to that House in their endeavours to seek redress. He could not understand the reason of the objection made by the honourable member for Waitotara. Surely he was not actuated by personal grounds. He (Mr. Taipua) hoped the House would uphold the report of the Native Affairs Committee. He thought it would be a very good thing for the Maoris if the Chief Judge himself heard the case for the third and last time. He had heard it stated that there was considerable dissatisfaction expressed with the judgment delivered by one of the Judges—namely, the Judge living at Taupo, who took part in this rehearing; and it would be remembered that he was only a novice, and the House might hear further complaints of the matter.

Mr. TAIWHANGA said this was a cause of the Natives complaining all over New Zealand, and he thought that the Maoris therefore should have Maori Judges and lawyers instead of English Judges and lawyers, because the English Judges and lawyers did not know anything about Maori customs about lands from ancestors. He thought, from past experience, the whole of the chiefs in New Zealand would rather have a Court of their own. They had got a Bill before the House to the effect that, as they wished, their lands should be managed by chiefs and committees appointed by themselves. He hoped the honourable member for Waitotara would then have no complaint to raise against a rehearing.

Mr. CARROLL objected to the principle attempted to be laid down, that the Maoris should have no appeal from the decisions of the Native Land Court. If they had the right of appeal to the Supreme Court they would not perhaps trouble the House; and, as this was the only tribunal they could come to with their grievances, the House should not shut out from them an opportunity of getting redress. In a matter of £5 or £10 a European could get an appeal; and in a case where hundreds of thousands of pounds were involved why should not the Natives be allowed a thorough investigation of the matter? He knew something of this case. He refrained from reflecting in any way on the decision arrived at by the Judges, because he believed the decisions in both cases were arrived at in the full belief that they were doing what was right. He did not think any imputation should be cast on the action of the Judges. The honourable member for Waitotara said that, as a matter of principle, they should not review the decisions arrived at by the Native Land Court Judges. Then, why should the decision of the Committee of that House, carried by a pronounced majority, be reviewed?

Mr. MONK wished to express his assent to the remarks which had fallen from those who had spoken in support of the decision of the Committee. The honourable member for Waitotara referred to the evidence given before that Committee as being ex parte; but he omitted to mention that the complainant had before her the Judge who heard the case, and subjected him to a considerable cross-examination, and the result of that examination was decidedly in her favour. He would also mention another circumstance that had been overlooked, that she alluded to a transaction of her ancestor in 1840 in selling a piece of land the tenure of or right to which was identical with that to the block which was the subject of the petition. That piece of land was sold by that person, and the sale was not dissented from by any of the tribes then present, and had resulted in no difficulty or complication whatever; and there could not be a better proof of the right of that person to sell than a transaction of that kind. It was admitted by the Chief Judge, when giving evidence before the Committee, that any rights by the Natives in 1840 were recognised by the Native Land Courts at this time, and it was suggested that there was probably an error of judgment in the decision which took away from the plaintiff the rights which were acknowledged by the Maoris in 1840.

Dr. NEWMAN thought this case, with many others that came before the House, showed that the Native Minister should take the matter in hand and set up a real Court of Appeal, and not the sham thing there was here. There could be no question that these judgments were given haphazard. The original Judge declared that he could take mana into consideration, and the next two Judges did not. What happened? One set of people got the land in the first place, and another set later on. In this case the question was, whether a very large property was to go to one side or the other. He quite agreed with the honourable member for the Eastern Maori District that it was exceedingly hard that the Natives had such a poor Court of Appeal; and he thought if the Native Minister looked into the matter he could arrange for a large Court of Appeal by all the Judges sitting together. At present it was a mere fluke as to the party in whose favour the judgment might be. His knowledge of this case told him that these Natives had a considerable claim. Their ancestors were chiefs, and had mana and the right to this land. On all grounds of fairness and equity these people ought to have an appeal. It was a question of justice and right, and he hoped the House would not agree with the honourable member for Waitotara, but would give these people a further hearing.

Mr. MITCHELSON hoped the House would not agree to refer this report back to the Committee. The Committee had taken considerable trouble in the matter, and no doubt were convinced that a rehearing of the case was, in the interests of justice, necessary before they decided upon bringing up their report; and he understood the Chief Judge concurred in their report. He (Mr. Mitchelson) thought a rehearing of the case necessary, as hitherto in the North Island the rights of mana had always been recognised by the Native Land Court Judges when adjudicating upon Native lands, and as the judgment given by Judge Mackay had reversed the previous judgment, principally, as he (Mr. Mitchelson) understood, owing to Judge Mackay having ignored the question of mana. He thought it was only right that the report of the Committee should be adopted and a rehearing granted. He therefore hoped that the report would be agreed to by the House. As legislation would be required to give effect to the report, in the event of the Government agreeing to it another opportunity would be given honourable members to discuss the question.

Mr. T. THOMPSON submitted that the honourable gentleman who moved the amendment had not adduced any grounds to warrant the sending-back of this report to the Committee. That honourable gentleman's remarks went in the direction of showing that it would be illegal to grant this rehearing. The Committee, to his (Mr. Thompson's) mind, had a perfect right to bring up the report they had done, and if there was anything illegal in the proceedings it would be for the Government to consider whether it was wise to carry out the recommendation. He felt that it would be a grievance for the report to be sent back to the Committee, after the whole matter had been gone into. The honourable member for Waitotara had failed to show that the matter had not been fully gone into, or that the evidence adduced had not received full consideration. Had he done that, he (Mr. Thompson) would have supported him; but, under the circumstances, he would vote against the report being sent back to the Committee.

Sir G. GREY said that what he understood was this: that the simple request was, not that the rehearing should be refused, but that the report should be referred back to the Committee. That certainly appeared to him to be a reasonable request. If it was a request to set aside what the Committee had done, he might have formed another opinion about it; but it was a very fair request to make, that the report should be referred back to the Committee, and he did not see why it should be refused.

Mr. FISH did not wish to go into the merits of the case, but he wished to demur to the extraordinary doctrine laid down by the honourable member for Napier, which was to this effect: that two Judges were capable of giving a very much worse decision than one. It would appear that this case was heard by one Judge and a decision given in a certain direction. It was then heard, he understood, by two Judges, and they differed from the one. Under ordinary circumstances he should be inclined to believe that the two were right, and that the first Judge was wrong; but there might be something peculiar about Maoris which reversed the ordinary ideas of justice. The honourable member for Napier backed up his extraordinary statement by saying that the two Judges who presided in the second trial did not understand about mana. He (Mr. Fish) presumed both sets of Judges had some law to go by, and had to interpret the law as they found it; and that made him believe that the two Judges must be more correct than the first Judge. The request made by the honourable member for Waitotara did not seem to be an extraordinary one. It was a very common-sense one. What the Committee sought to do was to ask the Government to override the law.

Mr. LEVESTAM did not know anything of the case, but the Committee had recommended a rehearing. It appeared to him that the honourable member for Waitotara was perfectly right in objecting to it, because, according to clause 75 of the Native Land Court Act of 1876, they had power to apply for a rehearing, and, if they got it, that was final. Therefore this recommendation for a rehearing was entirely opposed to the law, and the Committee had no right to make it.

Mr. HUTCHISON was afraid that his attempt in the first instance to save the time of the House by dealing shortly with this matter had failed, because every honourable member who had spoken had entirely misapprehended the position he (Mr. Hutchison) had taken up, and one after the other had gone into the merits of the question. He had himself refrained from discussing the merits of the matter, as being improper here, however much that might be in place in the Native Affairs Committee. It was certainly not right to canvass the opinions of the Judges of the Native Land Court or any other Court, and his opinion was that, as provided by the Act passed last year, the judgment on rehearing should be final and conclusive. The House ought either to make a general rule, so that all Natives who were dissatisfied with a rehearing should have a further opportunity of appeal, or should adhere to the law. If there was to be any Court to which appeals could be made, let it be a Court of law and equity, and not such a tribunal as a parliamentary Committee, which was liable to bias through political influence. His position was this: that a recommendation such as that brought down to-day was futile in itself, because the House, unless it passed another Act, had not any power to grant a rehearing. The tendency of the recommendation was pernicious, because it would unsettle the Native mind and induce petitions of this kind to be sent to the House. He knew nothing of the case itself, or of the parties interested; and he had refrained from discussing anything which had come out before the Committee; and to him it was incredible that the Native Minister should get up and say that a rehearing would be granted. How was it to be granted? By a fiat of the Native Land Court, by some Order in Council such as they had lately seen superseding legislation, or was it to be by an Act of Parliament? If further facilities for litigation were to be given, he trusted that a measure would be brought down which would have general scope, and would not be confined to any particular case. It had been said that he was not present at the whole of the investigation into this case. That might be so; but, still, if absent, he did not see that there was any reason why he should not move this amendment, because the motion of the Chairman of the Committee sought to identify the whole of the members of the House with the recommendation of the report. His view was entirely based on the document itself. The report said, "As there seems to be a wide difference between the original judgment of the Native Land Court in the Porangahau Block and its judgment on the rehearing, . . ." Now, was it inscrutable or unusual that the judgment of a Court on a rehearing should reverse that of the original Court? And yet that was the first ground for recommending that there should be a rehearing. Then, the report went on to say, "and after reviewing the evidence which has been submitted;" the only evidence being that of one of the litigants—a mere ex parte statement. On these two grounds only was the recommendation made that there should be a rehearing—a most vain and impotent conclusion to weak and misleading premisses.

Mr. KELLY said the honourable gentleman had not adduced a single argument why the report should be sent back to the Committee. He distinctly stated that the Committee had not power to make this recommendation, and that the Government had no power to grant a rehearing, and that it would be necessary to pass a law to enable that to be done. If that was the case, the measure would have to come before the House; so that the honourable gentleman would then have a full opportunity of discussing the whole question. To send the report back to the Committee was most absurd, because they had taken all the evidence they possibly could, and had merely brought up a report recommending that a rehearing should be granted.

Captain RUSSELL said this discussion, at all events, pointed to this moral: that Native-land legislation should be placed on a proper footing as soon as possible. There could be no doubt that these constantly-recurring difficulties in settling Native customs should be set at rest soon. Unfortunately, the process of time was removing those gentlemen who were acquainted with Maori custom, and the attempt of the Government to assimilate Native custom with English law led to nothing but confusion. On more than one occasion he had urged on the House that every Native should, as soon as possible, be compelled to individualise his title; and until that was done there would be a constant recurrence of these Native difficulties. His sympathies went very much with the honourable member for Waitotara on this subject. There was no doubt that it did seem strange that the Court of Parliament should interfere with the ordinary tribunals of the country. Still, so far as he knew outside, there could be no doubt that substantial injustice had been done to these Natives, who for many years had considered themselves the owners of this block of land, and if injustice had been done the House ought not to be trammelled by the technicalities of law in doing justice. They should as soon as possible compel the Natives to individualise their titles and become owners of their own lands; and the proper way to do that, and to avert these dissensions, was to increase the number of Native Land Court Judges, and to place them in fixed positions, instead of being peripatetic as they now were, and,—having acquired a knowledge of Native title, say, in the North of Auckland,—being sent away down probably to the west coast of the South Island to investigate titles there. Each Judge should be fixed in a particular district, so as to investigate titles there, and become fully acquainted with the Native mana. If they were moved about from one part of the country to another it was impossible that justice could be done in Native-land matters. He hoped when Parliament met again they would have a common-sense Bill introduced, which would have for its basis increasing the number of Judges of the Native Land Court, and making compulsory individualisation of every block of Native land in the colony. He believed this could be done without great expense to the country, and with great advantage to the Maoris; and by that simple means they would do more to settle all this difficulty than by all the high-falutin' talk they had had upon the subject.

Mr. CARROLL wished to exonerate himself from the charge made by the honourable member for Waitotara, that honourable members had spoken on the merits of this question, for he had not done so.

Mr. BALLANCE said he was not present at the meeting of the Committee when this question was under consideration. He understood the honourable member for Waitotara desired to have the report sent back to the Committee in order that he might be able to adduce fresh evidence or reasons why the Committee should reverse its decision, and he could not understand why members of the Committee were so persistent in refusing to reconsider it. A large majority of the Committee appeared to be in favour of the report, and probably they would adhere to their decision, and for that very reason the Committee ought to be willing that the report should be referred back to them. In that case he presumed the Government would give effect to it by bringing down a special Bill. He thought the Native Minister was slightly premature in coming to the conclusion that this report was justifiable, for it led honourable members to suppose that he was prepared to legislate upon it, although it had not been considered by the Government. He admitted that it was dangerous to bring special cases like this before the Legislature, because it was well known that when political pressure was brought to bear they were specially noticed, whereas when there was no political influence the cases were passed over with the report from the Committee, "We have no report to make." There were cases which the Legislature ought certainly to take into consideration, and he was not in any way prejudging this one by saying that it was one of those cases. No doubt there was very great difficulty in settling which should be the final Court of Appeal; but the law provided that the Chief Judge could refer cases to two Judges of the Native Land Court, and their decision was to be final. If there was to be another Court of Appeal, as in the case of the Supreme Court, and that Court had to try every case, there would be no finality; and the result would be that the Court of Appeal would really be the Court of first instance to try these matters. He hoped his honourable friend the Chairman of the Committee would withdraw his objection, and that the petition would be sent back to the Committee, so that the honourable member for Waitotara could bring forward his special reasons why the Committee should come to a different conclusion.

Sir G. GREY differed from the last speaker. That honourable gentleman said that if they allowed these cases to go back to different Courts there would be no finality. He thought finality would come sooner than the honourable gentleman imagined, for it would arrive when the whole of the value of the property was swallowed up by the lawyers, and he knew that such was the litigious nature of the Natives that when they quarrelled about their land they would go on until that took place.

Mr. ORMOND would point out that the honourable member for Wanganui was under a misapprehension as to what the honourable member for Waitotara had said. The honourable gentleman did not pretend that he had any fresh evidence, but his contention was that it was a wrong procedure to grant in a particular case something which, if dealt with at all, should only be dealt with by general legislation. That was the honourable gentleman's position, as he (Mr. Ormond) understood. He, on the other hand, advocated that, where a grievance was shown to Parliament, and a Committee of Parliament recommended that it was worthy of consideration, it was then the duty of the Government to take an opportunity of redressing that grievance. If there was anything to send back to the Committee no member of the Committee would for a moment object; but there was nothing at all fresh to send back. As to the contention of the honourable member for Waitotara, when the Government took action on the report of the Committee would be the time for that honourable gentleman to take his course. There could be no practical result from sending the report back to the Committee, for the Committee had, after taking all the evidence, come to its decision by a very large majority, and there was absolutely nothing whatever new to go to the Committee.

Mr. TANNER said he would not have risen but for a remark by the late Native Minister, implying that political influence had been brought to bear in this question.

Mr. BALLANCE did not say there had been in this question. What he said was that very often in these cases political influences could be brought to bear.

Mr. TANNER said they could only treat this question on its merits, and, considering that it was a dispute between two separate bodies of Natives, he could not see where political influence could come in. The honourable member for Waitotara distinctly stated that he knew nothing of the circumstances of the case—he disclaimed all knowledge of it.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Other than what came before the Committee.

Mr. TANNER said, that being the case, it could scarcely be said, as was remarked by the honourable member for Wanganui, that the honourable member for Waitotara desired to bring forward some fresh evidence. The House had no knowledge of that; neither, apparently, had the honourable member for Waitotara. If the report were referred back to the Committee one could only presume, after what the Chairman and other members had said, that any fresh report would be merely a repetition of that now presented; and therefore what was the use of wasting time in referring it back?

Mr. SAMUEL agreed thoroughly with the honourable member for Thorndon that the sooner we had some definite system on which to decide issues relating to Native lands the better. The administration of the Native Land Court had become of very serious moment indeed in the country: its decisions were contradictory, and showed that there was an utter absence of any guiding principle in framing the decisions given. It was high time that the Legislature stepped in and established some tribunal to settle these questions on some fixed principles, and he hoped the Government would next session take steps in that direction. He inferred, from the remarks of the honourable member for Wanganui, that that honourable gentleman contended that whenever any member of the House was dissatisfied with the report of a Committee he should be entitled to have it referred back—he need not say that he had any fresh evidence to adduce, but he could have the reference back simply because he had statements to make—probably similar to those he had already made. Now, if there was to be any finality at all in the proceedings of Committees, he, for one, strongly objected to any such principle being recognised by the House. He did not think, unless it could be shown that there was fresh evidence to adduce, that a report should be referred back, as was now proposed.

Mr. FISH thought the strongest contention for reference back was, not that there was fresh evidence to adduce, but that the Committee had made a report recommending the Government to break the law. The law now was that when there had been an appeal and a rehearing the decision on the rehearing should be final. In this particular case that process had been gone through. If the Committee thought that the law was wrong, and it had been proved to them that it had caused an injustice in this case, they should have made a recommendation that the Government should get the law altered. Whether the amended law should be made applicable to this particular case or not would be another question. If they took the Committee's report literally as it was now placed before them, it was equal to advising the Government to pass a special Act for every special case not provided for by the existing law. That, certainly, was a course that very few honourable members would support. If the law relating to these cases was wrong, by all means let it be amended; but there must be some finality. In ordinary litigation finality was reached when a case was taken to the Privy Council and that tribunal gave its decision, and it appeared to him they must have some absolute finality in reference to litigation about Native lands. It appeared that the last Parliament passed a law to give that finality, and it was that which the Committee now desired to alter by recommending the Government to quietly break the law in some extraordinary way. That appeared to him to be the position. He did not know anything of the merits of the case, or anything about Native affairs, and therefore only spoke from a common-sense view of the matter.

Mr. TAIPUA wished to reply to the remarks of the honourable member for Wanganui, who favoured referring back the report. If it were referred back it should be referred only to those members of the Committee who had not attended while this case had been before the Committee, and there should be a new Chairman elected. If the matter were referred to those who had already dealt with it, they could only again come to the same determination. If the House insisted on the same members of the Committee dealing with the matter, the House should give them power to rehear the case and give judgment as to the land accordingly. Otherwise it would be quite futile to send the report back.

Mr. PARATA would not have risen had not this matter been brought so prominently before the House; but, that having been done, he would like to explain the part he took in it. He supported the honourable member for Waitotara so far as to agreeing that for all similar cases to this there should be some provision made. An exactly similar petition had been presented to the House referring to the Waipiro Block, and in that case the Committee made a similar report. He found no fault with the report, but he thought the application should be made general. It confirmed him in his opinion that a law should be passed dealing with all these questions. Many Natives were in the habit of coming to the House for relief, and the House was powerless to give it or to do anything in the matter, because there was no law by which they could do it.

Mr. CARROLL would ask permission, before the matter was decided, to present a petition in reference to this case. It was the petition of Henare Matua and others, praying for a rehearing regarding the subdivision of the Porangahau Block.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

Amendment negatived, and motion agreed to.

IMPORT DUTY ON COAL.

Mr. JOYCE asked the Government, if they have any knowledge of a formulated proposal of the New South Wales Legislature, now in session, to increase their import duties on New Zealand products, and that such a proposal is held in abeyance pending the issue of a motion, No. 30, on our Order Paper of this date, to the following effect: "That an import duty of not less than 2s. 6d. per ton be imposed on all coal imported into New Zealand from other countries;" and will the Government give the honourable member for Inangahua an early opportunity of either withdrawing the motion or having it discussed and finally settled? The House would remember what had taken place in regard to the motion of the honourable member for Inangahua. He did not know whether it was a coincidence or not, but the fact remained that there was a suggestion on the Order Paper of the Parliament of New South Wales to increase the duty upon our natural products, and it would be a very serious thing for New Zealand if such a thing were done. There was no doubt in his mind that the motion of the honourable member for Inangahua was calculated to have an irritating effect, and he would ask that the honourable gentleman should have an opportunity of withdrawing it.

Mr. FISHER said the Government were not aware of any proposal of the nature of that spoken of by the honourable member being before the Legislature of New South Wales, and therefore they had not taken the matter into consideration; but he might say that if the honourable member for Inangahua desired to withdraw his motion it would be very easy for him to do so.

CIVIL SERVANTS MEMBERS OF EDUCATION BOARDS, ETC.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Minister of Education, Whether there is any regulation prohibiting Civil servants from being members of Education Boards and School Committees; and, if no such regulation exists, will the Government make such a regulation at an early date?

Mr. FISHER said there were at present no such regulations, and the Government did not know that it was desirable to make any.

DEFERRED-PAYMENT SETTLERS.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Government,—(1.) Why deferred-payment settlers are sued for arrears of payment in one provincial district, and not sued in another? (2.) On whose authority are such distinctions made?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the Government was not aware of any instance of deferred-payment settlers being sued for rent; but it was not a matter to be dealt with by the department. The Waste Lands Boards had authority to deal with such matters.

ONEHUNGA WHARF CHARGES.

Mr. HAMLIN asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether he will give directions that the Government charges levied on the Onehunga wharf shall be in all instances assimilated to the charges levied on the Auckland wharf by the Harbour Board, in accordance with the promises made by his predecessor? He might state that in 1885 a Bill was introduced for the purpose of handing over the management of the Manukau Harbour to a Harbour Board, and, owing to the discussion that took place, a promise was made by the then Minister for Public Works that if the Bill were withdrawn the charges at the Onehunga wharf would be assimilated to those charged on the Auckland wharf. From time to time efforts had been made to have that promise carried into effect, but he was sorry to say that up to the present time they had not been successful, and hence this question was put on the Order Paper; and he trusted that the Minister, in his reply, would say that not only should the charges be assimilated, but that no new charges should be imposed; because charges were being imposed which had a detrimental effect upon the shipping of the port. He desired to read an extract from a letter which the honourable member for Manukau (Sir M. O'Rorke) had received from Mr. Jackson, a member of the Borough Council of Onehunga, dated the 25th November, on this subject, in which the writer said,—

"In the meantime I am asked to request you to bring to his [the Minister for Public Works] immediate attention a fresh charge which is just now being imposed, which will seriously affect persons engaged in shipping to the ports affected.

"This new charge is 1s. a ton measurement on all goods shipped to Raglan, Kawhia, Hokianga, and Waiuku, and other places within the harbour.

"The officials say that this export wharfage charge has hitherto been omitted through oversight; but, as it now comes in addition to all other wharf charges, it is extra-burdensome.

"I am told that the railway takes freight right through to Auckland at a rate very slightly in excess of the sum they impose for wharf charges on goods sent by road."

That, he thought, would be sufficient to prove that he had very good reasons for placing this question on the Order Paper, and he trusted that, in his reply, the Minister would indicate that he intended to carry out the promise made some two years ago. They were constantly having new charges placed upon them, and always, when anything was said, it was replied by the officials that this was an old charge, but, owing to an oversight, had not been made previously.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the promise of the late Minister for Public Works with respect to assimilating the charges levied at the wharf at Onehunga to those charged at Auckland had been carried out, with the exception of the tolls levied upon wagons, drays, and other vehicles, as at the time the promise was given tolls were levied upon vehicles at Auckland, and the Government did not see their way to make any alteration respecting the latter at present.

JURORS.

Mr. WARD asked the Government, Whether they will favourably consider increasing the rate of pay allowed to common jurors? Representations had been made to him which had induced him to put this question on the Order Paper. It appeared that the rate allowed at the present time was 3s. a day when jurors came from within a distance of seven miles; beyond that they got 4s., out of which they had to pay their expenses. And what he wished to point out was this: that in cases where tradesmen and artisans were summoned to leave their employment they sustained an actual loss. He hoped that the Government would see their way to remedy this, and not allow the financial difficulty now existing to prevent an equitable rate of pay being given in these cases.

Mr. FERGUS said the Government would take the matter into consideration, but did not at present see their way to doing anything in the direction indicated.

MARUIA-AMURI HORSE-TRACK.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will place the sum of £2,000 on the estimates for the purpose of constructing a horse-track from Maruia Plains to Amuri County via Cannibal Gorge? He might point out that already surveys of this road were in hand, and that, if it were proceeded with, it would bring the most important mining district in the colony—Reefton—into connection with a pastoral country. He trusted, therefore, that the honourable gentleman would see his way to grant the request.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the Government recognised the importance of completing this horse-track, and surveys were in progress; but he regretted that the funds at the disposal of the Government would not enable them to push it on this year.

MR. BADDELEY.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES asked the Minister of Justice, if the Mr. Baddeley now acting as Resident Magistrate in Auckland is the same Mr. Baddeley who recently retired on a pension?

Mr. FERGUS replied that the Mr. Baddeley who was now acting as Resident Magistrate in Auckland was the same Mr. Baddeley who, when he retired, would receive a pension.

NELSON ROADS.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Minister for Public Works,—(1.) If there is a clerical error in the public-works estimates, seeing that in "Class IV.—Roads," in the Nelson District, the liabilities on the 31st March, 1887, are set down as being £4,988, whilst the estimated total amount required to be authorised is only set down at £4,960? (2.) If not a clerical error, out of what fund does the Minister propose to pay the £28 required to meet the deficiency? In looking over the public-works estimates he found that in "Class IV.—Roads," in Nelson District, the liabilities were set down at £4,988, while the amount set down as needing to be authorised was £4,960. It seemed strange that an amount less than the liabilities should be authorised.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said this did appear to be a clerical error; and, as to the second part of the question, the £28 would be provided for from contingencies.

WEST COAST MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES asked the Postmaster-General,—(1.) If he will inform the House of the difference in present contract price for conveying mails from Springfield to west coast of Middle Island and the lowest tender submitted when tenders were last called for for such service? (2.) If he will state the amount of compensation claimed by present contractors for the above service in consequence of damage done to road by floods, &c.; and if he will state by whom the amount of such compensation was assessed, whether by the contractor or the Government? (3.) Will the postal authorities recognise similar claims in all other West Coast mail contracts? There had always been land-slips and flooded rivers on the West Coast; but he had never before heard of mail contractors receiving compensation from the Government. It appeared that in this case the contractors had received an extension of their contract. When tenders were called for, only about six weeks were allowed to tenderers to provide the whole of the expensive plant for the contract. He hoped the Postmaster-General would be able to give satisfactory answers, so that the people on the West Coast might know that there was nothing behind the scenes.

Major ATKINSON said, with regard to the first part of the question, he might say that the tenders were not opened. There were two opened by mistake; but he did not see them, and the remainder of the tenders were not opened. Therefore he was not able to answer that part of the question. The amount claimed was between £1,000 and £1,100. The Government thought there was probably a claim against the Government. On a former occasion, when the Government resisted a similar claim, it was brought before the House, the Committee reported that a sum of £1,700 should be given to the contractor, and that amount was paid. Therefore the Government thought it better to compromise this matter in the way it had done by extending the contract for one year at the present rate.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What rate?

Major ATKINSON was not quite certain, but thought it was about £1,200; but that could easily be ascertained. Any just claim, of course, they would have to recognise; but unjust claims they would not. He did not see how they could have escaped this one.

Mr. SEDDON asked if the lowest tender from Greymouth was not £1,600, while this contract was £1,300.

Major ATKINSON could not reply to that, because the tenders were, as he had stated, returned unopened.

SOUTH ISLAND PASTORAL RUNS.

On the motion of Major STEWARD, it was ordered, That a return be laid before this House of all pastoral runs in the South Island of which the licenses expire between January, 1888, and the 30th December, 1890, giving in detail the number of the run, the provincial district, the acreage, name of present occupier, and present rental paid.

LOAN BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Sir, the course I propose to take in resuming this debate is this: I shall principally discuss the questions raised by the Public Works Statement, and incidentally, in my remarks, I shall refer to some important questions which the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government raised last night in moving the second reading of the Loan Bill, and I shall, of course, make some remarks upon that Bill itself. The honourable member for Egmont raised some very important questions as to the duty of the Colonial Treasurer, as to the amount of money he had to pay in April, and as to the proposal for testing the public-works policy by votes in Committee of Supply. On all those points I shall touch later on. First, I have very great pleasure in offering to the Minister for Public Works my warm congratulations upon the Public Works Statement. As a Statement I think it is an exceedingly able one, very ingeniously pieced together; and,

Mr. R. H. J. Reeves

although I am not able to concur with it, yet I am none the less willing to do justice to the industry and ability with which the Statement has been produced. Especially, I think, the House is indebted to the honourable gentleman for the full tables which he has arranged in connection with the Statement, which certainly make very clear what his views are. I do not think that in the course of the discussion there will be much question as to the meaning of the honourable gentleman, whether or not we agree with that meaning. The great doubt I feel, speaking generally, as to the Statement is this: as to its being possible now, even had we a much longer time at our disposal, to discriminate and judge, to the minute extent the honourable gentleman proposes, what should be our policy and proceedings during the next three and a half years. And, Sir, there is this, besides, to be said of the Statement: that the proposals of the honourable member as regards public works and borrowing do not fit in with the financial policy, or any possible financial policy, as I shall make clear in the course of what I have to say. Now, Sir, I will go through briefly some of the most prominent points of the Statement. First, as regards the Helensville Railway Northwards, and as to the doubling of the line from Auckland to Penrose, and as to the line from Grahamstown to Te Aroha, I think the course which the honourable gentleman asks us to take in regard to those three lines, that we should definitely decide to even banish them from consideration for three and a half years, is too severe a measure. I believe, as far as I know, the honourable gentleman is wise in not making proposals for their extension at present; but as to saying what is to take place in the Grahamstown—Te Aroha district, in the North Auckland district, or in regard to the traffic in Auckland and the country with which it is connected—as to saying what may be necessary in regard to extending the railways long before three years and a half are over, it is nothing short of presumption on our part to commit ourselves to banishing these lines for that period. Especially I may say, with regard to the northern extension, I think it is a matter very much to be regretted that, at a time when there is an evident inclination to settle and colonise the land north of Auckland, such a check should be thrown upon it as is comprised in the banishment of the extension of this railway for so long a period. Now I come to a very important question, and that is the proposals in regard to the North Island Trunk line. Sir, I say that these proposals are the result of fear on the part of the honourable gentleman to deal definitely with the question—the fear of offending some Wellington members on the one hand, or of offending some Auckland members on the other. And I am of opinion that it is a question that ought to be settled, and, whether or not I may please the members whom I love so much representing Wellington or those whom I equally love in Auckland, I think it is at any rate my duty to express explicitly my views upon the subject. Now, the position is this: The line at the north end to Murimotu can be completed for £300,000. I have calculated minutely the cost, including engagements for the purchase of Native lands in relation to the southern part of the line, and the expenditure already undertaken, and I find that there will remain out of the million loan, above the cost of the completion of the line to Murimotu, the sum of £230,000. Two or three years ago it was my good fortune to meet with a gentleman of Taranaki—I think he was the Chairman of the county—an exceedingly able and intelligent man. He went with me into the whole question of connecting Taranaki with Auckland, and I came to the conclusion that, whether or not the railway was to be proceeded with from Marton to Te Awamutu, the connection between Taranaki and the main line to Auckland should be proceeded with. I made very exhaustive inquiries on the subject, and the result of those inquiries convinced me of this: that for £600,000 a communication could be made between Taranaki and a point on the main line south of Te Awamutu. I do not think that can be done from Stratford, nor do I think it is desirable that it should be done from Stratford. New Plymouth is an important city, and, in my opinion, the line should go through New Plymouth; and, as far as I can judge, the cheapest line would be one connecting Waitara with the main line; and that could be done for £600,000, the distance being seventy-five miles. I was in favour of the Marton route three years ago for several reasons, and especially because it was said it could be completed for a little over the million voted for the North Island Main Trunk line. Again, I thought that a fast line could not be obtained by Stratford, and I thought it would be well to make a rapid line from Wellington to Auckland. There were other reasons, to which I need not specially refer, but they were all in the direction that it was more desirable to proceed with the central route than with the Taranaki line. Now, upon all these points my views are modified. I find that if the line is carried through New Plymouth to Auckland certainly not more than half a million, I do not think more than £400,000, would be necessary to be raised in excess of the North Island Trunk Loan. I undertake to say that £400,000 in excess of the amount authorised already is very probably the amount that would be required to finish what has been done in the south, to take the line to Hunterville, to purchase the Native lands, and to carry the line through New Plymouth and Murimotu to Auckland. The Minister for Public Works tells us that £1,285,000 is required to complete the line from Marton to Te Awamutu, in addition to the million already authorised. Having travelled over that road myself, I have come to the conclusion that it would be well to make New Plymouth the halting-place, and in saying so I do justice to the town which has had the honour of politically educating the honourable gentleman now at the head of the Government. I think it would not be undesirable that the halting-place should be at New Plymouth, and then, Sir, we should have through communication between Wellington and Auckland. The line would not be so quick, certainly. I may say I have formed a strong opinion upon the subject from the fact of the very great traffic which now goes on from Wellington to Auckland by way of New Plymouth. I do not think any of us imagined, when that line was finished to New Plymouth, that many people would go by that road and take steamer from New Plymouth to the Manukau; but, as a fact, it is a very popular route, notwithstanding the drawback of having to land at the breakwater at New Plymouth; so that I think we may conclude that the main trunk route will be very popular if it go by that way. Then, I say the arguments in favour of opening up the line from New Plymouth to Auckland are irresistible. There are many reasons why it should be done, and there is perhaps none greater than the immense mineral value of the district between Mokau and Auckland. The streams running through that district uniformly show mineral wealth, including coal and valuable metals. Therefore I am strongly in favour of the line being taken by New Plymouth, and I should be prepared to support a resolution to the effect that the line shall not be taken further than Hunterville, and that all works beyond that shall be stopped. It is simply a waste of money to carry out the proposal of the Minister for Public Works; and, as I shall show further on, although the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government affects to leave to the House an opportunity of deciding on his proposals, he does nothing of the kind. These items will be considered in Committee of Supply, but a resolution of the House will be required if it is intended to determine that the route of the line shall be by way of New Plymouth. I will not only support that route, but I will support its being carried on quickly, because there is a large sum of money available now. A large sum has already been expended, and it is sheer wastefulness and extravagance to let these works stop, and lose interest on the money, instead of pushing them on as quickly as possible. Sir, I am one of those who believe that if communication be opened up between Wellington and Auckland by way of New Plymouth an immense impetus will be given to commerce, to traffic, and to the industries of this Island. As regards the proposal to complete the line between Palmerston and Woodville, that has my hearty approval. I should like to see it pushed on day and night as rapidly as possible. I am not of the same opinion with regard to the communication between Woodville and Masterton. I consider that the expenditure for that work might very well be extended over a longer period than is proposed. I am not, of course, able to judge of what engagements have been entered into, but it seems to me that the Minister for Public Works need not force on that work so rapidly, and that the expenditure on it might be extended over four years instead of two. As his proposals come down to us, although the expenditure up to September last was only £16,000, and although expenditure has been contracted from the commencement of the second half of the year, yet the honourable gentleman seems to think he has found a way for increasing the expenditure during that second half. In other words, he thinks that, while £16,000 has been expended on the line from March to September, he will contrive to spend £21,000 more up to the end of March next. I do not think he can do it, and the same remark applies to most of the expenditure which he has proposed for the current year. His proposal is to expend £37,000 up to March next, and £24,400 during the next year. I think this expenditure ought to be extended over three or four years, as the work is not of such a necessary character that it ought to be forced on. I recognise that it has to be done, because it is part of the schedule of the Loan Act; but I do not think there is any necessity for hurrying it. Now with regard to the railway between Greymouth and Hokitika: I contend it is a great mistake to delay the completion of that line. It is proposed to go on with that line during the next three years and a half, and yet to leave a gap between the two cities or towns, because of saving the sum of £70,000. That is a case of "penny-wise and pound-foolish," as the line will probably be a paying one. As regards Hokitika the proposal is particularly unjust. There has been a large expenditure on the Greymouth and Westport Harbours, but there has been none to speak of on the Hokitika Harbour during late years. It is therefore placed at a great disadvantage, and it is only just that it should be given communication with Greymouth, as a compensation for the expenditure on the northern harbours. Besides that, I hold that, as the southernmost town on the West Coast, it should not be left without communication with the other towns, as it will be under the proposals of the Government, which will still leave a gap of seven miles. With regard to the Southland railways, I would rather leave the Southland members to speak upon them, for I do not feel myself sufficiently able to judge as to whether or not the proposals of the Government are of a satisfactory character. As regards the Otago Central Railway, I consider the proposals are exceedingly unsatisfactory. The Government have virtually made a Government measure of the Otago Central Railway Bill. The line under that Bill is to commence from Middlemarch; but until the line is completed to Middlemarch the Bill which we passed the other day will, in my opinion, have no effect, or next to no effect. I am aware, in saying this, that I differ in opinion from the honourable gentleman whose name is particularly identified with the measure, the honourable member for the Dunstan, who thinks that the line can be commenced in both directions from Clyde. The honourable gentleman is clearly mistaken, and is evidently wanting in knowledge of how railways are always commenced. I do not believe that there is a single example to be found of a line commenced in the middle of the country, without communication by water or rail so as to bring up the necessary plant. The cost of bringing up material and rails and rolling-stock to a place right in the middle of the country which cannot be approached by water or rail will make the thing impossible. Therefore, in my opinion, until the line reaches Middlesmarch the making of the line beyond that point under the Bill which has passed this House cannot proceed; and I think it is a mistake to delay it. It is proposed that on this line £70,000 shall be spent the first year, £60,000 the next year, and £41,000 in the third year. In my opinion, that railway ought to be completed in the two years—that is, next year—to Middlesmarch. Another thing to be considered in relation to that is the way in which the land will be locked up by the Bill we have passed, and by the delay that will take place in the completion of the line to Middlesmarch. It will be observed that the amount involved is not a large one. The course I propose will simply mean making the £41,000 proposed for the third year payable during the second instead of during the third year. With regard to the statement made by the Minister for Public Works, that the open lines have yielded a net percentage of £2 6s., I do not consider that unsatisfactory, and I think that the honourable gentleman is under the mark in his statement that the services rendered to other departments by the railways amount to £35,000 annually in value: in my opinion, it might be put at a considerably larger sum. So that the railways as they now are do not at all show an unsatisfactory result as a whole. Now I come to the question of roads and bridges. My remarks on that head will be very few and very general, and I shall leave honourable members who have a larger knowledge of the subject to be more minute in their criticism. But I must say this: that the proposals which are made to regulate expenditure on roads and bridges for the next three years and a half are fallacious in the extreme, mere guesswork, a very prettily drawn-up plan like a Chinese puzzle, put together like mosaic-work; but I do not think that they can possibly be adhered to. I do not think that honourable members, who know how uncertain the progress of settlement is in the colony, can believe for a moment that the rate of expenditure on roads and bridges can be fixed so long in advance. We cannot tell at this time what will be the colony's urgent needs in the way of opening up the country at any given time during so long a period. The provision made for goldfields roads and goldfields contingencies is wholly inadequate. It amounts to a sum which may be very much less than may be required in a single year, if some new goldfield should be discovered requiring a very large expenditure to give access to it. Honourable members must recollect this: that not only is it asked that we should now decide the expenditure for the next three and a half years, but it is asked that we should fix it for that period, because it is in the mind of the honourable member at the head of the Government that there shall be no further borrowing for three years from March next; and therefore it is an attempt to fix our policy in this matter for the next three and a half years. I would also point out this: that we have a sort of hope held out to us that borrowing for these matters will be reduced; and to the extent that it is reduced the consolidated revenue is to be further handicapped, or the local bodies will be, in connection with roads and bridges, goldfields roads and bridges and goldfields contingencies, subsidies to local bodies, extension of telegraph-lines, public buildings, and things of that sort. Public buildings have been erected in the past somewhat lavishly, perhaps—not of late years, for I undertake to say that there are reasonable requirements in some parts of the country, more especially in country districts, for public buildings to a very large amount; and it is only the very strong inducement there is to be economical that enabled the late Government, and will enable the present Government, to say that these requirements shall not be met at an early date. And these public buildings also are to be put on the consolidated revenue: in short, it is proposed to very heavily handicap the consolidated revenue in the future. The provision that is stated as made for the "unemployed" is £30,000 for the present and following three years. I cannot trace that expenditure in the proposed works. No doubt the honourable gentleman has particular works in his mind to which he proposes to devote the money; but I cannot, myself, discover what the works are. But there is a great deal to be said about this "unemployed" question. I am quite aware that persons who do not love to work are apt to use agitations of the kind for the purpose of obtaining assistance. But it is preposterous to suppose that that is the general position, or to fail to recognise that as the colony becomes older the number of persons who will grow old and helpless will increase, as has been the case in the Australian Colonies. And I undertake to say that—although you may put your hands on a great many cases unworthy of assistance or recognition among those who implore employment to enable them to get the means of living—there are a vast number of cases that deserve the sympathetic attention of those who have charge of the interests of the colony. In a country like this, where large seasons of labour grow up in connection with harvesting and wool-shearing, there always must be times when there is a want of employment. That has been the case as long as I can remember in New Zealand, which extends over twenty-six years. Even in the time when Otago was in its most prosperous condition we had demands for aid from persons who during the winter months were unable to find employment; and it is absurd to suppose that now, when the expenditure of public money is being eased off, and at a time when there is a tendency to offer less employment, and when local industries are less prosperous—that at such a time we are likely to require less provision for the "unemployed" than in past times. I undertake to say that during the last twenty-five years the Colonial and Provincial Government expenditure on "unemployed" has been larger than the Minister for Public Works now proposes. The honourable gentleman proposes to extend the expenditure in that way of £30,000 over four years; or, in other words, £7,500 per annum is all the honourable gentleman proposes during this and the next three years to be devoted to providing relief for the "unemployed;" and that is a less sum than the total of what the General and Provincial Governments have devoted to that purpose during any one of the past twenty-five years. No matter how prosperous the colony may have been, or how much employment may have been offering on public works and goldfields, I undertake to say that never was a less sum than £7,500 a year expended by the General and Provincial Governments on the "unemployed" during that long period. The honourable gentleman will not be able to make £30,000 sufficient for the purpose for that period of four years. I wish to put in a respectful and humble plea for a small work in a district which is connected with the one I have the honour to represent. I allude to the Sumner Railway. I believe if it depended on the honourable member who has charge of the public works there would be no question whatever that that railway would be made. I think the honourable gentleman has given it to be understood that he is most favourable to the work. It would cost about £14,000. It was omitted, by accident, from the schedule of the Loan Act of 1886, on account of the similarity of name between it and that of another railway—the Mount Somers line. In the Loan Act of 1886 only £8,000 was set apart for the whole Provincial District of Canterbury out of the whole million and a half; and now, out of the proposed half-million for general railways, only £7,000 is proposed for that district. I am quite aware of the reason which guided us in not proposing a larger amount in 1886—it was that the best assistance that could be given to the Canterbury Provincial District was by giving larger inducements for the making of the Midland Railway, by establishing railway communication between Westport and the Midland line, and by the line through Marlborough to Tophouse. But these lines were thrown out by the House, and Canterbury was left, as I have said, with only £8,000 out of the last loan; and only £7,000 is proposed now. If the honourable member at the head of the Government will tell me that he will leave this matter to the discretion of the Minister for Public Works I shall, at any rate, feel happy on that point—that we should have the railway. I know his inclination and his sound sense of justice are in favour of making that line: in fact, a deputation that waited on him regarding it came away quite delighted with the friendly manner in which he expressed himself towards the work, and were so impressed with the certainty that it would be soon begun that they discussed whether the honourable gentleman should be asked to take the principal part in the jubilations connected with beginning the work, and should be asked to turn the first sod, so happy were honourable members in the assurance they received from that interview. I hope that this appeal—which I have made in as humble a manner as could be conceived—will have the effect I desire. The work would come in for the "unemployed;" and it is important to know that it would be a suburban line, which would pay well, and therefore it is one of the lines which should not be relegated to a remote period. Now, as regards the question of immigration, it is proposed to put a considerable sum on the estimates in relation to immigration. I cannot say that I am unfavourable to that proposal, because there are systems of immigration which I think should command the support of the House and the country; but I do think we should have a much larger knowledge of the way in which it is proposed to conduct this immigration than we have at present, and I suppose the Ministry will consider it reasonable that such further information should be given. The only other point which I wish to refer to before coming to the general financial aspect of the proposals is this: that, whilst admitting to the full my share of the responsibility and the late Government's share of the responsibility in the matter, I have come to the conclusion that the great expenditure which has taken place on harbour defences is to be regretted. It was commenced at a time when there was a panic, owing to the possibility of war between Great Britain and Russia. This is not the time to go fully into that, but I have come to the conclusion that really the expenditure we are making for harbour defences is more for the protection of Her Majesty's ships of war than for the purpose of defending the colony's territory. Not only will these harbour defences, long before they can reach the point it was intended they should reach, become antiquated and inefficient, but I believe also that the expenditure will have to be enormously in excess of what has already taken place. I admit my full share of responsibility in the matter; but it seems to me desirable that we should now curtail as much as possible any further expenditure in the direction of harbour defences. I shall probably have an opportunity of going more fully into that question when the Bill to provide for the naval defence of the colony is brought down. Now, Sir, I come to the general financial aspect of the question. The gist of the proposals of the Government is this: that at the 31st March, 1887, there was an amount of £575,000 to the credit of the First Part of the Public Works Fund—that is, the part which relates to the miscellaneous expenditure; that there was in the Second Part a credit balance of £674,000—that is, relating to the North Island Trunk Line loan expenditure; and to the credit of the Third Part there was £719,000. To give round figures, I am mentioning only the thousands. That makes a total in hand at the 31st March, 1887, of £2,018,000. Now it is proposed to add £1,000,000 to that amount, making it up to £3,018,000. It is proposed to expend between the year 1887 and the end of March, 1891, £2,941,000, leaving—or it is supposed to leave—at the end of March, 1891, an amount of £77,000 to be expended, representing a balance left to the North Island Trunk Railway Loan of £54,000, and to the unexpended amounts of general loans £23,000. That is, in round figures, the gist of the proposals of the Government. Now, I would ask honourable gentlemen to consider the question of assets as at the end of September, or, rather, at the end of March next, with a view to considering how far it is necessary to embark upon the new loan proposed. The assets as regards Part I. at the end of March last were £575,000. That amount includes the sum of £33,000 for debentures or inscribed stock on account of the Roads and Bridges Construction Act in a commuted shape from various local bodies. There was to the credit of the First Part at the 31st March last of £550,000. The expenditure, the absolute expenditure, up to the end of September last was £243,000, leaving a balance at the end of September of £307,000. Now, Sir, as I shall have occasion to show directly, the honourable member proposes uniformly throughout his estimates that there shall be a larger expenditure during the second half of this year—that is to say, from September to March—than there was from March to September last. I do not know how the honourable gentleman arrives at that estimate, but I believe it is incorrect, for we had already toned down the expenditure before leaving office, and there is no reason to expect that the second half, although it is estimated higher, will show actually a larger amount of expenditure than the first half did. The expenditure was, during the first half, out of the First Part, £243,000; and I am sure that the expenditure to March next will not be larger. Taking that amount, there will be left at the end of March a balance in Part I. of £64,000. Supposing, however, I accept the estimate of the honourable gentleman for a larger expenditure in the second half of the year than there was in the first half, there will be expended £17,000 more, and the balance at the end of March will be £47,000. In the Second Part of the Fund there was expended on the 31st March last £674,000; and, as the amount is so large, I will take the full amount of the expenditure proposed by the honourable gentleman for the whole year, leaving, in this case as in the last case, a larger proposed expenditure for the second half of the year. I will take the whole amount that the honourable gentleman sets forth in his own estimates, £180,000; and therefore I find that at the end of March next there will be left in the Second Part of the Public Works Fund £494,000. In the Third Part there was, at the end of March last, £769,000. The expenditure proposed by the honourable gentleman is £442,000 up to the end of March last, and therefore at the end of March next there will be a credit balance in the Third Part of £327,000. In other words, there will be a credit in the First Part of £64,000 or £47,000 according as the honourable gentleman may expend during the second half of the year; there will be a credit in the Second Part of £494,000; and in the Third Part of £327,000. It is important to recollect that these will be the balances to the credit of the Public Works Fund in March next. The amount required to be voted for 1887–88 is no index of the expenditure, because, as I have said, uniformly throughout the estimates brought down it is proposed to spend more for the second half of the year than was expended in the first half. The additional expenditure is not really going on, but is in consequence, probably, of its being necessary to put more down than will be expended. However, it actually amounts to this: that, whilst we spent from March to September last £515,000, the honourable gentleman's estimates show that we shall spend from September to March £611,000; or, in other words, the honourable gentleman estimates that the expenditure for the second half of the year will be £96,000 more than it was for the first half; but I am convinced that that £96,000 will be entirely to the good at the end of the 31st March—that there will be no excess of expenditure over that of the first half of the year. Now I look at the question as to what was available for expenditure as a whole on the 30th September, 1887. Supposing the North Island Trunk Railway Loan to have been negotiated, and supposing, also, that the debentures or stock belonging to the Roads and Bridges Construction Act given by the local bodies were cashed and placed to the credit of the Fund, there was at the end of September no less than £1,503,000 to the credit of the Public Works Fund. Taking the expenditure from September to March at the same rate as the expenditure from March to September, and adding only the £40,000 for the cost of negotiating the North Island Trunk Loan, I have an amount of expenditure of £555,000: in other words, on the 31st March next there will be no less than £948,000 to the credit of the three Public Works Accounts. Now, Sir, I will put a simple proposition to the House, and it is this: If a new loan is required in March next, with a credit balance of £948,000, when will a new loan be required at the proposed rate of expenditure during the next three years and a half? The expenditure proposed for the year 1888–89—that is, from March next to the following March—is £986,900; so that, to all intents and purposes, it is proposed to spend a million of money next year. And, Sir, it seems to me as clear as it is possible to make anything that, if the Government are justified in asking us for permission to launch a new loan of a million in March next, when there will be nearly a million in hand, and as the expenditure during the current year to the following March will amount to a million, they will have to come down and ask for another loan in 1889. They are lodged in this absolute conclusion: Either it is unnecessary to ask for a million in March next, or they will require another million at the end of the following year—in March, 1889. I see, Sir, no way out of that difficulty, except that it will not be necessary to allow the Government so large a loan as they now ask for. They propose to shut themselves out absolutely from borrowing till 1891; but, if the state of the finances next March requires the launching of a million loan, then I say that the following year a new loan will be required, and the Government will have put the colony in very great danger by undertaking not to borrow for two years further. That is to say, they will require to borrow in 1889, whilst they have undertaken not to borrow until 1891. Sir, in my opinion the loan proposed and asked for of one million is not required; but I believe that half a million should be granted, because the No. 1 Fund requires to be replenished almost from the beginning of the year. There will be probably £100,000 or so in the No. 1 Fund at the commencement of the next financial year; and the Fund which deals with the railways generally—that is to say, the No. 3 Account—will require some amount of replenishment, probably to the extent of £100,000, at the rate of expenditure proposed by the honourable member to carry on until 1889. Therefore, Sir, I should not be averse from a loan being permitted to the extent of half a million and no more. The honourable gentleman may say that the Public Works Fund is exceedingly loaded, and that that is why he asks for that million. I will turn to facts. On the 30th September last, supposing the advances from the North Island Trunk Loan were cleared off—and they will be cleared off as soon as that loan is negotiated—the whole of the advances which the Public Works Fund was under for outside investments was as follows: £12,000, Thames-Rotorua debentures; £37,000, district-railway debentures; £28,000 of 4-per-cent. inscribed stock; £19,000, deficiency bills; and £50,000, debentures on account of Government loans to local bodies. In other words, the whole amount, outside the North Island Trunk Railway, of investments held by the Public Works Fund on the 30th September last amounted to only £146,000. Sir, I should think honourable members must have been astonished last night, as I was, at finding that the Government proposed, besides this million of money, to raise another loan of £400,000 in the English market. The honourable gentleman at the head of the Government denied that that was the meaning of the Public Revenues Bill. I have examined it since, and can see no other meaning to it. It enables the Treasurer to appoint agents in Great Britain to borrow £400,000 to pay off the deficiency of the present and last year up to the extent of £400,000, and it provides for 5-per-cent. debentures being sold to buy up the deficiency bills. I am not generally inclined to allow English opinion to guide our counsels, because I think we know best what is to be done; still, Sir, I could hardly fancy a more audacious challenge to the English money-market than, after a long course of adoption of 4-per-cent. inscribed stock on all new loans, and systematically keeping out of the way loans for revenue purposes, that we should go to the

English money-market and ask for £400,000 in substitution of revenue for the present year—some part of which might have been collected had the honourable member not obstinately put down his foot against going into the question of revising the Customs tariff. Sir, the honourable member, in a former period—I will not say the deficiencies wholly belonged to his Government, but more or less they did so—went upon the English money-market for no less a sum than £1,800,000 to make up for deficiency in revenue; and it was to be hoped that we were not going to do a similar thing again. I cannot help thinking that it is lamentable that this course should now be proposed, and, virtually, that we should be asked to consent to a loan of £1,400,000,—for it is nothing else; the fact that it is in two Bills does not matter. There is £400,000 to pay off deficiency in revenue, £500,000 for miscellaneous purposes, and £500,000 for railways. These, Sir, are the proposals of the honourable gentleman. And it is a remarkable fact—I do not know if it has occurred to honourable members—that the course we adopted in 1886, which met with the approval of the whole House and of the whole country, of strictly “ear-marking” the purposes and amounts for which the loans should be borrowed, has been departed from by the honourable member in the present Bill. After the extraordinary way in which the £3,000,000 proposed by the honourable member in 1882 was diverted to different objects from the purposes for which it was authorised, the House felt that we should strictly denote to what purposes any future money should be applied, and should take precautions for preventing its misapplication. The words put into the Act of 1886 were—“no other purpose whatever.” Those words are omitted from the present Bill, and words are substituted enabling the House to vary the purposes and the amounts in the schedule at the pleasure of the House. These are the words now employed: “and can from time to time be applied to the construction of the works and for the purposes mentioned in the schedule of this Act, in such amounts and within such periods only as shall be provided by any Act or Acts to be passed by the General Assembly appropriating the said moneys.” In other words, although they affect, in this schedule, to put down amounts and purposes, the Bill is so framed that it will be open to the House to look upon the whole amount of the loan as available for expenditure in any direction, so long as it does not go outside altogether the many different purposes stated in the schedule. I consider that a retrograde step, and one which the House will not agree to. Then, I should mention this: that the proposal to borrow £400,000 in England is in distinct opposition to the statement made by the honourable member in his Financial Statement, for in that he said that they proposed to issue short-dated debentures payable only in the colony; so that, without any explanation or apology whatever, the honourable member is so confident of his majority, apparently, that he has brought down this Bill with this vital and important change without even deeming it worthy of mention. Now, the honourable gentleman last night lamented that he, as Colonial Treasurer, was so fully occupied in having to find money as it was required. Sir, I venture to say that the honourable gentleman, in making that complaint, does not fully recognise what are the functions of a Colonial Treasurer. They are analogous to the functions of the manager of a bank. If the manager of a bank were to keep a million or two millions in the coffers of the bank in excess of his requirements, to save himself trouble or anxiety, what would be the result? It would be very bad business. It is the function of a bank to see that money is employed from day to day; and that is the function of all persons in business. Why, Sir, at Home, when interest was down as low as 1 per cent. at call, I have known instance after instance of hundreds of thousands of pounds being lodged for three or four days, though the interest given was only about £3 a day for every £100,000. That was done because it was looked upon as a matter of business that no larger amount of interest should be paid than was absolutely necessary. The loan of a million will, absolutely, not be required for a very considerable time, as I have shown the House; but the honourable gentleman is going to propose to issue a loan of a million in March, when he will have a million in hand, nearly, to the credit of the Public Works Account—he will have a great deal of money at his command. Why should it be necessary, then, to issue the £400,000 of debentures? If the honourable member had said, “I want a loan of a million in order to carry over local investments, which are difficult to place in the colony,” I could have understood it; but look at the position the honourable member has taken up. He told us with a martyr-air last night that he had to find in April next £600,000—which is to be provided by the negotiation of the North Island Trunk Loan—and he has to find besides £700,000 out of revenue. Now, look at the position of the honourable member, when he speaks of that as a matter of difficulty. On the 30th March he will be able to clear off every sixpence he is owing in the way of deficiency bills—he will have £400,000 at his command under this Bill, and that will make a complete clearance of every debt he has owing, and leave a surplus. Of course, Sir, as I showed when I spoke on the Financial Statement, the honourable gentleman exaggerated the position, both as regards the expenditure and the diminished revenue; and there will not be so large a deficiency as he anticipates, unless it arises out of measures which he is proposing this session. He pays off every debt, and on the first day of April has a right to raise £900,000 in addition to paying off that £400,000. This revenue Bill allows him £1,300,000 of deficiency bills—£400,000 in the shape of debentures, which will clear off altogether that amount of outstanding bills, and on the 1st April he will be entitled to raise an additional £900,000. I do not see that there will be any difficulty then in paying off the £700,000. Honourable members must recollect that the critical period in the finances of the colony is from the end of March to the middle of October. During those first six months we have to pay, virtually, the whole of our year's interest. October is the worst part. At the end of the year we have cleared off, if there is no deficiency, our Treasury bills, or nearly all of them, except such as may be represented by advances. Then we have recourse to Treasury bills to pay the half-year's interest due in April. Up to October we have to keep up all the revenue we can; and, with the use of the Treasury bills, we pay the second half-year's interest. Well, after October the revenue continues to accumulate and accumulate, and the whole of the property-tax comes in after October, and a very considerable amount more in stamp duties during the second half of the year than the first half. And what I want to bring before the Committee is this: that the position of the Colonial Treasurer is, and must be—and he cannot get ease from it if he does justice to the colony—his position is to examine these matters very carefully, so as to avoid paying a larger amount of interest than is necessary. The function of the officers of the Treasury is to deal with the moneys provided by the Treasurer; and the lament made by the Colonial Treasurer last night, of having to spend his time in providing the means required, would have been a legitimate lament from the Secretary to the Treasury, but not from the Colonial Treasurer, any more than it would be a legitimate lament from the manager of a bank, whose business it would be to conduct the policy of the bank and determine what funds were necessary. Now, Sir, in saying that I am not favourable to allowing this loan to be for more than half a million, I wish to add that, if I considered it was possible to give effect during the present session to the proposals which I have before referred to in this House, it would not be necessary to issue any new loan at all, to float the North Island Trunk Railway, or to provide a loan for taking up the deficiency bills. It appears to me absurd for honourable members to suppose that I, who have played so large a part in the history of the colony, would endanger my reputation by making a statement as to the feasibility of such plans unless I had good reason to know they could be carried out. But it seems to me yet more absurd that gentlemen who are inclined to ridicule the idea of such proposals should have so little idea of the resources which are open to countries, as well as to individuals, in the way of meeting conditions and circumstances which required to be met as to suppose there is no way of meeting our difficulties and the various circumstances out of which they arise, and that we must come to the deplorable policy which this Public Works Statement discloses; for there is no disguising the fact that this public-works policy is a bid to honourable members who are supporters of borrowing, in the way of saying, “If you will consent to let us borrow more at present than was contemplated, we will make you a promise of being abstinent in future.” I do not know what one would say of a person who was habitually given to the use of strong liquor who said, "If you let me have a month's or a year's indulgence to any extent I like, I am willing to take the pledge afterwards." That is virtually what the honourable gentlemen now say. They say to those members who are opposed to borrowing, "Give us a year or two of wild indulgence, and after that we will take the pledge and abstain for the future." How far this promise may have effect upon honourable members it is not for me to say. To my mind, the Public Works Statement is neither more nor less than this: "Give us a large amount of borrowing for the next eighteen months, and we will take our chance of what we can do afterwards. We shall, at any rate, have had eighteen months' control of the colony, and something may occur to enable us to renounce the support of the members whose support now is so important to us." That is, to my mind, the character of the policy. And when I look at the Ministers smiling opposite to me I cannot help thinking I have been able to solve this conundrum and to see through it. As I have said, I put on one side my proposals; it is very evident to me I am not justified in bringing them down now. In considering proposals of the kind you have to look at them from two points of view: first, as to their advantage to the colony; and, next, their feasibility. As regards their advantage to the colony I do not think there will be any two opinions. As regards their feasibility, I am thoroughly convinced upon that point; but I know that were I to announce them now it is upon that point the Government would attempt to beat me, and the very discussion of them would aid to mar the probability of putting them into effect. It is only in the hands of those who are friendly to the carrying-out of the proposals that good effect would be likely to come from them; and, as the Government have shown such extraordinary jealousy of any member on this side of the House, or, indeed, on their own side of the House, making suggestions in regard to policy throughout the whole of the session, it would be absurd for an honourable member to think that practical advantage would be gained by making suggestions to the honourable gentleman. The Premier did, in a patronising manner, tell honourable gentlemen that he would receive their letters containing suggestions about local government during the recess; but he did not even say that he would give them the credit of their suggestions. "I will look into them; if I like them I will adopt them." That was the extent of his generosity in the way of accepting suggestions from honourable gentlemen. Well, Sir, I am dealing with the case not as it would be if I were at liberty to say it is not necessary to borrow this million and the North Island Trunk Loan, and not necessary to float debentures to take up the deficiency bills. I am dealing with the case as it stands, and I say it is not necessary, in order to make provision for such public works as will be required during the next twelve months, or to make provision for cash required by the Treasury—it is not necessary we should raise more than half a million of money in London, especially if we accept the £400,000 placed in the Public Revenues Bill. I should like to read a summary of the criticisms I have made this afternoon and evening. I think it is arrogant and presumptuous to attempt to control the expenditure and regulate it for the next three years and a half. I think the proposals, though ably stated as a Public Works Statement, do not harmonize with the financial position of the colony. I am of opinion that some of the works that are banished altogether out of consideration, although it may possibly be the case that it is not desirable to continue them at present, should not be banished from consideration for three years and a half. I consider that the route of the North Island Trunk line should be altered. I am willing to support any amendment that may be brought in that there shall be no expenditure on the south end beyond Hunterville, and the completion of the Native land purchases: and, as I shall show directly, we have had no opportunity, either by speeches or votes, to determine that question. The question has to be determined independently by resolution. It would be a sad pity to allow the session to go by without determining that point. I consider that the Otago Central Railway should be pushed on as fast as possible to Middlemarch. Virtually, the Government have accepted the Bill for the extension of the Otago Central line, and it is therefore their duty to carry that line to Middlemarch as fast as possible, to enable that Bill to have effect; for, until the new line is commenced from the railway terminus, I am quite convinced that nothing of any importance can be done with it. I think the Mauriceville-Woodville line should be delayed as much as possible; that the amount left of "The New Zealand Loan Act, 1886," should be expended slowly; and that the Government should lend its whole strength to hurry forward with the greatest possible rapidity the filling-up of the gap between Woodville and Palmerston. That should be hurried on night and day, for it is simply a waste of previous expenditure to leave that gap open. I think that the provisions for the goldfields roads and contingencies and for "unemployed" are insufficient for the next three years and a half; and that the Greymouth to Hokitika line should be completed, and that they should not leave a gap there representing £70,000. All these objections point to the same end. We ought not to attempt during the present session to arrogate to ourselves either the right or the capacity to determine the expenditure for the next three years and a half. We should provide the Government with sufficient money to carry on the expenditure for the coming year; and we should, under the present circumstances of the colony, tone down that expenditure, unless there are particular reasons—as in the cases I have mentioned—to the lowest possible amount. We are already nearly through this year, and really it is more a question of expenditure during the time which may elapse after the end of the financial year to the time when we shall be able to meet next session. I am convinced that £400,000, or, say, a loan of half a million, will be sufficient; and I wish to remind honourable members that on the 31st March next there will be to the credit of Part I. of the Public Works Fund either £47,000 or £64,000 according to the rate of expenditure in the meantime; to Part II. there will be a credit of close on half a million; and to Part III., £326,000. And now I should like to ask, what is the meaning of all this flourish that we have heard during the session of reinstating our finances, and of the great necessity which the Government have to deal with the finances of the country? What does it all mean? Borrowing right and left in greater profusion than any other Ministry have ever asked for; borrowing for the year's deficiency; borrowing a million of money long before it is required; borrowing a million of money to last over three and a half years; borrowing so that they can say at the end of this year, "Oh! here is a cheque for the deficiency of the year. It ought not to come up to more than £350,000, but that does not matter: make it £400,000. Here is a cheque for it." And this is to be raised at 5 per cent. As to retrenchment, we have heard enough said of its virtues; but what do we know of it? Supposing anything should happen to close this session to-night, and honourable members were to go back to their constituents, what could they tell them of the retrenchment of the Government? They could say that they had seen a paragraph here and a circular there sent round by the honourable gentleman at the head of the Education Department; and the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government has given us the plausible excuse that he has only sent that circular round in anticipation of the House approving of their proposals. He might at least have put it in our pigeon-holes, and saved us from the humiliation of having to look to small country papers in districts which specially approve the honourable gentleman's policy to ascertain anything as to his retrenchment. I ask, again, if we meet our constituents, what can we state of this retrenchment? If an honourable gentleman goes down to Otago, he will find that the Otago Daily Times knows a great deal more of the mind of the Government than he does. He will find in the Press-room attached to this House gentlemen who write what is called "political gossip" to the various papers, who know much more on the question of retrenchment than members of the House do, except perhaps those honourable gentlemen who may be said to be the inner circle, and who occasionally sit on the Government benches. The knowledge of honourable gentlemen generally on this subject is not nearly so large as that of the gentlemen who write those interesting papers called "political gossip." We know of three items of retrenchment—the honorarium of honourable members, Ministers' salaries, and the Governor's salary. They have been made to travel a good way and to do a great deal of work; but what do we know of the general question? We were told that we shall have to vote the estimates in a lump sum; but within the last day or two the Premier has told us that he will not force us through those estimates, and will give us an opportunity of discussing the education question; but as to our being in a position of meeting our constituents and telling them there is this or that plan of introducing a cheaper service for the colony—and that is what the people want—we can tell them nothing. The requirement of the constituencies is that there should be a cheaper service. They say, "We have had too luxurious a Government; it is true that it is a Government which gives conveniences from one end of the colony to the other, but we want a system which will give us less in the way of convenience and luxury, and which will consequently cost us less." But we have no knowledge of the way in which that is to be carried out, and honourable gentlemen who have no particular opportunity of obtaining information are kept completely in the dark. And now I want to say a few words about the honourable gentleman's statement that we shall be able to consider the public-works proposals when we go into Committee of Supply. He must either have said that unthinkingly, or he must have been trying how far he could play on the credulity of honourable members. That he has had encouragement during the session from honourable gentlemen to suppose that they are willing to swallow almost anything I freely admit, and I can understand that, as the session approaches to an end, he may take it into his head to try and absolutely gauge the willingness of honourable members to be—may I say humbugged?—is that a parliamentary expression, Sir? I can understand nothing else. But I tell honourable members, and especially young members on the opposite side, that when they go into Committee on the public-works proposals they will be asked to vote for so much for the year ending on the 31st March next. Nine months of the year have gone by, and very little can be done in the way of controlling the expenditure for the next three months. And if the Committee were sitting and a vote were proposed for, say, £50,000 for a line from Mount Egmont to Hawera, and I were to ask, "What is to be expended next year?" the Chairman of the Committee would very properly tell me that we were only dealing with the expenditure for the present year, and had nothing to do with the expenditure for next year. How, then, when the honourable gentleman tells us that we shall have an opportunity of considering his proposals, are we to deal with the question even by speaking, much less by voting, as to the amount that is to be expended during the next three years and a half? Since the 31st March last we have been spending money solely on Imprest Act. Imprest Act after Imprest Act has been passed, enabling the Government to spend lump sums—generally a quarter of a million—which are to be put into the Appropriation Act; and all the items of expenditure have virtually been on the scale of last year, or less, as the Government have been able to make retrenchment; and the Appropriation Act of this year will contain an indemnity for all expenditure under those Imprest Acts, together with provision for the expenditure during the remaining three months of the year, if the Appropriation Act passes before the end of the year, which I hope it will. I ask the honourable gentleman how, under those circumstances, we are to control these votes; for we may be told at any moment that the money has been spent, or it must be spent, during the year. We might knock off £5 here and £10 there; but how is that to decide what the public-works policy is to be for the next three years and a half? It is an utter fallacy to say that we can deal with the question, and I tell the honourable gentleman that he is either mistaken himself, or he is endeavouring to mislead honourable members, when he says that it will be possible to have a fair discussion on the policy upon the votes in Committee of Supply. What we shall have to consider are the votes for the present year. For carrying on any works which we are likely to sanction this year, a half-million loan is ample; and we shall be unnecessarily straining our credit at Home and unnecessarily going in the face of the opinion of the country—which is, that borrowing should be limited to the utmost extent—if we sanction this loan for a million of money. I am obliged to the House for the attention with which it has listened to me.

Mr. FISHER.—The honourable gentleman has poked a little fun at us; we will now poke back a little common-sense at him. In some portions of his speech he assumed an altitude of affected impartiality, from which position he presumed to exercise the office of supreme interpreter, and he was good enough to give the House a great deal of criticism and advice. He took up the position of Æsop's quack frog, who took upon himself to prescribe for all the beasts of the field; but, as the honourable gentleman will perhaps remember, the beasts of the field in return merely recommended the quack frog to go home and prescribe for himself. The honourable gentleman, in accordance with all his old tactics, has made a bid for the individual and collective votes of members from certain parts of the colony. He has informed them, in quite a gratuitous way, that the proposals of the Government are not at all suitable to their districts, that the real interests of the districts are quite neglected, and that, if they will only return him to office, he will give them all the public works they require. But I may tell the honourable gentleman that he lives (for him) in a strange era—that if he thinks it possible to obtain the votes of particular members, or the collective votes of members of any district, by corrupt bids of that kind, he is altogether mistaken. Members of this House cannot now be bought in that way. The times when it was possible to do that sort of thing are long gone by. Now, Sir, I wish further to say that I think the honourable gentleman has been guilty of displaying the very greatest ingratitude to the people of this country. The people of this country in times past have treated him in a uniformly liberal and generous manner, and he has told us within the past two weeks that he has in his possession a scheme which, if divulged, would immediately bring back prosperity to this colony. He said it was a scheme by which, firstly, borrowing in the London money-market might be avoided for years; secondly, it would enable our railways to be proceeded with at a reasonable rate of progress; and, in the third place, increased taxation could be altogether avoided. Now, if the honourable gentleman has in his possession such a scheme, it is simply selfish ingratitude on his part not to place it before this House and the country. I will not impute any more improper or more dishonourable motives to him, but I say this: that the honourable gentleman has been in office for three years, and, if he was not possessed of sufficient patriotism to give the people of this country the benefit of his knowledge and his skill while in office, it is his duty—to put it on no higher ground—now to give the country the benefit of this scheme, whatever it may be. In the absence of the scheme we are forced to the conclusion that the inflated and mystic language which he has used in regard to it is pure balderdash. Now, the honourable gentleman has not touched in any particular—in fact, he has studiously avoided—the main points of the Premier's speech in introducing this Loan Bill. He has altogether blinded or attempted to blind the House in regard to the financial position of the country. It was plainly and distinctly stated that the Government had to provide the sum of £1,800,000 in London in April next in order to meet the country's engagements and maintain its credit. The honourable gentleman has not answered that statement at all. He knows it to be true, and he therefore entirely avoided it. The honourable gentleman also gave no explanation whatever in regard to the vicious and dishonest system which he has introduced into our finances of borrowing from one account to aid other accounts which he had exhausted. Through the introduction of that bad system the finances of the country have become a perfect network of mystery; and the honourable gentleman is responsible for having brought that condition of things into existence. That was made quite plain by the Premier, but the honourable gentleman has not attempted to controvert his statement in any one particular. Then, the honourable gentleman, having complimented the Minister for Public Works upon the skill with which he had prepared the Public Works Statement, proceeded to say that to carry out the proposals of the Statement would be wasteful in every direction! I should have liked the honourable gentleman to go into a little more particularity with regard to that matter, for his contradictions were a little confusing. But here is a little contradiction in regard to the honourable gentleman's own administration which I would like him to explain. He tells us now that he would proceed with the Palmer- ton-Woodville line night and day, because he recognises that the line is one of extreme importance, and that it ought to be so proceeded with. Now, why did not the honourable gentleman, during his long term of office, go on with that work night and day?

Sir J. VOGEL.—I should have done so but for a want of agreement among my colleagues on the point.

Mr. FISHER.—Yes; the honourable gentleman never was in agreement with his colleagues. He knows, as every member of this House knows, that the prosecution of this work is of vast importance. We want no other evidence of that than his own statement: yet, while he makes that admission, there is the fact that he remained in office for three years and allowed the line to remain in the position in which it now is. Then, in regard to the Greymouth-Hokitika line, if the honourable gentleman believed that to be a line of such enormous importance as he now says he believes it to be, why did he not also proceed with that? Sir, this speech of the honourable gentleman is an all-round "bait" for the votes of members of this House. But he is simply now a political "Rip Van Winkle." He finds himself in opposition, and he believes it to be possible to repeat with success the tactics which he adopted twenty years ago. But I tell the honourable gentleman that the circumstances of this country are changed, the character of its public men is changed, and it is not possible now to apply with success those tactics which were tolerated twenty years ago. Neither is it any longer possible in this country to conjure with a name, much less to conjure with the honourable gentleman's name. The country is satisfied of that; and, when he speaks to us of the necessity of preserving his own reputation, I should like to tell him that he has not been quite so careful of the reputation of this country, which is a matter of very much greater concern to us. As to the necessity of providing for the "unemployed," the Government have put upon the estimates what they consider to be a reasonable sum in order to provide for those people who may be unfortunate enough, owing to the depressed circumstances of the colony, not to be able to find employment. For that purpose £30,000 has been put down, which is, as the honourable gentleman has said, at the rate of £7,500 a year; and we hope that that will be sufficient. We do not throw out any unworthy sneers such as the honourable gentleman threw out, to the effect that among the number of people in this country who rank as "unemployed" were to be found a large proportion who do not love work. That was an unworthy imputation, I think, to cast upon a large class of unfortunate people who, owing to the depressed state of the country, are unable to obtain work in the various districts of the colony.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The honourable gentleman is misrepresenting me. I said there might be some who do not love work who associate themselves with the "unemployed."

Mr. FISHER.—The honourable gentleman may qualify his statement in any way he likes. It is sufficient for me that he made the statement, which I took down at the time. Now, the whole burden of the honourable gentleman's speech was this—and to this point I call the special attention of those honourable members who object to raising any further loans: He said he considered a loan of half a million sufficient, and he objected to the colony being tied down against further borrowing for any specific term. Let that be carefully observed, for that was the whole burden of the honourable gentleman's speech. Clearly his idea is that, if he can restrict the present loan to half a million, so as to enable the country to carry on during the short period between now and next session, or perhaps the session after, there may be a possibility of himself and his late colleagues returning to office, when he will be able to propose further large loans himself. There is the key to the whole position. He expects to return to office, and he objects to be tied down, as our proposals will tie him down. The honourable gentleman objects, as he always has done, to be restricted in any way in the matter of raising loans. He has said that, in consequence of the rate at which it is proposed to proceed with public works, it will be necessary to raise another large loan by March, 1888. If the honourable gentleman wishes to do us justice, or to criticize our proposals in a fair and impartial manner, he will see that our proposals so tie up the proposed expenditure that only what is stated to be expended in any one particular year can be expended in that year.

Mr. FISHER.—No.

Mr. FISHER.—There are the figures in the Public Works Statement, and, if the honourable member for Dunedin South chooses to challenge my assertion, we must put his challenge against the statement of the honourable member for Christchurch North, who said it was presumptuous and arrogant to attempt to tie up the expenditure for three years. I think the honourable gentleman will himself admit that the honourable member for Christchurch North understands a little more about these matters than he does. Now, the advantage of these proposals, if they have any advantage at all, is this: that the loan proposals and the expenditure are specifically allocated for a particular time and for particular works. The money to be raised is to cover three years' expenditure, and the amount for each work and for each year is specifically stated. Another statement of the honourable gentleman was that we are attempting to put a stop to the principle of "ear-marking" particular moneys to be applied to particular works. Now, if this Public Works Statement has any distinctive feature at all, it is that all moneys are specifically tied up—"ear-marked," as the honourable gentleman terms it. Sir, the honourable gentleman is a great advocate for the principle of "ear-marking." So he tells us. And in this connection he has made particular reference to the North Island Trunk Loan.

Let me ask who it was, after passing a special Act to "ear-mark" that loan, who took the money and applied it to other purposes. Why, the honourable gentleman himself. And if that were the only instance of the misapplication of money by the late Government—I do not wish to use a stronger term—I would not so much complain, although that is a sufficiently strong cause of complaint. But to-night we have the honourable gentleman, of all persons in the world, suggesting that the route of the North Island Trunk line should be changed—that the whole route should be altered. The honourable gentleman, of course, is holding out an attractive bait for the Auckland and Taranaki votes, and to secure them if he can he offers to change the line of route—he, who insisted upon "ear-marking" the North Island Trunk Loan! Sir, the honourable gentleman's attitude and his conduct are altogether inexcusable.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I did not say what route should be adopted.

Mr. FISHER.—The honourable gentleman is on the horns of a dilemma. In this case, unfortunately for himself, he has not left open his usual means of escape. He must accept the consequences of his own statement, and if he expects his statements to obtain any credence in this House they must be statements of such a character as to stand analysis. When we come to analyse the honourable gentleman's statement in this respect we find it will not hold water in any particular. By any one statement we must gauge his whole argument, and if any one falls to the ground we may fairly assume that they are all equally defective. The honourable gentleman made a grand point about "ear-marking;" but, as I have said, he was the person who departed from the principle, and applied money voted for one purpose to another. I desire particularly to pin the honourable gentleman upon this question. He who has expressed such holy horror lest the Premier should divert this money has suggested that the route of the trunk line should be changed, and has expressed great pleasure that the Statement, as he says, indicates it might be changed.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Will the honourable gentleman allow me to state this positively: that there is no "ear-marking" in any shape or form to prevent the route of the North Island Trunk line being changed and the line being taken by Taranaki? The Statement of the honourable gentleman's own colleague must convince him of the fact, and therefore he must know that what he says is incorrect.

Mr. FISHER.—No; I call the special attention of those honourable members who have an aversion to any loan-proposals, as I have myself, to this point. The honourable gentleman makes the insidious suggestion—and I warn the House against its adoption—that only a half-million loan should be authorised now. He thinks—it is a vain delusion, of course—of the possibility of his coming back to these benches next year, and he therefore suggests that the borrowing should be kept down this year, and that what is borrowed should be "ear-marked," so that he may be left free to borrow largely next year, when, as he vainly thinks, he may be in office. Sir, I have already this session stated in this House that I have as great aversion to borrowing as any member possibly can have, but I have realised, in the short time we have been in office, what the exact position of the finances of the country is. The honourable gentleman himself knows what their condition is; but it suits him, for party purposes, to attempt to mislead honourable members. Sir, the honourable gentleman knows better than all others what the position of the finances is at the present time. He it was who brought them into that position. He has told us that there went forth a great cry from the Government and their friends of their desire to bring about a reinstatement of the colonial finance. To that I say Yes. It was, and still is, our desire to bring about a reinstatement of the colonial finances; but I am sorry to say that, after what we have discovered of the condition of the finances since coming into office, it will be impossible to bring about that reinstatement at as early a date as we had supposed it to be possible. This, too, I desire also to say: that I am confident, speaking again from an intimate knowledge of the "clever" way in which the honourable gentleman has bungled our finance, that that reinstatement will be postponed for a very long time if the honourable gentleman is to come back to office. Now, Sir, I wish to explain that, if the honourable gentleman will obtrude these matters upon the notice of the House, it becomes our duty to follow them up. He tells us he is bound to make the statements he has made this evening, because it behoves him to be careful of his own reputation. Well, it would ill become me to say anything of the honourable gentleman's reputation. His reputation is in his own keeping, and we may assume that it is in good hands; but what we have to carefully guard is the reputation of this country, which, I venture to think, is of greater moment to us than the honourable gentleman's reputation. I have warned the honourable gentleman on previous occasions that he must be prepared to hear unpleasant truths whenever he ventures to vaunt his own superiority in discussing financial questions. I wish the House to mark this: It is not we who raise these questions. But, when they are raised, we cannot help remembering, amongst other things, that, when the last million-and-a-half loan was raised, the honourable gentleman's connection with it cost the colony no less than £90,000. The loan was floated at £97 5s., while the lowest quotation for 4-per-cent. stock of other colonies was £103. That was what we paid for the connection of the honourable gentleman's name with the finances of this country. The honourable gentleman really ought to be more guarded in raising these questions. I did not wish to say one word upon that point; but, when the honourable gentleman comes here and talks of preserving his reputation, we must not forget what the effects of his reputation have been upon the finances of the colony. The honourable gentleman man may laugh as much as he pleases, but it is no laughing matter for this country to know—as we all do know—that our last loan brought so low a price, and that our bonds are now standing at a discount of £12 as compared with the stock of New South Wales, although when he took office in 1884 there was no material difference between the price of our 4-per-cent. bonds and those of the best of the other Australasian Colonies. The honourable gentleman, if it so pleases him, may indulge in mystifications with regard to finance, and may talk in dismal tones about our management; but the House is not likely to forget the useful results of his connection with our finance—

Sir J. VOGEL.—I wish to say that the honourable gentleman, in stating that when we left office the bonds of the colony were at a discount of £12, is entirely mistaken. They stood at par when we left office. They have fallen since.

Mr. FISHER.—Oh! we do not rely upon telegraphed versions of the price of our stock. I take the quotations in the leading financial papers, and I presume honourable gentlemen will accept such authorities as the Economist and Westgarth.

An Hon. MEMBER.—And the Standard.

Mr. FISHER.—The Standard has an aversion to New Zealand; but we may safely take the opinions of unbiased authorities such as I have named. The honourable gentleman rather ridiculed the statement of the Colonial Treasurer that he found himself under the unpleasant necessity of having to provide funds to carry on the services of the country; and the honourable gentleman, as is usual on these occasions, proceeded to deliver a treatise upon the duties of a Colonial Treasurer. Well, I believe in the principle laid down by Emerson, that a man's fortune, his reputation, is the result of his character; and, if the honourable gentleman opposite and my honourable friend the Colonial Treasurer are to be gauged in this way by results, I venture to say that the results will tell very heavily against the honourable member for Christchurch North. The honourable gentleman further tells us that the Public Works Statement is a bid for the votes of those honourable members who are averse from borrowing. Well, here again the honourable gentleman contradicts himself most strangely, for in another part of his speech he said the exact reverse; but in reality the Statement is, as the honourable gentleman describes it, an appeal to those honourable members who are averse from borrowing, for it is the first real attempt that has been made for many years to limit the expenditure of the country, and to keep our expenditure within our means. If it is an appeal to honourable members who are averse from borrowing, it is an honest and a conscientious appeal—it is a distinct undertaking that the colony shall not go upon the London money-market to borrow again for a term of three years; and I do not see how those members who are sincerely and earnestly opposed to borrowing can require anything further from the Government. It is a distinct, definite, and well-thought-out Statement, which the Government is justified in bringing down and will not be justified in departing from. It is the complement of the policy so clearly laid down in the Financial Statement. The honourable gentleman says the Statement forms no guarantee that there shall not be further borrowing for three years; but he must know perfectly well that the guarantee will reach the London money-market, and that, if any attempt were made to raise money before the expiry of the three years, the guarantee would be produced against us. The honourable gentleman, as I have already remarked, said it would be presumptuous and arrogant to attempt now to regulate the expenditure for the next three years. Why so? I think it a plain and businesslike proposal, to which any business-man would give ready assent. It is only the politician—the politician with strong party bias—who would call it presumptuous and arrogant; but I venture to say that it will meet with the approval of every unbiased thinker. The proposal is clear, distinct, definite, businesslike; and I do not see how any person not swayed by political bias can come to any other conclusion in regard to it. If honourable gentlemen who accuse us of dealing in vague generalities will look at the figures in the Statement they will see that there is a definite businesslike plan laid down for the guidance of Government and Parliament for the next three years, and once accepted there can be no departure from it. There is no equivocation in any form. I submit that the honourable gentleman's criticisms in no way apply to this Statement. They must have been framed upon the presumption that they were to be directed against some Statement similar in character to those indefinite and "elastic" Statements which the honourable gentleman has himself been in the habit of placing before this House for some years past. Sir, I regret—as I always do regret upon these occasions—that the honourable gentleman should have thrown down such provocative challenges—challenges which induce comparisons between his financing and the financing of others to whom he is opposed—because the record is so much against him. I would advise the honourable gentleman, if he will consent to accept advice from me, not to again invite criticism upon this particular point on any future occasion. Sir, I have nothing further to say. I desire only to appeal to honourable gentlemen who have a conscientious objection to further borrowing to consider what the position of the country is, what liabilities we have to meet, and to tell the Government and the House, if they can, how these liabilities are to be met if they are not to be met in the way the Government propose. It seems to me that the position is clear as noonday to any person who honestly desires to understand. It is clear that we must provide £1,300,000 by the end of April, to meet the unpleasant legacy of liability left to us by our predecessors; and I say that, if we are not entitled to the support of the House under these circumstances, we are not entitled to its support under any circumstances whatever.

Dr. FITCHETT.—The honourable gentleman who has just sat down may be an authority upon Æsop, but it will be some time before he makes his mark as a financier, if we may take the speech he has just delivered as a fair example of his capacity. He indulged very freely in recriminations and generalities, and allusions not in the best of taste; but he has not attempted to deal with the figures which the ex-Treasurer gave to the House, and until those figures are dealt with it will take a great many more of such speeches as we have just listened to to assure us that the loan-proposals of the Government are such as should receive the confidence of the House. I suppose it is owing to the late date of the honourable gentleman's studies in finance that there are gaps in his history of it. He referred to the honourable member for Christchurch North as being the proposer of that vicious principle of borrowing from one account to put another in funds; but he must have spoken in utter oblivion of the fact that that principle was, years ago, introduced to New Zealand politics by his colleague the present Treasurer. Again, Sir, he is, apparently, not aware of the difference between "ear-marking," in the sense in which the term was used by the honourable member for Christchurch North, and the mere mention of a sum to be allocated to a particular work. Are we to accept it, forsooth, that, because in the financial proposals of the Government and in the Public Works Statement certain sums are set down for certain works, those moneys cannot be diverted? Is it necessary to refer to the past in connection with this point? Shall I refer the honourable gentleman to the Three-million Loan raised by his colleague in 1882? History tends to repeat itself, and history will repeat itself here unless we take action to prevent it. How was that three million borrowed—on what condition? That a million per annum was to be spent, and on certain specified works. But what became of the conditions? I will not follow the honourable member by digging up "the wretched past." Many of us have come here in the hope of legislating for the future, and we fail to see how the ill-advised proposals of this Government are to be justified by reference to the possibly ill-advised proposals of any other Government. We want to let the dead past bury its dead, and to see what we can do for the country in the future. Now, dealing with the loan-proposals of the Government, what chiefly pleases me is the assurance of the Premier that he does not intend to insist on them. I trust that, in the interests of the colony as a whole, the amount of this loan will be discussed and determined utterly irrespective of party. It would be a grievous thing if, relying on his insensate majority, the majority which has helped him well, if not wisely, in the past, the Premier should insist on retaining a million in his Bill, when his own better judgment tells him it ought not to stay there. I repeat that I think all sides of the House will recognise that this is not a matter to be dealt with in any way on party lines. Put it in any way you like, it amounts to this: that the Government propose to borrow £2,400,000. Sir, nobody can read these figures and remember what happened during the late elections—the cry for economy that rang through the country—and not be struck with a sharp shock of surprise. I trust we have not so soon forgotten the lesson learnt and the pledges given during the elections, but that we shall be as severely economical now as we then professed we would be. It is quite true that the North Island Trunk Loan is largely hypothecated, and that £400,000 represents deficiency bills that must be paid in some way or other; but the criticism of the honourable member for Christchurch North has shown that the million loan is not necessary, and I trust that the House will manage to modify it before the Bill becomes law. It is quite true that the million is proposed to be spread over three years and a half; but, in the light of what befel the Three-million Loan of the Premier's in 1882, what assurance have we that it will not be the same now? I venture to say we have none. I hold that we have no right, at the present time, when our credit is at such exceedingly low-water mark, to borrow money to spend during the course of the next three years and a half. There is nothing to warrant our doing so, and the fact will be that, if we float this loan, the money will come into the colonial chest and it will not stay there. The political pressure, the amount of suction, is so strong that no reasonable man can believe the money will be applied strictly to the purposes for which it is to be borrowed. As the honourable member for Christchurch North has pointed out, there is no provision for "ear-marking" the moneys, and it would simply be used either to reward friends or to placate enemies. I hope the House will not countenance that. Is it what the country has any right to expect? It is not necessary for me to refer to the "roar for retrenchment" that was raised some time ago. I hope it has not died out yet. Consider what the country said when the late Premier proposed to borrow £2,000,000, to last over seven years, and to be spent on strictly specified works. The proposal was hounded down as outrageously extravagant; the country would not hear of it: and now it is coolly proposed that we should consent to borrow £2,400,000, to last over three years and a half, and with no specific allocation. I trust we shall not do it. I do not purpose detaining the House discussing the merits of the thing. It has been sufficiently discussed and analysed by the honourable member for Christchurch North. What I rose to do was to endeavour to bring the House to the best method of adopting the suggestion which the Premier himself threw out, that this loan be reduced. His suggestion was that it could be reduced in Committee. I venture to say that it cannot be reduced in Committee. It should be reduced before we go into Committee. I quite grant that the principle of a Bill is supposed to be affirmed at the time of the second reading. It may be said that we should affirm the principle of the Loan Bill now, and subsequently reduce the amount. Well, I am disposed to think that all Loan Bills are unprincipled; but if there be any principle at all in them it is in the quantum of the loan. Therefore I affirm that we assert the principle when we fix the quantum. When we go into Committee each item will be dealt with separately; all sorts of conflicting interests will centre on each item, and the result will be that all efforts at economy will be utterly beaten in detail, and the Bill will pass in its integrity. Unless the reduction is effected now, I fear we shall utterly fail to amend the Bill in Committee; and therefore I move, as an amendment, That all the words after "That" be left out, with the view of inserting these words: "the amount of the proposed loan be limited to £500,000." I assure the Premier that it is with no hostile intention I do this. I do it for the reason, as I say, first, that he himself has indicated his willingness to accept a reduction.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I appeal to honourable members if it is not so.

Major ATKINSON.—Not in the least as you put it.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I should be the last person to move this if I thought otherwise, because I know the Premier can command a majority which will insure the passage of the Bill in its integrity. But he intimated that he was prepared to accept reductions. I say that we cannot effect these reductions when we go into Committee of Supply; whereas, if the maximum amount of half a million be now fixed in the Bill, the Government can alter their public-works proposals in such a way as to harmonize with the amount of the Bill, and the Committee cannot increase it.

Dr. HODGKINSON.—When speaking on the Financial Statement about a month ago I gave it as my opinion that, however good the retrenchment proposals of the Government were, their borrowing proposals were excessive. I am sorry to say that since then I have not seen any reason to alter that opinion, and that I feel it my duty to protest in the strongest way I possibly can against these excessive borrowing proposals. Unless it is an absolute necessity, which has not been shown yet,—unless we have debts which we must meet to save our credit,—I think these proposals ought to be resisted; and I do hope that, without reference to party, every member of the House will consider this question impartially, and avail himself of the statement that the Premier made the other evening, that reductions may be effected upon each railway as it comes before us. The proposition of the Ministry, now that our debt has reached the enormous sum of £35,000,000, is that we should incur an additional debt of £2,400,000; and that, I imagine, with the deficiency bills to cover liabilities, will bring the debt up to the enormous sum of £38,000,000. That is a debt far beyond anything which the colony should reasonably contract. I see, also, by this Public Works Statement, that, in spite of this enormous indebtedness, in spite of the utmost necessity for economy—for their efforts at which I give them credit—they actually propose to go on spending money on railways, and, I may add, unproductive railways. They know full well that nearly all these railways are unproductive, and that the largest and most expensive of them are political railways that ought not to have been made, and that they are the result of that vicious system introduced seventeen years ago by the honourable member for Christchurch North, which has led to the ruin of the colony—for, virtually, we are a ruined colony at this moment. There is no disguising the fact; we know it.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Will the honourable gentleman name the works?

Dr. HODGKINSON.—All the works, more or less, and the expenditure resulting from the large loan system. Out of the loans that have been raised some £14,000,000 has been spent on railways; and, as a necessary consequence of the system introduced by the honourable member for Christchurch North, enormous sums have been wasted upon other works that ought not to have been made. We know it who have to pay for it. It is all very well for the honourable gentleman to say it is not so. Here, I say, it is actually proposed to spend £3,000,000 more upon railways. I contend it is not at all necessary. Here is the North Island Trunk Railway. I understand the sum of £600,000 has been spent upon this railway already—possibly more. Well, of course that must be paid; but I contend there is not the least necessity whatever to spend another sixpence upon it for the next ten years. The railway ought to be stopped, utterly stopped, and I am amazed at the Minister for bringing forward such a proposal. I see by the Public Works Statement that it is actually proposed to spend another £400,000 upon this political railway, which can never possibly pay, which is intended to go through a barren tract of country, and, after all, is to cost another million. It is true the honourable member for Christchurch North, at the commencement of his speech, proposed that a diversion should be made, and that £600,000 should be spent right off in constructing the railway from New Plymouth towards Auckland. That would be a most prodigal and, I may say, a most profligate expenditure, and quite consistent with the character of the honourable member for Christchurch North. As every one knows, that honourable member is nothing unless he is spending money—in fact, it is in loans he lives and moves and has his being; without loans he is nowhere. We know that, to our misfortune. Therefore it is quite consistent with his character that he should propose to waste an additional sum of £600,000 on a railway which is entirely unjustifiable. I had it on very good authority from a settler in that district not long ago that the railway was utterly unjustifiable, and that all that was justifiable was the making of a road through the bush, by which to drive fat cattle to Auckland. This is one of the projects of the honourable gentleman, and it would be simply hanging another millstone round our necks. I do not intend to discuss the loan-question at any length. I am always economical with the time of the House, and am not fond of hearing my own voice; but I will refer to a few points that I have gathered since I came into the House. The honourable member for Christchurch North has actually been posing before us as an advocate of economy and as opposed to large borrowing. That is most amusing. If the Ethiopian can change his skin or the leopard his spots, then the honourable member may become an advocate of economy, and for the cessation of borrowing, but not till then; and, if he does advocate that, I have no hesitation in saying—what I really think—that he has some ulterior design, and if he could regain those benches we should then see him borrowing again. We know that a few years ago the honourable gentleman put forth a great scheme for the borrowing of ten millions, but the honourable gentleman found this House would not listen to it, and the proposal never came to anything. I consider that upon the North Island Trunk Loan a saving of £400,000 might be effected. Then, I see there is a railway north of Auckland. A great deal might be saved on that. The only railway I see in this Island that seems to have a good case is the Manawatu Gorge line. There is a very strong case for that; but I have grave doubts whether it is necessary to proceed with that line in the present distressed state of the colony. Coming to the South Island, we have the Otago Central. I think it would be quite possible to make arrangements with a company to take that line over. That would save the Government raising £100,000, or possibly not all that, but at any rate a large sum. I know that a considerable sum is already forestalled. Then, there are other smaller railways in Southland which might be seriously curtailed—the line from Wyndham to Fortrose, and the Seaward Bush line, and various others. We must practise self-denial in these times. Instead of that, the Premier and his Ministry are really tempting the House and the colony to go further into debt and extravagance. I must remind the Treasurer that he has been a strong advocate for this system of Responsible Government—which I think the worst possible system—and he should be consistent. The first function of Responsible Government is that the Ministry should lead the House in the right direction. He is positively leading the House into extravagance. Railways are sticking out everywhere on which large sums of money are to be spent; and he tells us that, if honourable members are so virtuous and self-denying as to resist these, then he will graciously accept their suggestions and propose a smaller amount. I consider that a very improper position to take. He ought to lead the House, and not come forward with proposals which will do no good for the country if they are carried out. Instead of that, these proposals are a temptation to the colony to go on in the old way of borrowing to the utmost

of the credit of the colony; for these proposals do reach that limit. He makes proposals for the sake of getting money squandered about the colony upon works which every one knows will not be remunerative. There are other ways in which I think the Government might have done with less money. For instance, the roads. With the exception of those made for opening up land—which ought to come out of the Land Fund—I think the votes for these roads should be stopped, and a great saving would be effected there. Then, with regard to loans to local bodies, instead of bringing up an amendment to that measure I think it would have been better if a Bill had been brought in to repeal the Act. A saving of £100,000 could be effected there. It is of no use to send members to retrench, and then get money voted which they know full well must come out of loan. The Premier says these payments are to be made out of consolidated revenue. It will never come to that point. The utmost he can do is to pay interest, and I very much fear he will not be able to do that in a few years, at the rate we are going on. Then, as regards the property-tax, I am sorry to see there is a necessity to increase this tax. I shall not oppose it; but I think it would have been much more creditable if the Government had come forward with a proposal to remove the exemptions. That would have brought in a great deal more than this increase to a penny. In my opinion the exemptions are most unjust and impolitic. They release a great number of people from taxation; and encourage them to go on borrowing, because they do not feel the burden of taxation. As put by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, nothing conduces more to economy than that the tax-gatherer should demand the money direct from the person who has to pay it. Whilst on that subject, I may take the opportunity of protesting in the strongest possible terms I can against the heterodox views held by some honourable members on the subject of a progressive property-tax, taxing absentees and British bondholders. All these things are to the last degree injurious, as everybody who knows anything at all about politics ought to know. If you begin to impose these class taxes you will do a thousand times more harm than the paltry amount that will be got is worth. I am sorry to see so many honourable members speaking in that direction. I feel it my duty to protest against it. I always have done so. I may add that, though I have spoken strongly against these proposals of the Government, it is not from any hostile feeling to the Government that I have done so. I fully recognise that the present Ministry is the best we can expect to get at present, and we must for the present keep them in office. But still there is a limit. I do not carry party allegiance to the extent of going against my conscience and supporting proposals which I consider will be detrimental to the country; therefore I cannot vote for the £2,400,000; but I will conclude by adding that, when these railway proposals come into Committee, I hope every member of the House will assist to the utmost extent in reducing these estimates. The Premier has told us that if we give our consent to his going to the London money-market for a much smaller amount than he now proposes he will accept that; and it is with the hope of that being brought about that I have got up to make these few remarks, though I would much rather have sat still.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, it is always very refreshing to hear my honourable friend opposite address the House. We know he does not like Responsible Government. In fact, Sir, almost everything in the way of self-government the honourable gentleman would appear to have a great objection to. He does not think so. He thinks he is a man great in local government. What he is always praying for is a good, sound despotism, tempered by assassination. He always comes to a most satisfactory conclusion so far as I am concerned. Bad as we are, the honourable gentleman is unable to find a better Government, and so he is going to keep us in office. It is therefore very pleasant to me to hear the honourable gentleman say what he does with regard to that. But the honourable gentleman is entirely on the wrong track at the present time. I am very much astonished that the honourable gentleman who moved this amendment could expect the Government to accept this; and I am very much surprised at the honourable gentleman making the speech he did about the works we have proposed. He has gone through the various items without any knowledge as to what the requirements of the country are. I venture to say that, if I were to begin to examine him on any of these items of roads, the honourable gentleman could not tell me what was the necessity or the non-necessity for them. In fact, he knows nothing about them.

Dr. HODGKINSON.—There is the North Island Main Trunk line; there is no necessity for that.

Major ATKINSON.—I am speaking now of roads; I will come to the North Island Trunk line presently. The honourable gentleman has taken up a wrong and untenable position, and a position which the Government declare the honourable gentleman is not justified in assuming. We have seen the honourable gentleman's innocence before during the session, and it may be that he is really unaware of the position which the Government have taken up in this matter. The position the Government took up was this: They said they would be very glad to go into Committee upon the items; they would be very glad, when in Committee upon the public-works estimates, to explain the reason that had induced them to propose each particular work to the House, showing what they did cut down, showing the liabilities, and giving their reasons why they thought, upon the balance of advantage and disadvantage, it would be better to go on with these particular works; and that if, after a non-party discussion—if it were possible to get it, and I hope it is—we came to the conclusion that such a work as the North Island Trunk Railway for instance ought to cease in the interests of the country, we should be prepared to reduce the Loan Bill to that amount.

Sir J. VOGEL.—How can we say so in Committee of Supply? No resolutions are received.

Major ATKINSON.—The honourable gentleman ought to know. I will, however, tell him. Take the Greymouth and Hokitika line as an example. Supposing the House says that no more shall be done to that line, then the question comes, What is the amount required for it? The amount will be stated, and the House votes out that amount—say £10,000 or £20,000. Very well, we should be prepared to take that amount off the loan when we came to it.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN.—Do as we did with the £500,000.

Major ATKINSON.—I am not going to submit to that for a moment, because the difference between the proposals of the present Government and those of that date is as light to dark. There, the Government were proposing as extravagant estimates as were ever proposed. We knew the country could not bear that expenditure. We were not prepared to accept them, and carried an amendment that they should be reduced by a particular sum. We are not going to submit to any such proposition. We do not want a party vote, and I deprecate a party vote in the strongest possible language; but, if the House is willing to assist the Government in reducing any unnecessary expenditure, then the Government will give the Committee their assistance, and will take all the votes struck out, after proper consideration, off the schedule of the loan. Now, I hope there can be no mistake in that condition. I am not at all prepared to agree to any such proposition as the honourable gentleman has made, because it is made without any consideration of the requirements of the country. There is no man who can say that only half a million can be borrowed except the honourable gentleman opposite; and this is the meaning of the amendment: "Borrow only enough to carry on for one year, and then I will come down with a great scheme the year after." That is the proposition. I want the House to understand that there the Government take the issue. The Government stand or fall upon this: that the amount of borrowing which is authorised this session shall extend over a period of not less than three years. That is one point which the Government stand on—not upon this or that item on the schedule. We will consider these fairly and reasonably; we will give our reasons for them, and ask the House to decide; but we say this, and we say it most emphatically: that we must have the borrowing fixed for a certain time. I venture to tell the House that we may give up all idea of retrenchment in the Civil Service or in anything else unless we are prepared to fix our borrowing for a time. There is no doubt that, if we are going in for retrenchment—to reduce the public-works expenditure, to reduce the Consolidated Fund expenditure—there will inevitably, in the course of a year, be a strong reaction against reduction of expenditure; and if we do not now determine what our expenditure shall be for a series of years—in other words, if we do not burn our boats—we shall have extravagance stalking abroad in the land again.

Mr. TURNBULL.—The next Parliament may alter all that.

Major ATKINSON.—We cannot profess to provide for the next Parliament, but we can for the current Parliament, and I wish the House to understand that the Government are not prepared to enter upon this scheme of retrenchment unless the amount of borrowing is fixed for a time. There must be no mistake about that. I can quite understand the honourable member for Christchurch North and his friends saying, "Oh yes, let us make out a good case; let us show the country that the Government only need half a million for next year"—and it is quite true, as I shall show presently, that that is what we shall want—"let us give them that and let them do all the dirty work; and then, when they have become utterly unpopular, we will step in with our great scheme." And that is a scheme outside the one which the honourable gentleman has in his breast. A scheme of large borrowing will be the one. He says he sees his way to do without going on the London money-market. That is all very well, because this House has determined not to let us go on the money-market for some years to come. I want it to be distinctly understood that that is an important part of the policy of the Government—a point from which under no circumstances will they depart. I keep repeating that, because I wish the House to understand it, and do not want honourable gentlemen to get up afterwards and say that I said another thing. What I have stated clearly is this: If the Committee thinks that any of the items in the estimates are not necessary, by all means strike them off; but it must be distinctly understood that the House knows what it is doing; that it is making provision for three years, and not for one; that the Government will not be able to raise a single farthing beyond the million, and that they will pledge themselves, in the most definite terms, not to go on the money-market before a definite time has elapsed. Of course nearly all the arguments of the honourable member for Christchurch North fall to the ground when the House understands the position which the Government take up. It is quite true, as the honourable gentleman says, that we need not take authority this session for more than half a million, if the House is willing to continue a considerable expenditure for the present year, and leave next session of Parliament to determine what loans will then be required. You will notice, Sir, that the honourable member says just the same as I do. He says there is money there, but he deprecates this Parliament binding itself for a definite time. There is just this difference between the policy of the honourable gentleman and that of the Government: He would borrow half a million simply to carry us on till next October. You must borrow that, as I shall show further on; but I hope that the House will mark the difference between our policies—that we are binding ourselves for a definite time, and he would not do so. There is one fallacy in the argument of the honourable gentleman which should be noticed. He tells us there will be a million and a half, supposing we dispose of all the securities now held by the Loan Fund, and if we float our million loan. I venture to say that, if we float it, next session of Parliament will be shocked at the terrible discount we shall have to pay. The honourable gentleman says, "If you have floated your loan, and disposed of all these securities, you will have about a million and a half in hand next March." But he does not tell the House all the facts. There are three funds which are all ear-marked. There is nothing practically in No. 1 Fund; there is about £400,000 in the North Island Trunk Railway loan, which cannot be used for anything else; and the third fund can only be used for the purpose to which it is devoted. Honourable members must not therefore run away with the idea that we shall have a million and a half for general purposes. We shall find that one fund is nearly dry, that another has very little, and that there is no means of getting a transfer of funds from one account to another, unless there are securities to the credit of the fund which has not cash. If we put these funds in credit by voting something to their credit this year, then, no doubt, we can borrow from one fund to the other; but I venture to say that a very great difficulty would arise if we did such a thing. I have looked at all these matters quite as carefully as the honourable gentleman, and I venture to say that I understand them quite as well as he does. I do not pretend to say of him, as he is so much in the habit of saying of me, that he does not understand them; but I say he has entirely misled the House as to the position of affairs, and has done it with the avowed intention of inducing the House only to borrow for one year. And now, Sir, just to show the House how the honourable gentleman has conducted the finances, I will point out this: that if we had not had the North Island Trunk line debentures, which could be sold, and which we could convert into consolidated revenue by means of Treasury bills, we could not have paid our interest last October. The honourable gentleman let the consolidated revenue run completely out, and he depended on the telegraph to remit £600,000 to pay interest due in that month, because he had made no arrangement until September. The consolidated revenue had only a few hundred pounds in it that month, and in the next month—October—we had to pay £600,000 in London. The honourable gentleman made no provision for that until September, and then he had to go to a local bank to borrow the £600,000, and he practically remitted the whole of it by telegraph to pay the interest due, and he got it in this way. He, fortunately, had the credit from the North Island Trunk Loan, which is supposed to be "ear-marked;" but he pledged it to the bank, and issued deficiency bills for £300,000. And all these he telegraphed Home. That is the way the honourable gentleman has been conducting our finance, and I thought it my duty to tell the House of it when the honourable gentleman takes up such a position as he has done on this occasion. I say it is a disgrace to any colony to conduct its finances in such a way. It was just possible that the local bank could not have found the £600,000; and where should we have been then? I say that sort of thing must be put a stop to, and we have no right to conduct our business in that way. The honourable gentleman gave us a very pretty disquisition as to the duties of a Treasurer. I might tell him that if I had anything to do with him he would have to act very differently from what he did on that occasion. There is no doubt he thought that by raising a loan at the end of October, and by getting advances in London on account of the North Island Trunk Loan, he could meet these liabilities; but he found that such was the state of our credit in London that he could not get a halfpenny advance, and so had to fall back on a local institution to find, at a moment's notice, £600,000 to keep up the credit of the colony. That is the state in which the honourable gentleman got the finances, after being in office no less than three years. And now, Sir, I want to show the House what we have got to do. In April next we have to meet liabilities of something like £1,300,000 in cash. It is true we have a right to obtain a further advance from the bank to the extent of £400,000, so that we have to find, actually, some £900,000; and we have no means of finding it. The honourable gentleman says the difficulty begins in October; but I say the difficulty is greater in April, for this reason: that we have no revenue. As honourable gentlemen know, the financial year begins in April, and we have to start by finding £600,000 for interest. That is our great difficulty. It is true that October will be almost equally difficult, because by the time we have paid the April interest we shall have run on to October, and got the revenue for six months. We shall be therefore very much in the same position as in April, but not quite so bad. The honourable gentleman says that all our deficiency bills will be taken up in April, because we are borrowing to pay off the deficiency which he left from last year and the deficiency for this year; but the fallacy of the honourable gentleman's argument is, that those bills are paper, and not cash. The honourable gentleman warns us not to bind ourselves not to borrow in the London market, because we cannot get more locally. "I have got as much as I can, and therefore you must not bind yourselves not to go to the London market." And now he talks of raising £400,000 from this loan and £500,000 from deficiency bills, as if it were a very easy matter. But I tell him there is great difficulty in the matter, and I do not know whether the House recognises that we have £995,000 of deficiency bills at the present moment. It is quite true that we shall be able by the end of next year to pay off £400,000 of them, but I do not think we can pay more; and if we get authority to borrow £400,000 to meet deficiency bills, and if we get that as well, which is not at all certain, we shall be able to take up another £400,000, and we shall immediately have to issue that again in order to meet the interest we have to pay in April. That, Sir, is the position of affairs now; and I tell the House that the honourable gentleman, like myself, must have been spending last year in perpetually worrying as to the fund from which he could get sufficient to carry on from day to day. That has been the position; and I say it is a wretched sort of finance, and a finance that no Government of such a colony as this should ever submit to, and that no Parliament should permit to continue for an hour longer than can possibly be avoided. Then, the honourable gentleman is very virtuous indeed upon the wrong the Government is going to do in asking for authority to borrow this £400,000, and taking the option of going to London for it if it should be necessary. But, Sir, I propose exactly what the honourable gentleman himself proposed in 1886. Like himself, I intend, if possible, to borrow the money locally. I should not dream of going to London if it could be possibly avoided; but I have followed the exact wording of the honourable gentleman's own proposal, when he proposed to meet the deficit that I left on going out of office in 1884. He followed the same course as I shall follow: he put the securities on the colonial market, not on the London market, though he took power to go to the London market; and I venture to say that honourable members will not desire to circumscribe the power of the Colonial Treasurer in this respect, when they know how we are pressing on local requirements. I think it would be exceedingly unwise to go on the London money-market if it could be possibly avoided, and I do not intend to do it; but I shall venture to ask the House, for the reasons given by the honourable gentleman himself, to give authority to go there, if it should be found to be necessary, at the discretion of the Colonial Treasurer, for, Sir, we must bear this in mind: that we must meet our engagements; and I venture to say that it is the honourable gentleman's finance only that has brought us to this difficulty at the present time. Without wishing in any way to press honourable members, and without saying for a moment that we shall not get out of our difficulties—for I am sure we shall—I say that, bad as our state was in 1879, the colony is in a much worse position at the present time with regard to its finances than it was then.

Mr. KERR.—It keeps on getting worse every year.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; and as long as we permit Governments to finance us out of our difficulties—and that is what we have been doing for the past three years—we shall keep on getting worse and worse. Then, the honourable gentleman said, "Look at the expenditure. The Government are already increasing the expenditure over ours. We only spent so much up to September last, and the present Government are going to spend more during the last six months of the year." If the honourable gentleman had asked his late colleague, the honourable member for Kaiapoi, he would have told him that invariably the expenditure is greater in the second half of the year than it is in the first half. That is always the rule: the increase begins about October, and the works are pushed on during the summer months, and the expenditure steadily increases. That cannot be disputed; there is no question about it.

Mr. KERR.—My experience is that Government work is always done in the winter-time, and not in the summer, when it ought to be done, and when it can be done much more cheaply.

Major ATKINSON.—That is only the local bodies.

Mr. KERR. — Well, they cannot get the money from the Government before to do it.

Major ATKINSON.—There is no doubt at all that that has been so; but I shall try, while I am in office, to see if I cannot give you the money for expenditure during the summer months.

Mr. KERR.—Oh, I do not want it. We have got no works this time.

Major ATKINSON.—I am very glad to hear there is one virtuous constituency at any rate. That is very satisfactory. The honourable member for Christchurch North goes on to say that we propose to spend so much more next year that we must of necessity have another loan within twelve months' time. But that is what the Government mean to avoid; and we ask the House to tie our hands absolutely so that we shall not get another loan, for I venture to say that, if our hands are not tied, another loan will be proposed. We should have been greatly rejoiced if we could have proposed a reduction on what we now ask for, but our engagements are so large that it is impossible to reduce the expenditure during the next year to less than £70,000 a month; and I do hope my honourable friend the Minister for Public Works will be able to succeed in bringing the expenditure to within £70,000 a month. We propose to limit the expenditure to £70,000 a month for the next eleven months. We have reduced that rate of expenditure for the next year, and half that rate for the following year, and half that again the year after; and then the amount will be reduced so low that it will be in the power of this House to discontinue the works if it should think that desirable. The honourable gentleman has picked out certain railways with which he tells us we ought not to go on, and he has picked out certain others with which he says we should go on. These are questions to consider in Committee, but I notice—and it is a curious thing—that, wherever the honourable gentleman thinks he can improve his political position, there he says our estimates are wrong. Look at the honourable gentleman's proposals for the West Coast. He says, "What is £70,000?" Where is he going to get £70,000? Of course it means a large borrowing scheme next year. I am not going at any length into these matters; but I venture to say that in Committee, when the House hears our reasons for these various proposals, honourable members will think them reasonable; and I venture to say also that the House will support us in not making further expenditure on the particular railway the honourable gentleman has alluded to on the West Coast—that between Hokitika and Greymouth. There is undoubtedly great difficulty in deciding with which particular works to go on and which to leave off, and honourable gentlemen with any sense of responsibility will carefully consider the circumstances of each case as we have done. It is all very well to say that there is only a gap of four miles, and it ought to be filled up. That sounds very reasonable; but when we come to look all over the country we find so many gaps of four or five or six miles that it would take another million and a half to fill them all up, and therefore we take a stand and say we must be prepared to leave a number of works unfinished. But, as far as the Government are able to judge, they will all be brought according to our proposals to such a state that there will be no absolute loss through not completing them, and it is impossible for us to do anything more than that, and we ought not, if it can possibly be avoided, to do less. Then, there is another point which I would like to draw the attention of the House to, and it is this: The honourable member for Dunedin Central has proposed that the loan should be reduced to half a million. Does he mean that the whole of that should be spent during the next year?

Major Atkinson

Dr. FITCHETT.—No.

Major ATKINSON.—Well, does the honourable gentleman think that should keep us for the next three years?

Dr. FITCHETT.—Yes.

Major ATKINSON.—Very well. That is a different point, and so far my argument does not apply. The honourable gentleman, therefore, is taking a different stand from that taken by the late Colonial Treasurer, and cannot vote with him. Then, I will put this to the honourable gentleman: Has he considered what would be the effect of so almost complete a stoppage of public works throughout the country?

Dr. FITCHETT.—Yes.

Major ATKINSON.—Very well. I am very sorry the honourable gentleman did not tell us what would be the effect. The Government have had to carefully consider that, for they are responsible not only for the country's finance, but also for the general condition of the country, and we have to see that depression is not brought unduly on the country if it can be prevented. I venture to say that, when the House hears the reasons why the Government propose this particular amount, honourable members will see at once that to make a larger reduction would really mean to imperil the colony's labour-market and its finance. I do not say that it would dangerously imperil it, but it would very seriously increase the difficulties under which we are now labouring. It is not only the actual amount less to be spent among the working-classes that has to be considered, but we have to consider the stoppage of works absolutely necessary for the settlement of the country. No doubt we shall be told how many men we shall knock off, and there will be honourable members who may say, "Never mind that, they must take the consequences, but let us have drastic remedies." Well, as to some of the works, it will be for the House to say if less than what the Government propose shall be done; but, for myself, and speaking on behalf of the Government, I think we have gone to a prudent limit. I would caution honourable members, before deciding, to look cautiously into the effect of a complete stoppage of borrowing now. One very important effect would be the throwing-out of our exchange; and that would very seriously affect the commerce of the country for a time. A sudden stoppage of our borrowing would mean a complete alteration in our exchange. Then, the stoppage of necessary works would be another very important point, and the general feeling of depression would undoubtedly be heightened if we discharged a thousand or fifteen hundred men, when, unfortunately, work all over the country is not so plentiful as we should like it to be. And, again, of course, another point would be that a large proportion of the works that we propose to bring to reasonably complete points would be left at stages which would involve an actual money loss. We may be told, as we have been by some honourable members, that as to some works the first loss is the best. But the Government have adopted that principle, and, where we see it would be useless to go on further, we do not propose to go on—we have determined to stop at once. So that point seems to me to be met by the proposals of the Government. Then the honourable gentleman says that the proposals of the Government are to enable them to borrow largely in order that they may spend, and that there is nothing binding in the proposal of the Government to extend this money over three years. Well, the Government are quite willing, and not only willing, but anxious, to be tied up in the most secure way the House can devise.

Dr. FITCHETT.—The most secure way is not to get the money.

Major ATKINSON.—Undoubtedly that is a very secure way, and, if the House does not want the Government to have the money to spend, that is the way to adopt. I do not want to say very much about the amount of the loan now. So long as it is kept to reasonable limits, that is all we want; but what I do want to see insisted on is that, whatever the amount is, it shall be absolutely fixed as all that there shall be for the next three years. We can discuss the items which will make up the total in Committee; but I do ask the House to fix that the amount of the total shall be all that shall be had for three years. That is all I want. But that is not the proposal of the honourable member for Christchurch North at all. The honourable member for Christchurch North says what we want to get is unlimited borrowing-powers. That is ridiculous. We do not want it. We want so small a sum that in another breath the honourable gentleman declares that what we ask for cannot be sufficient. One argument cuts the other from under his feet. I say that the proposals of the Government are reasonable, if we are really determined to actually taper off. That is the policy we want to carry out. The honourable gentleman says that the Statement is like a Chinese puzzle—very pretty to look at, but difficult to work; but I think it will work if we are serious in our determination gradually to bring our borrowing to a conclusion. I will not trouble the House further, but I will merely sum up the position, so that there may be no mistake about it. The Government are not prepared to accept the amendment proposed by the honourable member for Dunedin Central. They were, however, prepared to go into Committee and carefully to consider each item, not resting tacit in the matter, but giving every information so as to assist the Committee in every reasonable reduction which it may think necessary; and if the Committee sees its way to strike off a certain item, if it says it will cut off the Otago Central or the North Island Trunk line, or any other work, or if it says it will not build schools this year, or hospitals, or gaols, or any other public buildings, then we shall be prepared to take out of the schedule to the Loan Bill whatever amount would have been required for those works; but further than that the Government are not prepared to go. I wish the House to clearly understand the position the Government take up.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, when a conquering race enter a country they first of all rob the inhabitants of their land. They then set them to work upon public roads, in order that they may render valuable to their conquerors the land which has been taken from themselves. Then, when they have got control of the country, they determine to burn their boats, that they may remain in possession, and that none may escape. That is the policy of burning the boats. We have seen it illustrated in America by the Spaniards, and one hoped that such a scene would not be witnessed again in the world. Now, I beg the House to remember that the transactions in which we are engaged to-night are very real transactions, and very sad ones. The present Government—and I appeal to the House to bear me out whether I am not correct in this—have not, during the present session, up to the present time, introduced a single measure which will settle the difficulties of this country—not a single measure which will relieve the farmers from distress, or which will benefit the industries of the colony,—not a single one. On the contrary they have robbed us of our lands, they have robbed the people extensively of their property, and have avowed that, having so robbed them, they will set them to work upon the public roads, to give value to the very land which they have handed over to those who are the conquerors of the colony. What has the honourable gentleman set forth to-night? He is following out a policy really of barbarians, although they are sometimes supposed to be civilised men. I ask, is not that a true description of the policy which we have had brought before us this session? And now the Premier proposes to fix the necessary expenditure for three years. Did he not say in distinct words that he was determined to make the sums he borrowed last for that time—that he will persist in that, even though he knows that following out that line of policy will produce great distress in the country, much misery in the country, and although he knows that in consequence of that distress and that misery great dissatisfaction will arise? What does this drastic system amount to? Simply to burning the boats, so that none shall escape from the territory which he is reducing to ruin and to misery.

Major ATKINSON.—No; burning the boats is stopping the borrowing.

Sir G. GREY.—He distinctly said what I am repeating.

Major ATKINSON.—I said, Stop the further borrowing.

Sir G. GREY.—Yes; that was it.

Major ATKINSON.—Hear, hear.

Sir G. GREY.—Precisely. He would borrow so much, spend the whole of it, and produce these results; and then, by burning the boats, prevent other people from leaving the colony, while he himself would fly in some skiff from the country, abandoning his post, and leaving the blame to fall upon those who would be compelled to take his place. I appeal to the whole House: is not that the truth? Is it not a just and true deduction to be drawn from the policy which the honourable gentleman puts before us? He said he would ruin our credit in the London market, so that we should not be able to borrow any further sums.

Major ATKINSON.—No; I did not say that at all.

Sir G. GREY.—What was the meaning of what the honourable gentleman said? He said positively that he was going to borrow so much, and that he would pledge himself that for that period of time no further sums should be borrowed—that is, no further relief should be obtained from any misery he might create. Now, that is the policy which I wish to expose. I do not know what name I can apply to such a policy as that; but I wish to say that it is not a policy which angels would recommend for our adoption. It is a policy regardless of the welfare of the people. It is a policy which cannot but do injury to the colony. He said we shall carry out reductions which will injure the many.

Major ATKINSON.—No; I never said that at all.

Sir G. GREY.—The honourable gentleman really does not know what he did say. I say no one, except a person devoid of reason, or a child, could have stood up and proposed such a policy as he recommended to the House. I say it is an unfair policy in all respects. Here was the other policy presented to him: "Let us borrow what we conceive to be necessary for the present; let us carry out all reductions that may be carried out without injury to the colony—and they are many; and then let us have a sufficient sum for a short period of time. If we find that we have made a mistake let us then borrow such further sums as we may require to meet the emergencies that may arise." We burn our boats, or adopt a boat-burning policy indeed—a policy which is to ruin the country, and to drive the people from it! Does he believe that any sensible man who had money to enable him to escape from the country would fail to do so? Does he believe that the labouring-classes, if they thought that a policy of this kind was to be adopted, would not fly from the country before the boats were burned? And what resource is there to be left open to them? I put that to the House. They are to be handed over to the tender mercies of a foreign company, and are to be put by that foreign company to work upon roads—on land that belongs to themselves as the people of the country. They will be compelled to render their own lands of great value by their own labour, and then see those lands pass away to other persons. Then reductions are to be made, which will compel them to go upon these works. Strangers are to be brought in to form what is called a Railway Board, in order to reduce the wages of the labouring-people. These Railway Commissioners are to be brought in to act as buffers between the Government and the people, so that the Government may escape the reproaches which should rest upon them for what they are now doing. People will complain, and the Premier will stand up and say, "Not upon me rests the blame. It is these gentlemen whom I have put into these offices to perform this work who are to blame." I think I have fairly exposed the new policy which he proposes to adopt. I have shown, in a very few words, that it is better that we should borrow that which we actually require and nothing more. Let us try the experiment of these reductions which are being carried out. Let us see that they are done in a merciful manner. Let us prevent the people from being handed over to this foreign company. I say that we should act mercifully in regard to our reductions, and that we should borrow no more than is absolutely necessary for twelve months, and then, if we find we have made a mistake and have not borrowed all we require, we can borrow such further sums as may be deemed necessary. But this is a wild policy, borrowing a certain large sum, based on a mere guess at our wants, and giving an undertaking to borrow no more for three years. It is burning our boats. I say that it is a barbarous policy, and one which this House ought not to adopt. I pray honourable gentlemen on the Government benches to adopt the middle course which has been recommended to them. Let us not pledge ourselves to borrow any particular sum and to stop there; but let the world see that we do not borrow a single penny which our wants do not require. Let us not put into power, and keep there, men who are determined to embark upon the desperate policy the nature of which we have had sketched out to us. For I say distinctly that if the boats are burned, so that the bulk of the people cannot escape, the Premier will discover some skiff in which he may fly from the misery that he has created; and that others, who take the places of himself and his friends, will have to bear the blame of his conduct, as they have had to do in former years, when he has relinquished the government of this country.

MR. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—I rise to make a very few remarks on the Public Works Statement; and I feel impelled to do so not so much because I wish to say something as because I have something to say. That something may not be very important—I do not think it is; yet it is necessary to me that I should place upon record the views I hold. Still, I shall not take up much time, for all that I have to say can be said in a very few minutes. I recognise, Sir, that at this period of the session it is not of much use speaking at all. Nothing that any one can say now is likely greatly to affect the policy now before us. I have listened to both sides, and within the last few minutes I have listened to the speech of the Premier, taking a few notes; but I find that the honourable member for Auckland Central has so exhaustively answered that honourable gentleman, and refuted him on so many points on which he placed reliance, that I think it is not necessary for me to criticize him at any length. The Premier, towards the close of his speech, said something to the honourable gentleman who moved the amendment, or to some honourable gentleman opposite, to this effect: He asked him if he had considered the effect of stopping the public-works policy throughout the colony—if he had considered that it would increase the difficulties under which we were suffering. I consider that in that sentiment lies the whole gist of the policy he has now laid before the House. I believe that his policy is based more upon that than upon any other consideration, and that the Government, and probably any other Government that could be formed from the other side of the House, do borrow and will continue borrowing for no other reason than that they are afraid to stop it. It is not that it could not be stopped; it is that they are afraid of the immediate consequences of ceasing to borrow. I think, if that sentence means anything at all, it means that we are going on borrowing for borrowing's sake. But, if what the Premier says is true, that the stoppage of borrowing will cause so many evils in this country that it will deepen the depression, how then is he justified in saying to honourable members that if they choose to cut down the loan to any extent they please he will accept the reduction? If depression will follow the cessation of borrowing to the extent he claims, then I say that he ought not to so readily accept from this House the curtailment of these borrowing proposals. But I hold that no such effect will follow the cessation of borrowing. I do not believe it myself—I never did believe it. Then, he quite forgot that the cessation of borrowing will, without any doubt, have the effect of making this country ever so much more attractive to capitalists, who would become the private employers out here, and there is no comparison between the Government as an employer and private employers throughout the country. Then, so far as concerns the employment of labour, the honourable gentleman also forgot that we are to have lines constructed on the land-grant system. There is the East and West Coast Railway, which he has taken under his wing; and a Bill has recently been passed to enable the Otago Central line to be constructed on the same principle; and it has also been proposed to construct a northern line in the same manner. I think he has overlooked the fact that many lines could be constructed in the same way, and that borrowing, so far as these lines are concerned, might cease, and yet the lines themselves be carried on. It seemed to me that when the Premier made what was apparently a slip, and said that borrowing was necessary to our salvation, he really meant it, though he changed the expression afterwards to "that it was necessary to settlement."

MAJOR ATKINSON.—I did not say borrowing; I said certain works.

MR. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—I fail to see where the distinction lies, seeing that we have to borrow to make the works.

AN HON. MEMBER.—Necessary to the salvation of the Government?

MR. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—I did not say necessary to the salvation of the Government, although that probably has something to do with it also; but I think the expression made use of was not so much a mistake as might appear at first sight, but that the honourable gentleman thinks a continuation of the borrowing policy is necessary for the salvation of the country. Now, Sir, about this policy—the policy we have before us—I will say candidly at once that I do not like it. From first to last it has been a pill which I have endeavoured to swallow to the best of my ability. I have endeavoured to swallow it with what my honourable friend the Minister of Education would call "heroic splendour." I notice that the House takes the proposal very easily, and that the country also takes the borrowing proposals with the same coolness.

AN HON. MEMBER.—No.

MR. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—Well, Sir, I say so very sadly; it appears to me that they do. It appears to me that there is very little use in fighting them. A few months ago it appeared likely that we were to have a very different state of affairs here; and I have for some time past been speculating upon the reasons for the change, and the conclusion I have come to is this: that the public and this House are led off the scent; that the country, as it were, has its mind clouded and its judgment led astray by some of the retrenchments the Government has proposed or is now about carrying out.

AN HON. MEMBER.—They are not done yet.

MR. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—No; but I believe that they are very honestly attempted, and are going to be done. There are some upon which I do not place much importance myself; but I think the one item of retrenchment that has led the country astray more than anything else has been the proposal of the Government to reduce their own salaries. I do honestly think that. I do not say for one instant that the Government made the proposal for that purpose. I think they have done it very honestly, very radically, and very well; but it has had that effect all the same. The Government, in this matter, is exactly in the position of an author who, in putting forth a book, should attach to it a very modest and self-depreciatory preface. It has the effect of disarming criticism. It ought not to do so, but it does. Their proposal to reduce their own salaries had upon the country, from the very beginning, that effect. The public very naturally said: If these people are prepared to deal so radically with themselves, you may depend upon it everything else is in the same proportion. That naturally would be the effect; and I believe it has been the effect with respect to these borrowing proposals. It is quite true that, like the preface I have spoken of, the act ought to disarm truculent criticism—it ought to disarm all criticism of that sort; but it ought not to disarm judicial and proper criticism. At any rate I am not going to let it do so in my case. Before I say much about the borrowing proposals, I may here repeat the substance of what I had occasion to say during a previous debate, as it is necessary to my present argument. I said the other night on the railway question that I believe what is wrong with this country now is that railway-construction has outrun the population and trade of the country. That is susceptible of almost mathematical proof; but I am not going over the entire ground again. It happens that we here in New Zealand have got the same mileage of railway that they have in Victoria and New South Wales, though they have double our population. The Victorian railways pay  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the New South Wales  $2\frac{1}{2}$ , while ours pay £2 6s. per cent.: that is to say, those colonies, with double our population and the same mileage of railway, pay double the interest. Therefore it is quite clear that the management of our railways is not to blame, and the only conclusion that any logical mind can come to is that the railways have outrun the population and the trade. Then, again, I also pointed out—and I refer to it now merely for the purpose of argument—that ever since 1881 every mile we have added to our railway system has almost in exact proportion reduced our profits. Therefore, if that is the evil, the question arises, What should be the cure? And I venture to say no one will dispute that we ought to cease railway-construction—so far, that is, as concerns loans—and let the population and trade grow. Now, these being my views, I naturally regard with some suspicion any attempt to unduly expand the public-works policy while the population is all but stationary. I maintain that a few months ago this colony was ripe for a radical change on this very subject; and I maintain with equal confidence that no radical change is indicated in the Public Works Statement that I have now before me. It follows slavishly upon the old lines, with this difference alone: that it has dropped out of the general schedule a few unimportant railways; but it keeps all others going, and proposes tolerable sums—some small and some large—of borrowed money to be dribbled away over a certain number of years, with, however, the intention of reducing them as time goes on until they reach what is called the vanishing-point. Now, although the vanishing-point is mentioned, there is nothing at all to show that it is going to be reached for many many years: in fact, it is doubtful if it will be reached, according to the lines of the Public Works Statement, within this generation. Can any one believe that the expenditure upon our public works will be reduced at anything like the rate which the Public Works Statement professes it will be? Have we anything to guide us in coming to a conclusion upon the matter? I say that we have almost absolute proof in the history of the past that such will not be the case; that we are doomed to failure in the future as in the past. And I think we can get that proof if we take the trouble to compare the Financial Statement of 1882 with that of the present year. I select the Financial Statement of 1882, simply because it was the Financial Statement introduced by the honourable gentleman who is now at the head of the Government, and therefore, dealing with proposed loans, it affords us some sort of guide by which we can judge the value of the present proposals. Now, I venture to assert that if I were to read out promiscuously extracts from the Financial Statement of 1882 and that of 1887 there are very few members in this House who would be able to say at the moment which of those Statements I was quoting from. It is not only that the ideas are the same, and that the arguments are the same; but we have almost the ipsissima verba. I have taken the trouble to run out in parallel columns some extracts from these two Statements. We have in the Statement of 1882 arguments showing the necessity and advisableness of the loan, all of which are applicable to the present Statement, and are embodied to some extent in it. We have here in the Statement of 1887,—

“From the past we should take warning, and proceed at a very much more moderate pace than we have been doing upon the average for the past ten years. We must confine ourselves, in borrowed money, to works of necessity, or to works which are directly reproductive.”

Then we have the same necessity for moderation in 1887:—

“We want so to shape our public-works expenditure as to be able to cease borrowing entirely at an early date. We want first, and at once, to reduce this expenditure, to reduce it largely, and to reduce it at a constantly-increasing rate, so as practically and within a short time to reach the vanishing-point."

That is the vanishing-point of which I have spoken. Then there are a few arguments about the necessity of the loan. We have in 1882,—

"The Government, then, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the colony, and acting upon the principles which I have just laid down, have determined, Sir, to propose to Parliament a loan of £3,000,000 to be raised, and expended at a rate not exceeding £1,000,000 per annum."

Then, in 1887,—

"The Government therefore, though with great reluctance, recommend that authority should be granted for a loan, during the present session, of £1,000,000, to be raised at such time as under all circumstances the Government may deem most favourable."

It will be observed that the difference is, in one case the Government, after a great deal of "consideration" agree to this, and in the other the Government express very "great reluctance," for there is always a great deal of reluctance where a loan is to be raised. Then, I have extracts about tying up; and these, I think, are really very remarkable. First of all, in 1882, we have this:—

"My honourable colleague the Minister for Public Works, when he makes the Public Works Statement, will inform the Committee in detail of the items of the proposed expenditure, and of the mode by which we hope to confine the expenditure to specific works determined upon by Parliament before the money is borrowed."

"If Parliament agrees to this, we shall ask that the purpose of this loan shall be distinctly defined; that no new undertakings shall be put in hand; and, further, that we shall give a distinct pledge that no more borrowing will take place for three years from March, 1888."

In this case, after having shown the House the necessity for moderation, we were told in 1882 that they were going to confine the expenditure within a million a year. I would ask, what about the million a year to which the borrowing was going to be confined? Why, according to one of the tables in the Public Works Statement the Government itself gave the figures, showing that the amount within the period the honourable gentleman was in office was, on an average, about £1,300,000 a year; so that the question naturally arises, If the honourable gentleman could not confine the borrowing within his million, then how is he likely to confine it within £750,000 now? If we were to judge by all that has been said upon the subject of tying up, every loan we borrow ought to be tied up with a thousand knots; but, somehow, these knots were loosened as fast as we tied them. I do not see anything in this Bill that is calculated to tie up the loan at all. I wish to give it as my opinion, and to state most emphatically, that, looking to the stereotyped phrases used in those Statements, it is high time the mould in which this wild borrowing Statement is cast should be broken up, and the type scattered to the four winds of heaven. It is evident the type is still there. I have listened to the speeches on both sides of the House, and I have heard the leader of the Opposition and the Premier arguing hotly about the balances that are in hand, and about the expenditure we ought to make within the next few years; but the arguments on both sides are based upon the assumption that, under any circumstances, whatever the rate may be, borrowing must go on in some shape or form. Nothing satisfactory have we heard about the desirableness of stopping borrowing altogether; and the reason is very plain: It is because we have been running in a rut for seventeen long years, and those two gentlemen have been closely associated with the government during that period. We have been keeping in a rut for seventeen years, and it is not to be wondered at if at the end of that period we cannot help the wheels of the Government out of it; and I do not think either of those two honourable gentlemen proposes to do so. Every one will admit that borrowing in any civilised country under any circumstances ought to be but a mere chapter in the book of a nation's history, and not the history itself. It ought to be an incident in the life of a nation, and not the life itself. But, according to the principles we go upon in this colony now, the leader of the Opposition and the Premier have taken it for granted that we must have a loan at such periods as will enable us to have a certain amount of loan-money to spend every year. Now, I think it must be admitted that the very same arguments, the aims, and the hopes, and the expectations which are expressed now, will, at the end of three years, be expressed again; because I feel perfectly satisfied that, so far as concerns the amount of the loan and the expenditure of loan-money, before the end of the three years and a half there will be the same failure then as there has been in the past. Of that I have very little doubt. We were to keep within a million. We spent £1,300,000. Now we are to keep within £750,000, and it is easy enough to see what will be the result. And what is the prospect before us? It is just this: It appears to me the Government have arranged the thing so that for three years and a half they will have enough money to keep them going on comfortably; and it is natural, I suppose, for any Government to look at its own life and that alone. Three years is about the natural term of a Government's life in this country; and what will be the result before the three years are over,—possibly at the end of two? In two or three years' time the Government, for some reason or another which we cannot now foresee, will be overthrown. And what will the new Government find? The same old story—that contracts have been entered into, that there are liabilities to meet, large and important works to finish; and they will immediately demand another loan. Of that I have no doubt whatever. It will be a re-enactment of practically the same thing. I have said I do not like these proposals, and in saying so I have spoken the simple truth. It seems to me, after the exhibition we have had to-night—I do not use the word offensively, but after the exhibition we have had to-night, both from the Premier and the leader of the Opposition, over this question of borrowing, and looking to the Statements made in the past when their positions were transposed, it appears to me as if, on this question of borrowing, every leader when in opposition says, like the celebrated Israelite of old, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" But when that Israelite became king he did the very same thing. The Premier and the leader of the Opposition have done the same thing. As soon as the leader of the Opposition becomes Premier he rushes into borrowing as naturally as possible, and keeps it going just as his predecessor has done. My own opinion—and I never disguised it; I said it before the country, and say so now—my own opinion is that it is high time the public-works policy was absolutely wound up, strangled. It was never intended originally to go the length it has gone. It is time the Government proposals should go this far, at any rate: They should say, "We propose to wind up the second period of our public-works policy,"—because this is the second period. The first period was for ten years; but before the ten years were out it happened, most unfortunately, most disastrously for this colony, that the portfolio of Public Works was in the hands of my late much-lamented friend Mr. James Macandrew. I say it was an unfortunate thing the portfolio of Public Works was then in my late friend's hands, because he started the ball rolling again; and the present leader of the Opposition gave it a fresh roll in 1884. It was never intended to go to the length it has gone now, and all the circumstances demand the winding-up of the second period of it. The Premier, in the course of his speech to-night, said, in reply to some honourable members, that they had not entered into particulars with regard to any of these lines as to what should be done away with and what gone on with. I do not think it is the duty of any honourable gentleman or of the House to take that line at all, and I blame the Government very much for the spirit in which they have come before the House with their proposals. I should be very glad to see the loan reduced, but I do not see much chance of getting it done; and it is not to be expected, unless the Government were to do what they have not done, and that is, have the nerve to come down to the House and tell us what railways ought to be carried on absolutely and what left out. Instead of that, they have left it to the House, and say they will reduce their loan accordingly afterwards. I maintain that they should have led the House in the matter. Amongst these lines, I think some one mentioned the North Island Trunk line, and I have no hesitation in saying that that line ought not to be carried any further. I have myself advocated that line in the past, and I would advocate it now if the colony were in a position to carry it on;

but I do not think it is in that position, and, although it may be carried on at some future time, I think no more money should be spent on it now than is in hand for the purpose. I do not speak about that line because there is one in my district which is to be prosecuted. It must be borne in mind that the Otago Central line has been practically abandoned beyond Middlemarch, and that distance is only a very small portion of it. The original length of line authorised to be made was 183 miles, and Middlemarch is only forty miles; while all beyond that is to be carried on under the Bill of the honourable member for the Dunstan. That shows that the representatives of Otago are not acting selfishly. By consenting to support the Bill of the honourable member for the Dunstan they are permitting the Government to confide to private enterprise, beyond Middlemarch, the prosecution of a railway which has great claims on the colony. Surely sacrifices should not be demanded from them alone! But I think there are other lines which should be placed in the same position. There is the line from Helensville northward, which I think ought not to be prosecuted any further; and I have no hesitation in saying that the unexpended balance for that line should be used not for the benefit of any particular place, but for such purposes as will be desirable for the interest of the whole colony—that is to say, on lines which an impartial tribunal should say ought to be carried on for that purpose. It appears to me, from the evidence before us, that no Government can stand in New Zealand without a loan. I shall not dilate on the reasons for this; but it appears to me that that is the position, and the borrowing now proposed will entail so much more borrowing that it will amount in the end to some four or five millions altogether. We have, first of all, this loan; then there is the North Island Trunk Loan, which is already authorised; and then, inevitably, the floating debt of half a million will have to be refunded; and then the North Island Trunk line has been under-estimated by a million and a quarter, and the ordinary under-estimates of other lines will make up another half-million. Then, again, when these lines have been carried to a certain point it will be found necessary to carry them still farther. Take, for instance, the Helensville line. I think there are only about four miles formed, and to carry it to the terminus as originally proposed will take £640,000. They propose to take it four miles farther now, then another four miles, and when it has gone to that point it will have to be taken still farther; and so on till the end of time, or until some Government has courage to come down with a proposal to mark finality to this second period of our public-works policy. I have only a word or two to say on the other part of the loan, which is to be devoted to roads and bridges and telephones, and so on. Of course some expenditure will be necessary on all these things; but I think we are providing things which are really luxuries, but which, from long practice, we have come to look upon as necessities. There is a great deal spent on roads which should not be spent at all. There has been money spent on opening up Crown lands for sale, and we have got accustomed to that expenditure and cannot do without it; but it is only seven or eight years ago that the practice began, and before it commenced we sold more land and had more settlement than there has ever been since. But it is regarded as a necessity now; and so it is with the money spent on other things which formerly were regarded as luxuries. I have only to say, in conclusion, that, so far as retrenchment goes, we have had some measures of retrenchment; but I think many of these measures are mere bagatelles compared with what could be done in retrenching our borrowing, because it is the system of borrowing which necessitates retrenchment, and so long as we keep up borrowing we shall be face to face with retrenchment and distress. Therefore I say the first thing to do is to bring down proposals to set a reasonable limit to borrowing, and these, I maintain, we have not had yet. I do not see how the amendment of the honourable member for Dundee Central can possibly be accepted, because, when he moves that the loan be cut down to half a million, he attaches no provision which closes the door to the London money-market; and, if that is the case, we do not gain much by limiting the borrowing. I hope that when we are in Committee on the public-works estimates honourable members, disregarding any local or particular consideration, will proceed vigorously to cut down expenditure to such an extent as will admit of a reduction of the loan by something not far short of half a million; and if the Committee does that it will have done the finest work that has ever yet been done in New Zealand. Still, I think the Government are very much to blame for lacking at this juncture the courage to say that this public-works policy shall cease. They have not done so, and, instead, have followed slavishly in the lines of their predecessors.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—Sir, I have listened to a speech to-night that we have expected for some time—the speech delivered by the honourable member for Mount Ida. I listened to it with great interest, with some pleasure, and with a great deal of pain; and this is what I would say of it: Words, words, words! Sir, the country will never be saved by words, especially where those words run so distinctly counter to deeds. We have heard that honourable gentleman this evening, and we have heard the honourable member for Wallace this evening, and I venture to say that a more extraordinary or humiliating spectacle has seldom been witnessed in this House. How they do crouch under the whip of their lord and master! How they do wince and flinch as they feel that thong cut into their loins! What capers they perform! What an amusing spectacle it is for the Opposition!—amusing if it were not that in this way we see how the verdict of the country is disregarded. The honourable member for Mount Ida, methinks, doth protest too much this evening. He made an excellent speech in one direction, and followed it up by acting in precisely the opposite direction. Now, he may possibly think that his words will go to the country, and be of some weight in the nation, and that his actions will be thought very little of. If that is his opinion, it speaks very little for the value which he attaches to his action. But the country, like this House, thinks that deeds are of more importance than words, and looks not so much to what these honourable gentlemen say as to what they do. I suppose the honourable gentleman tries in his own conscience to square what he says in with what he does—tries to square his denouncing what he declares to be a wrong with his supporting that wrong. I must say, to give the honourable gentleman credit, he is very loud in denouncing the wrong. Like Ancient Pistol, he eats the leek, but he says, "I eat, and eke I swear;" and he swore with all his heart and soul. But, though he swore, yet he chewed every morsel of the unsavoury vegetable, till it all went down at one gulp. But, to do the honourable gentleman justice, he not only said he did not like it but he looked all along as if he did not like it. The honourable gentleman, and those who think and act like him, stultify not only themselves, but they stultify themselves and the verdict of the country at the recent elections. What did these honourable gentlemen—that new party of which the honourable member for Mount Ida is so distinguished a light—do? What doctrine did they go about the country preaching, from Invercargill to the Bay of Islands? It was "Measures, not men;" and they came here, and never did we see a more remarkable exemplification of "Men, not measures." Time after time they have got up and voted for measures which they not only knew to be wrong, but which they had previously declared to be wrong. And for what reason? Simply to keep one man in power and to keep another man out of power. And that is the lamentable and deplorable result of the great doctrine of "Measures, and not men." If the honourable member for Mount Ida meant what he said to-night—and we all know that he did—he meant that the policy he is going to support is positively ruining this country. Not only has he said it to-night, but it has been dinned into our ears for the last six months from a hundred platforms, and we have seen it in a thousand leading articles: the country has been deluged with pamphlets and afflicted with speeches until the electors have been nearly dead with indigestion. The party of drastic retrenchment did carry the elections—we admit that—and a great majority of them were returned to this House; and the result of it all is that, in order to keep one man in power and another man out, they themselves swallow what they have been trying to make us swallow for the last six months. Now, I am not in the position of the honourable member for Mount Ida. I came here as a party man, and, of course, I support one side and vote against another side; but I am not to be judged by the same laws as those honourable gentlemen who stood up before the country and denounced party, and declared for "measures, and not men," as the only thing that could save New Zealand. But if they had told the country at the last elections that they were coming here and were going to be led to vote in favour of what they so strenuously denounced week after week, if they had told the country at the hustings that the "bogy" of Vogel was going to frighten them into ruining the country, do you think they would have carried the elections, or would have come back here? This "bogy" of Vogel is one of the most childish and despicable means of frightening grown men into acting like children that I think New Zealand has ever seen. I agree with a great deal that the honourable member for Mount Ida told us, but I do not agree with all. It seems to me that the honourable gentleman's opinions, his words, his doctrines, are very different from his actions—I was almost going to say his actions are different from his words. It seems to me that the honourable gentleman laid, in speaking, too much stress upon retrenchment, and that he would push his hobby—his pet notion—further than it is practicable to press it. He is a man who, if he acts up to his doctrines, ought to be the most irreconcilable opponent the Premier has in this House. He is not only against excessive railways; but he is like the Irishman who was "agin' the Government"—he is against railways and public works altogether. He gave us a most sensible and logical speech, showing that the country is going to ruin because it has got too many railways; he says we ought not to have any more, and that the only way to save the country is to stop the railways. And then, after telling us to stop all railways, he tells us that the Otago Central is a most inestimable and valuable work, and that this overburdened and over-railroaded country ought to have one more railway inflicted on it, and that is the Otago Central. Not only is the Otago Central to be made, but—if I understand aright the policy of the honourable gentleman and those who think with him and have written with him for months past—there are other great railways to be made by this land-grant system; and, instead of waiting for our trade and population to grow up to the level of our railways, our railways are to be pushed on faster than ever—but by the land-grant system. Is that logical? I say it is not. It is not a question of getting more loan-money or not getting more—it is a question of whether we have too many railways or not. And if, as the honourable gentleman says, the country is already over-railroaded, what folly it is to give away the public estate of the people of New Zealand in order to construct more, when they have too many already! I am not one of those who think that New Zealand can be saved by railways. We have made railways and made railways and made railways for the last seventeen years. Eight years ago we were reduced to a state of depression almost as deep as that prevailing now, and an opportunity was afforded then to stop the public-works policy, or to begin the policy of retrenchment about which we are talking to-day. When the Grey Government went out in 1879 the colony had a scare; and if the present Premier, who was then Colonial Treasurer, had chosen to do then what he talks of doing now, I think he would have had the country with him, and he might have stopped the public-works policy, or, at any rate, have tapered it off very rapidly. He did not choose to do that, but he went on with the public-works policy, and year after year since it has been—Borrow, borrow, borrow, in the hope of reviving our lost prosperity. We have been hunting after the phantom prosperity, and hoping to bring it back by bringing more and more borrowed money into the country; and as we have borrowed million after million, so the distress has increased, and we have gone further and further down the hill. I am not one of those who think New Zealand can be saved by railways; nor do I think that pushing on the present railways we have in hand or not pushing them on will either diminish or increase very materially the distress in the country. The evil has sunk too deep for that. I would draw the attention of the Premier to this: that it is in precisely those districts in which there is and has been the least expenditure of public money going on, and where it is now proposed to spend least, that the distress is the greatest and most acute. Take the Provincial District of Canterbury, for instance, where there has been no public-works expenditure worth speaking of for some years, and where none is proposed now, yet it is perfectly well known that that district has the unenviable pre-eminence of being, I suppose, the most distressed district in New Zealand. So, if the distress is to be remedied by public works in any part of New Zealand, it is certain that the remedy is to be applied in those districts where the evil least exists—in those parts which are most prosperous and where there is the least distress, it is there that the Premier proposes to push on the railways most actively. Take the Provincial District of Wellington as an instance. Here railways are to be pushed on in Manawatu and in Wairarapa; while in Canterbury, where the distress is very great, the railway system is not to be pushed on.

An Hon. Member.—You have the Midland railway.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—I am talking now of railways to be constructed by public loan-money. The Treasurer says he must borrow, lest we should intensify the distress in the country; and I wish to point out that, so far as his policy goes, it is in precisely those districts of the colony where the distress is greatest that his proposed remedy and preventive is not to be applied. There his remedy cannot be effective one way or the other. I do not think making a small bit of railway here and a mile or two there will remove the distress New Zealand is suffering under; it is far too deep for that. The only remedy that I and a great many other honourable gentlemen can see is to stimulate native industries by a really protective tariff. Of course there are gentlemen here who laugh at such a proposal; but there are a larger number who consider that the only real remedy for New Zealand lies in that. A distinct majority in this House believe in that, and if it were not for the Vogel "boogy" that policy would be taken in hand this session without a week's delay. The voice of the country has declared for it, and the voice of the country will be obeyed. But there is to be an interval of waiting, a delay of three or four months before the Premier will dare to begin. And why does he wait? Because the honourable gentleman is afraid of losing the support of those Free-trade members whose votes keep him in office now. I am not going to take up the cudgels for one side or the other, or say which Colonial Treasurer has borrowed more and which has borrowed less. I am not going to claim any great credit for the Opposition now because we are advocating retrenchment and the honourable gentleman is advocating extravagance, because we well know that, for the last seventeen years, whenever one side have been out of office they have been for retrenchment, and whenever they were in office they have found it necessary to borrow, of course, "in the most moderate way." The position as regards the two Treasurers reminds me of a verse written by Dean Swift,—

The rod was but a harmless wand
When Moses held it in his hand,
But soon as he had laid it down
'Twas a devouring serpent grown.

That is the position. I wish to give one or two brief reasons why I propose to vote for the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin Central. The Treasurer has told us that borrowing must come to an end, and he proposes to stop borrowing. He has made a heroic resolve that borrowing shall cease after the expiration of three and a half years, and in the meantime he treats resolution to the extent of £2,400,000. If that had been placed before the country at the last elections the honourable gentleman would not have had the chance of getting into the office which he now holds. Then you could not stand up and talk of borrowing one million without being well-nigh hooted from every platform in the country. The Government now propose a borrowing policy which the whole colony would have hooted down during the last elections. Is that consistency? Is it decency? I say it is not. The Colonial Treasurer claims credit because he has made such proposals that in three and a half years borrowing shall cease; but, as the honourable member for Mount Ida cleverly pointed out, probably in three and a half years the honourable gentleman will be Colonial Treasurer no longer, so that his heroism amounts to this: that he is willing to shed the last drop of his successor's blood. Of all the portions of the honourable gentleman's policy, that which I consider to be worst for the country, and to be most in the teeth of what the country demanded at the late elections, is his proposal to keep the deficit outstanding instead of paying it off. We are retrenching because the colony has got the knife at its throat, because it has lost credit, and because it has a burden that is too great to bear. And when we are retrenching to save our credit, what can injure our credit more readily than the knowledge that we have got a huge deficit which we do not intend to pay off and that we are going to borrow money to meet? That is the way the honourable gentleman proposes to restore our credit—to borrow two millions, to keep our deficit outstanding, and to borrow money to meet it. Can there be anything which is likely to be more disastrous to every enterprise that is obliged to go to London to get money to carry it on? This is the man who was put in office to restore our credit in London, and to restore prosperity to this colony by means of bringing capital here. The honourable gentleman said that, if we wished to discuss the matter sincerely, we should discuss the estimates. That is the course he suggests to us when we take up the policy of retrenchment. What was the course which he said was absolutely necessary at the beginning of the session? Did he propose to come down and discuss the matter detail by detail? He said that it was perfectly impossible to have retrenchment if we made it a matter of detail by detail. He said the only conceivable way to effect retrenchment was to take the thing en bloc, and leave it to the Government themselves to work out. We say the same thing. We say if we put it off until we get into Committee no retrenchment will be made that is worth making. If retrenchment is to be made it must be done in the way proposed by the honourable member for Dunedin Central. In 1883, when the honourable gentleman was asked to support a policy of retrenchment in a mild way, he laughed it to scorn. Mr. Swanson, then member for Newton, asked the honourable gentleman to take the estimates back and reduce them by £50,000. The honourable member for Caversham voted for that motion, and he ought to vote for this proposal now. When the House went into Committee of Supply and discussed the estimates detail by detail on the occasion I have referred to, they passed estimates amounting to three millions; and they made two very notable pieces of retrenchment. They reduced a Resident Magistrate from £250 to £150, and they struck off a vote amounting to £50 altogether. That was the result of retrenchment in Committee. As I said before, I consider that the brave words of the honourable member for Mount Ida are deserving of the attention of the House. I agree with him that the country will never be saved by this fiddling expenditure on railways which is going on year after year. It is the sprinkling of a drop of water on the tongue of a man dying of thirst. Year after year we have attempted to fortify ourselves and to restore prosperity by bringing in annual millions; and every million we have got has lowered us deeper and deeper in the abyss of depression. Look to history! Did the gold of the Indies save Spain? Millions were brought across the Atlantic to Spain every year, and the gold was wasted; and Spain sank and sank, till, from being the most prosperous country in Europe, she became the by-word—financially—which she is to-day. And I say that if we go on borrowing these millions, and continue as we have been doing, we shall sink until we have become among the colonies of the British Empire what Spain is, financially, among the countries of Europe.

Mr. BARRON.—The honourable gentleman makes one little mistake with reference to the well-known motion moved by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay in the previous Parliament.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—I did not refer to it.

Mr. BARRON.—The honourable gentleman, at all events, referred to my vote on that occasion.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—No; I referred to the resolution moved by Mr. Swanson in 1883, to the effect that the Government should take back their estimates, recast them, and reduce them by £50,000.

Mr. BARRON.—I understood that the honourable gentleman referred to the motion of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. Therefore I will say no more about that. The honourable gentleman has preached a very nice little sermon from a very pretty little text. Referring to the speech made by the honourable member for Mount Ida, he said, "Words, words, words! Sir, the country can never be saved by words, especially when they run counter to deeds." If the honourable gentleman will only think of it he will there find a reason for the attitude taken by the honourable member for Mount Ida, which he condemns. The honourable member for Mount Ida has had large experience of a previous Administration the whole policy of which was, "Words, words, words." The country was not saved by their words, simply because they ran counter to their deeds. Then, he says that the cry of the honourable member for Mount Ida and those associated with him is, "Measures, not men." Yes, measures honestly devised with a reasonable prospect of their being carried out, and a prospect of their being given effect to by the men who are at present in office rather than the objectionable men who preceded them in office.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Are there no others capable?

Mr. BARRON.—I, at all events, do not intend to draw a distinction of that kind; but, so long as the honourable gentlemen now administering the affairs of this country show that they are honestly and earnestly trying to do what their supporters think they ought to do, so long should they have the support of those who have the best interests of the country at heart. The honourable member for Mount Ida did really deliver a very thoughtful and earnest speech; and that speech, which must have impressed every honourable member who listened to it, was the speech of no novice in political affairs. It was the speech of a man who thinks very carefully over the subjects he feels called upon to speak about; and if that honourable gentleman, after reviewing the whole loan-policy of the Government and their predecessors, was forced to sit down without arriving at any practical conclusion, without offering to the House any practical suggestion in reference to the policy which we are now called upon to consider—if that honourable gentleman was forced to sit down without making any practical suggestion, how can ordinary members of the House, or young members who have not had the experience in public affairs which the honourable gentleman has had—how can they be expected to arrive at a conclusion which he, with all his experience, was evidently unable to arrive at? There are no political theories, however complete in themselves, that have ever been, or ever can be, given practical and undisturbed effect to, I believe, in any Legislature in the world; otherwise we should not still be striving, after long years of sore trouble, for some changes and improvements such as, in theory, we think should be followed. Our best devices can only be what in our judgment at the moment are best calculated to correct the evils of which we complain. The proposals of the Government as embodied in this Loan Bill are such as I do not altogether approve of. I agree that a great deal of the mischief from which we are suffering, and a great many of the evils which admittedly beset this country, are due to the fact that we have borrowed too much and too often, and that we have spent unwisely; and were it not that our engagements must be met, and that I have confidence that the Government are earnest in the proposals which they have embodied in their Loan Bill, and were it not that the Premier has invited the House to consider carefully in Committee these proposals, and to object to such items as they think should be struck out, I would not vote for the Loan Bill. But, Sir, although I feel very strongly that the more money we borrow the deeper we are likely to get into the mire, still I feel also that, when men who, I know, hold the same opinion as I do have had an opportunity of inquiring closely and carefully and minutely into the affairs of this colony, and when they come down to the House and, contrary to their previously-formed judgment, contrary to their inclination, ask the House to give effect to such proposals as are embodied in the Loan Bill; and when they have shown their reasons—and their reasons must weigh to some extent with honourable gentlemen—then, I say, a man must pause before he says we must not borrow any more. At all events, though I would do all I could to stop the borrowing of another shilling, in the face of the statement which the Government thought fit to make to the House in connection with the necessities of the country I am not prepared to vote against the Bill. Sir, this borrowing, which was practically initiated in 1870—and at that time our debt was seven and a half millions—has outgrown our population. Our debt has since increased in excess of the increase of population; and therein is to be found the evil, and therein is, I think, to be found the remedy. If you compare 1870 with 1879 you will find that during that period our population had not doubled, but our debt and interest had become three times greater. From 1879 to 1884 our population had only increased a fifth, but our debt had increased a fourth. From 1884 to 1887 our population has only increased a fortieth, but the debt has increased a sixth. And, if you compare 1870 with 1887, the population will be found to be a little more than doubled, but our debt is nearly five times greater than in 1870. Now, I mention this in order that I may point out what I value in the loan-proposals of the present Government, and that is, a proposal for borrowing to meet the necessities of the Treasury and to cover the requirements of the country for a period of over three years. The addition they propose to make to the debt of the colony will not be beyond, but, on the contrary, will be less than, the proportion of the natural increase of the population which we may reasonably expect during that period. And, Sir, if the House does what it is in duty bound to do—to accept the invitation of the Government to object to all the items which they consider it is not necessary to borrow money for: and it is in the power of members of the House who desire to curtail mischievous borrowing to stifle these items—then the increase of our debt as compared with the increase of our population will be so much less. I only desire to say this because I think, in common with many other honourable members, that, while it is a pity we are called upon to add to our debt, there is some appearance of daylight through the darkness in the proposals of the Government. Sir, I shall vote for the second reading of this Bill in preference to voting for the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin Central. But, if that honourable gentleman, or any other honourable gentleman—even the leader of the Opposition—can establish a case for striking off an item from the schedule to the Bill when submitted, he can claim my vote, and I am quite sure he can claim the votes of a great many other honourable members who think with me, but who still think it better to vote for the second reading of the Bill than for the amendment of the honourable gentleman. And I would remind honourable members of one more reason for voting for the proposals of the Government, and that is, however great the objections we may have to the Bill, they are not so great as the objections which our dearly-bought experience has forced upon us as accompanying a hostile amendment of this kind.

Mr. WALKER.—I may begin by saying that the debate on the Financial Statement was adjourned at my request three or four weeks ago; but, for some reason or other, the Government would not give me the chance of firing off my few remarks. Possibly the leader of the Government thought there was nothing worthy of discussion in his Financial Statement, and, if so, it is not my place to quarrel with him. But to-night is given an opportunity when I may make a few remarks on the subject, and which will enable me to unfold my views on the financial proposals of the Ministry perhaps better than I could have done three or four weeks ago, because now we have not only the loan proposals of the Government, but also the public-works proposals. Well, I must say I am surprised and astonished and disappointed at the policy of the Government as a whole; and I think, if the country would only take a calm and reasonable view of the whole circumstances, it will feel, equally with myself, disappointed also. I feel exceedingly disappointed at the attitude—that is a word which has got into an almost historic position—of certain honourable gentlemen. That is what I complain of. We have read of a gentleman—I will not call him an honourable gentleman, but a celebrated gentleman—to whom deportment was everything. And I complain that the country is ruined by gentlemen to whom attitude is everything. They are going to save the country; but I maintain they will never save the country so long as we have gentlemen like them in this House, declining action but posing as possible saviours. And the honourable member for Caversham—what has he said to-night? Simply that he will back up a broken reed. I forget for how long, but it was before I was in this House, although I read of what was going on, when he was backing up an exceedingly respectable gentleman, whom we all knew and respected in private life. And now he is backing up an honourable gentleman—the honourable member for Mount Ida—who, I venture to say, as long as he lives will never come up to the scratch. As long as the Government party has got a tail like that, I say I congratulate the Premier on having such a lot of weak vessels to follow him. They will never do any good in preventing the Premier from doing what he wishes, and they will never save the country unless the honourable member for Egmont can be forced to take a more reasonable attitude than he has taken this session. The honourable gentlemen say they were returned to carry out retrenchment and to stop borrowing, as was decided by the country. I think those honourable gentlemen constitute a very large majority of the House, constitute a far greater working majority than the colony has seen for many years, and could have done anything they chose in reason to save the country. I do not believe, judging from what we have seen, that any party has proved a more obedient or subservient party than those honourable gentlemen; and, when the honourable member for Egmont said that borrowing was necessary to carry out his policy, why should not that party have said, “No; we will not do your bidding, but the bidding of the country which has sent us here; and we will not agree to further borrowing”? That is what the party ought to say when the honourable gentleman goes into his Cabinet-room and says, “Vote as I tell you, or I will resign.” I would say, if I were the honourable member for Mount Ida or the honourable member for Caversham, or if I were any of those quasi-independents, “Resign; we will put a better man in your place to-morrow"—not from this side of the House, for we know very well they have a majority, and of course it must be from the other side of the House the leader must come. But the leader must be a man who can act with the consent of his followers, and do the bidding of the country; and I can say this is not the policy which is the bidding of the colony.

Major ATKINSON.—What is the policy?

Mr. WALKER.—Well, Sir, the policy is that procrastination is the soul of business: that is the honourable gentleman's policy.

Major ATKINSON.—I want the policy of the country.

Mr. WALKER.—What the country wanted, and what was preached all over the country, was, "Borrow as little as possible, and retrench!"

Major ATKINSON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. WALKER.——"and restore prosperity by judicious legislation." Sir, the honourable gentleman has rather drawn me out of the line of argument on which I was proceeding; and I will allude to these points, therefore, further on. What I wish to emphasize now is that the majority on his side of the House have lost a golden opportunity of either compelling the honourable member for Egmont to do what they wish, or else of putting in somebody else who would carry out their bidding; and, having lost that opportunity, I warrant that, unless they bring him to resign, they will not save the country. Why, Sir, every honourable member in this House remembers that, during the elections, the late Premier, in a speech at Dunedin, alluded to the possibility of two millions being required to be borrowed to finish our railways, and limiting it to five years.

Mr. FISHER.—What do you know about finance?

Mr. WALKER.—A great deal more, I will guarantee, than the Minister of Education. Perhaps neither of the honourable gentlemen knows anything about finance. We had a speech from the honourable gentleman to-night, and if that is a specimen of his finance I do not believe in it. But I will come to his remarks later on. These gentlemen seem to wish to hustle honourable members out of their remarks; but I decline to be hustled even by the Minister of Education. I say that when the late Premier mentioned, incidentally almost, that two millions were required for finishing the partially-constructed railways, there was a howl all over the country in those prints which were opposed to the late Government, the prints that the honourable member for Mount Ida referred to as perfectly satisfied with the policy of the present Government. I have no doubt that if these prints are like the honourable member for Mount Ida they will be satisfied with anything. Those are the sort of prints that express independent opinions of the Government and their followers. These are the prints that came down on the late Premier because he mentioned the necessity of borrowing two millions to finish the construction of our railways—

An Hon. MEMBER.—In eight years.

Mr. WALKER.—I am not particular about the exact number of years, but I know that it was to be spread over a much longer period than the present Ministry propose to extend this loan over. But what I object to is the unfairness of the thing. One man may steal a horse, while another may not look over the hedge. We have heard one honourable member refer to the Ethiopian and the leopard. I should like to know which is the Ethiopian and which is the leopard. If my honourable friend the member for Christchurch North is the Ethiopian, I should say that the Premier is the leopard; and I am as much inclined to doubt him as my honourable friends opposite appear inclined to doubt the honourable member for Christchurch North. The honourable member for Mount Ida, a few evenings ago, made a remark which I thought he was prepared to follow up with a motion—to the effect that he should move the Crown to appoint both of these honourable members to colonial governorships, for the sake of getting them out of the way. I do not know whether, at the time he said that, he thought of himself as a possible candidate for the office occupied by the Premier; but I am quite certain of this, after what we have seen to-night: that that would not happen to him, because I think that, whatever may happen, whoever may be removed out of this House, that honourable gentleman will never come into office as long as he lives. His speech to-night convinces me that he is perfectly and absolutely unpractical and useless. He is simply the result of a local inflation somewhere about Dunedin, and must have very easily pleased constituents. In this House, at all events, he does not know what is necessary in order to command respect. A man may vote wrong sometimes owing to an error of judgment, and I can excuse that; but I cannot give any respect in my opinion to a man who deliberately argues one way and then has not the courage of his opinions, or is afraid to put them in action. What I complain of most in reference to the Financial Statement of the Government and their different proposals is this: that they really give no indication of what the position of the colony is, and how it is to be lifted out of its present unfortunate position. The Government either conceal the true position or they do not know what it is. The retrenchment they propose is simply an apparent one. Reduction of the honorarium will not do alone; the lessening of salaries will not do alone. If they put everything together that they propose to get by these means, they will not have done one single thing to lift the colony out of its present position. They do not seem to realise the position. If we compare our position with that of the other colonies we must, I think, fairly admit this: that most of our services are very well and very economically conducted—such as education, Post Office, Telegraph Office, and so on—and that really very little retrenchment can take place in any of them. I do not deny, of course, that there may be cases where retrenchment is possible, and no doubt will be effected; but all combined will not go very far towards saving the country. The fact is that we have two heavy burdens upon our shoulders: one is the railways, and the other is the public debt; and unless the Government can devise some means of lessening these two burdens this country can never get very much better. And, Sir, what do this Government propose to do as regards these two burdens? They simply propose to increase both of them, without any remedial measure whatever. Our railways, it is admitted, have year by year become less remunerative; and the reason is that what are called "political lines" have been extended. Now, it must be admitted that what the Government propose in the way of extension of our railways in this Bill has reference to railways that cannot for many years be of a remunerative character. Therefore their proposal to borrow money for the construction of these railways will not help the colony one bit. At the same time, of course, we are increasing our debt; and it goes without saying that, if we are increasing our debt, we are also increasing our annual deficiency. What is really wanted is for the Government not only to retrench sincerely, but to take steps to promote the industries, and to increase our population and renew prosperity: and that can only be done by other measures than those which the Government have taken in hand. None of the proposals that they have made—I can conscientiously say I am sorry to say it—will have any effect in restoring prosperity to the country. In fact, their immediate effect will rather be to increase the distress instead of remedying it. We have, of course, been promised that the Government, next session, will take up the question of the tariff; and, if this means encouraging our local industries, I trust they will have the courage of their opinions. But I am sure that, if they have many supporters on their side as weak-kneed as the honourable member for Mount Ida, we cannot greatly rely upon their dealing with this subject as they ought to do. Unless their supporters are more sincere and more determined, so that they will keep Ministers up to the mark, we cannot expect much. I say most distinctly that the responsibility must rest on the other side of the House. They must keep Ministers up to the mark next session. I am sorry that the Minister of Education has left the chamber, for I was desirous of saying a few words to him, as I do not care to refer to an honourable member who is absent, especially when I am unable to refer to him in terms of commendation. But I may say I was sorry to see the line taken by him in his remarks: they were in exceedingly bad taste, coming, as they did, after the good-tempered and fairly-critical speech of the honourable member for Christchurch North. I had hoped that office and its responsibilities were exercising a restraining influence upon him. I had hoped that he had learned by this time that it is better to show, at any rate, not quite all you feel when you are on the Ministerial benches. No doubt Ministers have their trials, like other mortals; but they should be able to bear them more philosophically than we ordinary people, especially those of us who are on the Opposition side of the House; and I am exceedingly sorry that the honourable gentleman "let out" as he did. I trust that the Government will be as good as they say, and will allow the House generally the largest discretion in cutting down these estimates, and enable us to cut down much of the prospective expenditure, to which, I think, the House has reasonable and good cause to object. The truth is that the Government hold a whip over us in this matter. The honourable member for Mount Ida said—and I believe he was thoroughly convinced of the truth of his statement at the time he made it—that if we should decide to borrow this amount proposed it would be all spent in two years. I quite believe it, judging from the past. And what will happen then, Sir? Why, the Representation Bill, which the honourable member for Mount Ida was not quite strong enough to stand up against, will then be held over our heads, and if we do not vote for another loan we shall find the Government coming down and saying to members like the honourable member for Mount Ida, "We will blot your district out of existence, by dissolving the House." That is the threat which will be held over us, and I venture to say it will be put in force as soon as the Government want more money and ask for another loan. I fear that more responsibility attaches to the action of those honourable gentlemen who went back from their votes the other night in connection with the Representation Bill than we are aware of. I trust the country will not have reason, as I fear it will have, to regret the action which was taken on that occasion. So far as this Bill is concerned, I shall certainly go into the lobby with the honourable member for Dunedin Central.

Mr. FISH.—I had no intention of making any remarks at all on the question now before the House, and should not have risen to speak had it not been for the extraordinary action of the honourable member for Mount Ida. That honourable gentleman made a speech which I thought a most excellent one, from a logical and argumentative point of view. It was a speech pregnant with common-sense, and one which ought to have had, and I have no doubt had, great weight with members of this House. During the course of that speech I was sitting alongside the honourable member for Lincoln; and I said to the honourable gentleman, remembering the course of action followed by the honourable member for Mount Ida in connection with the Representation Bill and other things, "How do you think the honourable gentleman is going to vote?" He said, "Oh, he will vote for the amendment." I replied, "I do not think he will." But the honourable gentleman said, "Yes, he will," being perfectly sure that the honourable member for Mount Ida must vote for the amendment. You may imagine the disgust of the honourable member for Lincoln when we heard the impotent conclusion of the speech of the honourable member for Mount Ida. That honourable gentleman will always be a failure in politics while he pursues such a course of action as he pursued in reference to the Representation Bill, and as he has pursued in this House to-night in reference to this Bill. I recall the honourable member's career for the last four years, and recollect that it was by his influence, so far as it extended, that the Stout-Vogel Government came into power in 1884. The honourable gentleman was then returned to support the honourable member for Christchurch North; he came down pledged to support the party. He did support them through the first session of their existence. In the second session he wavered, and, though he spoke against them, he did not vote against them; and by his vote, I believe, they were kept in office. The next session we find that, after an amount of delay and hesitation, he ultimately made up his mind to have the courage of his opinions and voted against the Government, with the result that they went out of office. Now we find him in this Parliament pursuing exactly the same tactics that he pursued with regard to the last Government. He has spoken against the Government policy this session on more than one occasion. On the Representation Bill he said he was opposed to them—that he thought it an improper measure—and he voted for the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin West; and, ultimately, when the Premier made it a party question, he retracted to such an extent that he did not vote to maintain his previous action with regard to the Bill, although he was still opposed to it. I do not envy the Government such a supporter as this, and I am surprised the Premier has not told him that he would rather be without him than have such support as he gives the Government, for it is more damning to them than the opposition of a determined enemy. If the honourable gentleman thinks that the Opposition would like him as an ally, speaking for myself I would say that I would absolutely decline to receive such an ally, because I know that if a gentleman of that character is with us to-day he might be against us to-morrow, or, at any rate, damning our policy, if not voting against us, and that his assistance is worse than useless. That is not conduct that will tend to raise a man in political estimation. I quite admit that any member of the House has the right to continually change his opinions, and he is not bound to support a Government for ever if they go from the policy which they held when he joined them; but to be continually damning their policy and trying to upset their measures, and then to vote for them as a party, is, to my mind, most inconsistent. Then, what reason does he give for his conduct? The Vogel "bogey," and nothing else. I say that, if he has convictions, he should vote accordingly, and, if by such a vote the present Government should be ejected from office, it would not follow as a matter of course that the honourable member for Christchurch North would take the place of the Premier. We know from the history of the last Parliament that there were two or three Governments within two or three weeks, and it is quite possible, if the honourable member gave a conscientious vote, there might be a reconstruction of the present Government upon different lines. It is the expression of opinions followed by contradictory actions such as the honourable gentleman has shown to-night and on other occasions that almost makes persons who are not very strong on the other side say that they will become Government supporters if there is any fear of loss to the Government from the defection of gentlemen like the honourable gentleman I am alluding to. We have next the honourable member for Caversham standing forward as the apologist for the honourable member for Mount Ida. I can easily understand how that comes about. The honourable gentlemen are pretty well in the same position politically. When I recall to my mind the sessions of 1882, 1883, and 1884, and when I know the uncompromising hostility which animated the honourable member for Caversham against the Premier—when I recollect that, and also that there is no change of politics on the part of the honourable gentleman now at the head of the Government, and when I see the honourable member for Caversham so slavishly following him, consenting to give up his convictions in order to keep that honourable gentleman in office, I ask, what can be the cause of such strange things? Again, I shall be told, as the honourable gentleman told us to-night, it is the fear of the honourable member for Christchurch North getting into power again that makes him do as he is doing. I say distinctly that a man is not doing his duty to the country if he allows personal considerations as to individuals to influence him in his political views. The honourable gentleman, I am sorry to say, is out of the House, or I should say a great deal more about him. The honourable gentleman said he would vote for the second reading of the Bill because the schedule of the Bill dealing with the works proposed to be carried out could be amended in Committee, and he told us that that was the proper time to reduce the votes. Now, no honourable member knows better than the honourable member for Caversham that it is an utter absurdity to expect that you will reduce the million loan when in Committee. What does he seek to do? To pit one section of the House against another? And it is certain that, if after argument any particular line is struck out, then the members interested in that work will combine to prevent other works from being carried. The result would be that it would be a case of "You vote for my line, and I'll vote for yours," and the thing would be passed exactly as it is in the schedule of the Bill. If honourable members want to restrict the loan to half a million, we must do it on the proposal of the honourable member for Dunedin Central, for that is the only way by which it can be done. If we do not accept that proposal, then we must accept the policy of the Government. The honourable member for Ashburton referred to the member for Caversham and to the gentleman who formerly represented Akaroa as being a party of two. They were a party of two, and as much alike as twin brothers. What one said the other said. Now, I think there ought to be in this Parliament also a party of two, consisting of the honourable member for Caversham and the honourable member for Mount Ida. The only justification that either of these gentlemen can give for the extraordinary votes or no-votes they are going to give to-night upon this question of the reduction of the loan is, I contend, a personal opposition to the honourable member for Christchurch North: that they have both practically admitted. Now, as far as I understood the Premier's statement in introducing the Bill, it was that he would be prepared to accept a reduction of the amount to be borrowed if the majority of the House considered it desirable. I did not understand him to say that he would only accept reductions which might be made in Committee. I do not know whether I understood him aright or not; but, at any rate, that is the conclusion I drew from his remarks, that he would be prepared to accept a reduction of the amount on the second reading of the Bill, if a majority of the House were in favour of that being done. All that I have to say further, with regard to the policy of the Government, is this: that, so far as the public-works proposals go, they seem to me to be tolerably fair, on the whole; and I think the Minister in charge is to be complimented rather than otherwise upon the businesslike and straightforward manner in which these proposals are placed before the House and the country. I do not differ from the proposals of the Government in respect to the lines, but they propose to borrow money to extend over a period of three years. Now, I am certain that, judging from the past, what was called "ear-marking" expenditure can never be adhered to, and never will be adhered to; and that before the end of two years we shall find that this million of money has disappeared. And you will be placed in this dilemma: either that you must ask the authority of the House to borrow another million, or that you must leave works in an imperfect state, to the great detriment of the colony and of the works themselves. That is where I dissent from the proposals of the Government. I think that we should borrow only half a million now, not for the purpose of restricting that half-million as our expenditure out of loan for three years, but that we should allow it to go as far as it would, and then ask the authority of Parliament at a future time to borrow a further sum. That is my view of the matter. The honourable member for Caversham said the speech of the honourable member for Mount Ida was not that of a novice, and that it evidenced thinking out. I am quite prepared to say it did, and the wonder to me is how an honourable gentleman, having thought out that subject, and having spoken in the way he did, should have come to the lame and impotent conclusions he has done, and that he is now going to vote against the amendment which his convictions tell him ought to be carried. I cannot understand an action of that kind; and I have no hesitation in predicting for that honourable gentleman a most inglorious end to his political career, in consequence of the vacillation which appears to be the leading feature of his political conduct. I should not have spoken had I not been so thoroughly disgusted as I am with the action of the honourable member for Mount Ida and of the honourable member for Caversham, who, having pledged themselves strongly to their constituents that they would oppose borrowing and restrict it to the lowest possible sum, now give utterance to their intention with regard to the vote they are going to give.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—I cannot help saying something after the speeches we have heard to-night. I myself am quite free to act in this matter in accordance with my own opinion, and what I think are the best interests of the country will alone guide me. I do not belong to either party in this House. I do not belong to the party of the honourable gentlemen who occupy the Government benches, nor do they expect to get any support from me on any political questions; neither do I belong to the party which is led by the honourable member for Christchurch North. But my opinions on this subject, I dare say, will differ from those of a good many honourable members in this House who sometimes vote with me. Before I express my own opinions on the subject before the House I should like to refer to the honourable member for Caversham; and I am sorry he is not in his place, for I have something to say of him that I should like him to hear. However, the honourable gentleman made a speech and then left the chamber before he could hear what any person said of him. Now, I have no doubt this Loan Bill is a very hard pill for the honourable member for Caversham to swallow. He, above all other honourable members in Otago, did more to injure the late Premier on this very question of borrowing than any other member of the House. Whenever before the electors of Caversham—and, indeed, whenever he stood up to speak during the whole of the election contest—he never halted from running down the late Premier, and this question of borrowing was continually in his mouth. I have no doubt, I say, that it is now a very hard pill for him to swallow this proposal of the Government. And, Sir, I might ask how it comes about that he has supported the Government so much. He belonged some time ago to the party to which I belong, and which was led in this House by the then member for Akaroa, Mr. Montgomery. And, Sir, at that time I thought the honourable member for Caversham was a modest worker, one of the rank and file of the party; but I have discovered since that he was very much disappointed three years ago when he was not taken into office, and ever since that, on every occasion, he has turned round on his own party, and has been going further and further in his actions against them, until at the recent election he denounced them to such a degree that he could not now possibly serve the other party, and I have no doubt the honourable gentleman is very much disgusted at his own conduct, and must find it very hard to support this Loan Bill after all he said against it. Now, the honourable member for Mount Ida has been so well dealt with by other honourable members that I think I will spare him.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I do not see that I am bound to comply with any request of the Premier's as to whether I should "go for" him or not. I intend to tell the Premier that I am going to support his Bill. I have no doubt the Premier and his Government have found it very hard to bring themselves up to the scratch in borrowing this million of money, knowing perfectly well that there were a number of gentlemen supporting them who were strongly against borrowing, who denounced it at the elections, who actually gained their seats on the pledge that there should be no more borrowing or taxation. No doubt the Government have found it hard to do this; but they did what was right for the country. It would be an impossibility to do away with borrowing all at once, and to stop public works; it would be a dark day of disaster to this country if they were stopped suddenly. At the time of the election I distinctly declared what I am now declaring—that it was an impossibility to do away with borrowing very suddenly, that if we did so we should get into trouble for many years. What would be the result to the colony? That a very large number of public works, now half finished, would have to remain in that condition, and would be of no service to the colony, and a large sum of money would be lost. I ask, what would be the result to some of the electors in the Mount Ida District if the Otago Central line were stopped? They would simply have to give up their holdings and come into the towns to swell the ranks of the "unemployed." The honourable member for Mount Ida must know that it is an impossibility to farm land in that region and carry produce forty or fifty miles to a railway station. It is a fact that a number of these people are hanging out to see whether this railway is to be finished or not; and if they knew to-morrow that there was going to be no railway a number of them would abandon their holdings. That would not be a good thing for the country. There are in this House a number of honourable gentlemen who during the elections talked a lot of nonsense to the electors on this subject. No doubt in some parts of the colony, where public works have been finished, it was very easy for anyone to get up and denounce all borrowing. That is exactly the position of my electorate. There is not one sixpence to be raised under this Bill to be spent in it, nor do I wish for one sixpence, and I might easily declare before the electors that I would consent to borrow no more money; but I look upon it from a wider point of view than one electorate, and I say it would be an impossibility to stop borrowing at the present moment. But, whilst I am prepared to support the second reading of this Bill, I wish it to be distinctly understood that when the public-works estimates come down there are some railways in that schedule I shall vote against—railways which, I think, could be stopped without any serious loss to the colony. And then I shall expect the Premier to carry out his promise and reduce the loan by the corresponding amount. And if he does not do that, we shall have an opportunity, when his Loan Bill is in Committee, to reduce it in that way. I am glad to find that the Premier considered the colony first in this matter, and party second. There are some of his supporters in this House who are endeavouring to balance themselves on a rail, and I believe the operation is a difficult one on this Loan Bill. I think the speeches of the honourable members for Mount Ida and Caversham show this House exactly how they can balance themselves on a rail, ready at any moment to jump down on either side according as it suits them best. We have been told to-night that the idea of making railways under the land-grant system was very much in favour, and that that was the proper system to make railways by. Now, I object to that distinctly, and I would sooner borrow money at any time to build a railway than grant any land to make it. I hope this House will not be led away by this claptrap about getting railways made more cheaply by land-grants. We are taking the assets we have borrowed money upon, and blinding the eyes of the money-lenders at Home from whom we have borrowed money, if we give away any part of our principal—of which our landed estate is part—to make railways; and I am quite sure that, in the long-run, it will be much dearer to make railways in that way than if we had borrowed the money straight out to make them. I do not intend to keep the House at this early hour of the morning, but I wish to say that I consider it necessary, in the interests of the colony, that this money should be borrowed. I am quite satisfied of the impossibility of doing without it, and any one who, during the elections, thought it could be done without could not have considered the subject very carefully. There are some railways which I think the country can very well do without for many years to come, and I shall vote for their being struck out of the schedule of the Loan Bill.

Mr. ALLEN.—I am only going to make a very few remarks, as the hour is very late; but I must say that, so far as most of the speeches have gone, at any rate those from the Opposition side of the House, they seem to me to be mostly an attempt to stigmatize members on this side of the House, members who came in, suppose, as independent candidates. Well, I let that go for what it is worth—I do not think it is of much value. But, Sir, I do think that we have not rightly estimated the position in which we are placed at the present moment. I think that most of us—most of those, at any rate, who have thought on the subject at all—have made up their minds that a policy of borrowing is a ruinous policy, and especially at the present time; and if we could get rid of it at the present moment it would be the right position to take up. But, after all, one has to consider whether the position is a tenable one; whether it is possible, in the present state of the colony, that all works that are in progress should be suddenly put a stop to. Now, so far as I myself am concerned, I stated when I was a candidate that I did not think it was right or reasonable to leave certain railways in an unfinished state, in an unworkable state: that is to say, it would not be right, for instance, to leave a railway-bridge half constructed—that we should, at any rate, carry those railways to some point or other where they might be worked. Having taken up that position, let me now ask whether it is possible to make any large savings, to abandon this loan of one million. And I may say, at the outset, that I do think it is possible, if we like to undertake the task, to largely reduce this million loan; and I do think the proper position to take up is to accept the Premier's suggestion and, when we go into Committee, attempt to get some of the items struck off. I think a mistake has been made in considering that it is only under Part III. that large reductions can be made: in fact, my opinion is that under Class III. only small reductions can be made. With regard to the railway policy, I do not believe any large reductions can possibly be made without doing enormous injury. Sir, there was laid upon the table of this House some time ago a return which showed that there were only three railways, I think, in hand—those three railways were the Rotorua Section, and the Manawatu Gorge Section, and the Otago Central Section—these are the only sections in progress or on which work has been commenced that cannot be carried to some definite place, according to that return, out of the money at present in hand. For those three it seems to be absolutely necessary that some money will have to be borrowed. Then, with regard to the other great railway scheme, the North Island Trunk Railway, I must say that I speak with a certain amount of ignorance of the country, but I cannot help thinking that it is possible for us at the present time to put a stop to a large portion of the North Island Trunk Railway construction. It seems now that the cost of it has been largely under-estimated, and that if we spend a million on it we cannot get very far. A million and a quarter more, at any rate, will be required to complete it; and I think it would be a question for us to consider in Committee whether we cannot make a stop here, and, by cutting off £300,000 or £400,000 from this line, so reduce the loan proposals. But what I got up mainly to say was this: that, apart from the North Island Trunk Railway altogether, and apart from Part III. of these estimates, there is another fund which very few honourable members have really touched upon, and which is a fund in the items of which I think we could make very large reductions. That is the fund in Part I. First of all, there is immigration, and I am not at all sure that we are justified in spending out of the new loan so large a sum as £70,000 within the next three years. Then, with regard to roads and bridges, and things of that kind, I think there too we are exceeding the amount we should apply to such purposes out of loan. Under that head there are grants in aid; and there are, unfortunately those liabilities for village settlements to the extent of £70,000, which must be met, but for which this Government are not responsible, but their predecessors. Then, there are a large number of public buildings which come under this head. There is £70,000 for lunatic asylums, some new ones, for instance. In a place where there are already two asylums it is proposed to enlarge one very much; and they are going to build doctors' residences at Sunnyside, Seacliff, and other places. The amount for lunatic asylums might very well be reduced. There are several other items; but I shall not go through them now. There are many, however, which I think ought not to be put down here, but ought to be charged to consolidated revenue, and, if we cannot meet them out of that, then buildings of this kind should be stopped. At any rate, I am quite sure of this: that so long as we go on constructing these buildings out of loan so long will our difficulties continue. I have made a great many more notes, but I will not detain the House at this hour.

Mr. MOSS.—It has always been usual, if we intend to borrow at all, to have the Loan Bill read a second time. When the Opposition in a previous session, comprising in great part the honourable gentlemen who now sit on the Government side of the House, proposed to reduce the loan very largely, and succeeded in reducing it by a quarter of a million, they first decided that the estimates must be reduced, and, when that was done, reduced the loan. The question before us now is, Are we to borrow at all or not? If we are prepared to say that we will cease to borrow, we might vote against the second reading of the Bill; but, if we are to borrow, I do not see how we can do that. The course laid down by the Premier is, I think, the right one: that, after the second reading he will take the public-works estimates. That will be the time to make reductions, and, if honourable gentlemen are in earnest, there are a large number of items which can be very well reduced. Take, for example, the Blenheim-Awatere line. It is proposed to spend £31,700 on that line; and, when you look into it as explained by the Minister for Public Works, you find that five and a half miles of the line are to be made: that they propose to make a road to the Awatere from the end of the five and a half miles of line, and then erect an expensive bridge over that river at a cost of from £15,000 to £20,000. That is an old item, which has been resisted in this House, and was successfully resisted by the late Government, who refused to make the bridge. That bridge will open up about one hundred and forty thousand acres of land owned by absentees. We certainly ought not to borrow money for that purpose, but should leave the persons interested to make the bridge for themselves. There are other items of the same kind which might be struck out. It is a doctrine which I have long fought for that we ought not to borrow money, and burden those who come after us with a great debt—in fact, sell this country, as we have been doing, to money-lenders in London—unless it be for works that will be directly reproductive. I have always thought that is the sole principle on which we should act—that we ought not to burden those coming after us, unless it be to enable us to increase the productions of the country. If we had confined our borrowing to that we should be in a much better position to-day. And look at the position into which this borrowing has brought us. We are in the humiliating position that this great colony cannot go on the Stock Exchange unless we pledge ourselves not to borrow any more for a definite time. Our debentures have been falling for a long time past, and now are quoted at some 8 or 10 per cent. below those of other colonies. To me the passing of the estimates is always the saddest part of the session. They are left to the last, and never closely scrutinised. Money is borrowed, and we scramble for it; and, unless we change our old course in that respect, I do not see how we are to extricate the colony from its present position. The honourable member for Mount Ida has justly quoted the speeches of the Premier on different occasions, and I dare say I could quote him, and he me; but I do not think any good will come from prolonging the debate, or that we shall mend matters until we determine that we will not borrow except for the definite purpose of increasing our productions and, with them, the solid wealth of the country.

Sir J. VOGEL.—At this late hour I shall not reply to the extraordinary charges made by the honourable member for Egmont in respect to the late Government as to paying the interest due in England. I will only say, at present, that the honourable member clearly does not understand the practice which he himself has adopted for years. He has taken exception to a course whilst, acting under the directions of the Treasury officers, he has been pursuing precisely the same course for years past. Instead of complaining that I telegraphed part of the interest Home on one occasion only, the honourable gentleman should have acknowledged that for more than a year before he left office he did the very same himself on account of all the interest payable in England. As to the question of selling deficiency bills when the revenue was short at a particular period of the year, that is a practice which has always obtained here and in other countries in order to raise revenue. The honourable gentleman ought to know that it is impossible to pay interest on the date it is due unless the Auditor-General is satisfied that there is sufficient to the credit of the consolidated revenue to meet it; and the question of paying it in England or here is a financial detail of a not very difficult character. The honourable gentleman has no need to worry himself about meeting the payment in England of £1,300,000, if he has £1,300,000 at his command either here or in England. It is a very simple financial question; but I will go through it more at length on another occasion. I will only say, in conclusion, that a great set has been made against the honourable member for Mount Ida this evening because, after having expressed very strong opinions against the Government, he is going to vote with them. I am not sure that the honourable gentleman is not carrying out the practice of party government, for, having very strong views of his own, which do not quite coincide with those of either party, he has to choose with which party he will work. He makes his election, and it is not because, on a particular occasion, a vote arises on which he cannot agree with them that he can feel himself at liberty to leave his party, an announcement of the kind which the honourable member at the head of the Government made this evening having been made. It is no doubt an unfortunate thing for the honourable member for Mount Ida that he has so often to speak on one side and vote on the other; but he is not the only member who has done that, for I recollect a charge having been made against another gentleman years ago of doing something of the same kind. I myself feel that the honourable member for Mount Ida has certainly very strong views, which do not approach to the views held by either of the two principal parties in the House; and therefore it would not be reasonable to suppose he could work cordially with either party. The honourable gentleman is as different as wine from water from the honourable gentleman who is sitting next him; for, whereas the votes of the honourable member for Mount Ida are, I am convinced, always guided by a careful consideration of the questions with which he has to deal, the honourable member for Caversham is, unfortunately, the sport of personal passions and personal prejudice. If anybody who was on the scene when a similar Government to the present one was in office formerly should remember the part the honourable member for Caversham then took, and could see now the eagerness with which he always tries to make the best of the views of the Government, views with which the honourable gentleman entirely disagrees, he would have before him a strange study of human nature—a strange illustration of how it is possible for any honourable gentleman to put small questions of a personal kind far above questions of a large and national character, with which he is sent here to deal, and which you, Sir, almost solemnly ask him to deal with when he is first introduced to the House. I am obliged to the honourable member for Caversham for the great importance he attaches to me personally, and therefore I am one of those who would be glad to think that, as he grows older and attains a riper age, he will take a higher view of matters than he is now able to do. There is another honourable gentleman—who is not now present, and to whom, therefore, I shall not refer—the honourable member for Wallace, who has extremely strong personal feelings. Sir, I have to say this, in conclusion: that honourable members are entirely deceived if they suppose that they can decide a three years' policy on the votes we may now pass in Committee of Supply. The Premier has told them they can do so, and I tell them the contrary. They can discuss the question of simply how much they can vote for the present year. There is not one vote in ten among the estimates now before us on which honourable members will have an opportunity of expressing by their votes whether or not they approve the system of deciding three and a half years' expenditure now. The amendment moved by the honourable member for Dunedin Central is an amendment which says this: "We will give you sufficient money to provide you with what you will require for financial purposes, and we will give you sufficient means to carry on necessary works in the two parts of the Public Works Fund that may possibly be deficient before we shall have an opportunity of providing you with a larger amount next session, if we approve of doing so. At present we desire to curtail very much the expenditure of borrowed money, and therefore we shall give you the smallest possible loan that we think will be sufficient to provide both for financial necessities and to carry on public works which are being carried on, and which we agree with you, should not be put an abrupt end to." That is the difference between the views of the honourable gentleman who moves the amendment and those of the Government. The Government want to bind the House for a longer period. The statement made by the Minister of Education, that the Government are bound by the Public Works Statement, is entirely erroneous; it is entirely deceiving the House; it is a mere speech in Hansard, and in no way binds the House in future. All the House will be bound to will be the votes for the current year that will be passed in Committee and afterwards in the Appropriation Act. The fact then will be that, in either case, we shall simply provide sufficient money for the expenditure till we meet again. But the Loan Act is so framed that, while it purports to give effect to the Public Works Statement, it leaves it open to the House to do in effect what it likes with the balance of the money afterward, which can be spent or put to such uses as the House chooses. It is a strange caricature on the opinions which were expressed during the elections that the Government should come down and ask for a larger loan than they can by any possibility require before the House has had an opportunity of meeting again and further considering what should be the future course in regard to public works. I shall support the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin Central, and I feel that those other honourable members who do so will at least be able to say that they have voted consistently with their promises to their constituents, whilst they will be able to feel a charitable sympathy with regard to those who find themselves compelled by other pledges to vote in a manner greatly against their conscientious views, and against the conscientious views of those who feel that during the first session of a Parliament, as well as during the next two sessions, they owe an obligation to the constituents who have elected them.

Mr. TURNBULL. — Unfortunately, I find myself differing from both the Premier and the late Colonial Treasurer. The opinion I have formed is that the Premier has not asked for a large enough loan, as I think it would be far wiser if he had asked so much as would have let us push on the railways at once, and complete them as fast as possible, in order to get the country out of its difficulty. It has been stated by one honourable member that it would take another million and a half to complete all the unfinished railways contemplated by the public-works policy; and in my opinion it would be far wiser to raise so much money at once as would enable us to push on all the lines with vigour to completion. Then, I think there is another very serious omission. We must know that in the future it will be impossible to provide for school-buildings out of loans, and I very much regret that in any loan-scheme brought forward there should not be a proposal to provide another half-million to be set apart in the hands of commissioners, the interest of which should be used for school and other buildings. This is a question which will cause great difficulty in this House in the future, and lead to a great deal of unpleasant legislation; and the only way to avoid it is what I suggest. Sir, the question of public borrowing is not a question that is forced on us so much by the necessities of the country as by the excessive borrowing of private individuals. If honourable members will look back for ten years they will see the difference between the rate of public and the rate of private borrowing in that time. Ten years ago the amount lent in the colony on mortgage under the Land Transfer Act was five millions, and to-day it is thirty millions. Therefore in ten years the amount of private indebtedness has increased sixfold, while the public debt has not quite doubled—it was nineteen millions ten years ago. There you get the plague-spot at once. It is of no use for the Government to stop borrowing: in fact, the very necessities of the country demand that the Government should borrow. It is very much better for the Government to borrow at 4 per cent. than for private individuals to borrow at 5 per cent. During the last year private individuals borrowed two millions. They had to do it in order to meet the necessities of the country, because the Government did not borrow; and that was a very great loss to the country. Honourable members may talk about the necessity of not further borrowing; but what have we been doing for years? We have been paying £28,000 a year for salaries in the Public Works Department; and I say it would be far better and cheaper for the Government to finish off the railways at once, and so save the cost of that department. The Government should come down with a complete scheme for finishing off the railways as fast as possible, and so save the cost of that great department, for which we are asked to vote £25,000 this year. That expensive establishment is kept up simply because the railways are not finished off and done with, as they ought to be—simply because we deal with them in a shilly-shallying manner, instead of pushing them vigorously to completion. One of the greatest objects proposed by the late Government was that there should be a vigorous prosecution of our railways; that there should not be grass growing on our uncompleted railways, but that they should be completed at once. If the late Government had taken the wise step of pushing on our public works to completion with great vigour, we should not find ourselves in the lamentable condition in which we are. I say it is a necessity that the Government should at once borrow the money to complete our railways. The securities of no country in the world should stand higher than those of New Zealand, and the returns from our various sources of revenue—the railways, Customs, property-tax, and other sources—are quite sufficient to warrant us in borrowing another four millions of money. It has been said by one honourable member to-night that to attempt to borrow much money now would lower the value of our securities, and that we could only get money at a ruinous rate. But, if there is any doubt as to that, what would be easier—though I own it would not be a plan which would be generally approved—I say, if there is any doubt as to the goodness of the security of New Zealand, what would be easier than to appoint a commissioner to whom should be handed over at once the proceeds of our Customs, our property-tax, and our railways for the payment of interest on the money borrowed? That would enable us to pay interest on another four millions of money. With £1,200,000 a year from Customs, £400,000 from property-tax, and the large sum which is the net return from our railways, there would be ample security for a large further loan to complete our railways. If those sums were paid over into the hands of commissioners there would be a guarantee for any amount of money we might raise—even if we went to the extent of four millions more than now. For the one reason alone that it would be possible by completing our railways to do away with the Public Works Department, and so save that large annual cost, the lines ought to be finished as fast as they possibly can be, for the cost of that department is equal to the interest on three quarters of a million of money every year. But so long as we keep to this system of making a little bit of railway here and a small piece there it will be necessary to maintain this large establishment; and therefore a large part of the money that should go towards the completion of our public works is being paid to the officers in that department solely to keep things going. I should be sorry to speak of any of these officers disrespectfully; but we have heard that there is “a way not to do it;” and it appears to me that, from the time those gentlemen have been there, the whole of the plans and preparations for all the railways should be completed long ago, and that if we had the money we might at once commence with the reduction of the expenditure. If any member of this House chooses to consider the position of the country, to look at our imports and exports—and these can now be estimated correctly from the returns—if it is calculated what we have exported and what we have received, it will be found that this country is going backward every year to the extent of a million and a half, and of necessity we must either support it by borrowing two millions privately, as was done last year, or we must borrow money to carry on our public works. There is a great advantage in choosing the alternative of borrowing to carry on public works; as, if we can complete the railways, they can be worked at very much less expense than now, because it must be obvious that, with a number of incomplete lines, with terminal stations at different points, and therefore extra officers employed, these alone must be a great cause of our railways not paying interest. A great deal of the loss is solely due to their incompleteness. I regret very much that the present Government have not shown a bold front and asked for a larger loan; for, if we are going to extend the spending of what is proposed to be borrowed over three years, instead of being a benefit the public works will be carried on at a very great loss to the colony. These works, instead of being dragged out so as to extend over three years, should be completed in eighteen months. The question is asked, When you stop borrowing publicly, what is to be the condition of the country? I say, if we borrow this money we shall enable prudent men, men who have taken notice of the coming storm, to put themselves in such a position that the blow, when it comes, will not fall heavily upon them. I look on borrowing as an inevitable necessity. Rather than bind ourselves not to borrow for three years, it would be far better to borrow enough money at once to complete the lines, so that our railways might be returning a considerable amount of money, and thus help to pay the interest on our debt. Then, instead of their returning 2 or 2½ per cent. as they now are doing, they would yield 4 per cent; and 4 per cent. on fifteen millions would pay half the interest on our colonial debt. During the elections I pointed out the necessity for borrowing, and I say the Treasurer has shown wisdom in having the courage to bring down a Loan Bill, and I should have been very much more satisfied if he had brought down a Bill for another million and a half, so as to complete the public-works policy, and then to say that borrowing should cease altogether. Then, there is the question of those harbours which will have to be taken over by the colony; they will not, however, increase our liabilities. It is said that the further we extend our railways the less they pay; but the reason for that must be obvious to every one. We are carrying these railways through private property of many thousands of acres in extent, and there is not enough traffic to justify the extensions. A wise system of taxation would in a short time remedy that. I shall support the Loan Bill, and, unless very strong reasons are given against any individual vote, I shall find myself, in the main, supporting the proposals.

Mr. MILLS.—We have heard the old story to-night of charges levied against the independent members of this House—charges against those honourable gentlemen that they have formed themselves into a servile following of the Ministry. I should not like it to go forth unchallenged that we have been false to our election-pledges, and I can only say, for myself and for several others who are acting with me, that it is only after very careful consideration that we have given that general support to the present Ministry which we have given so far; and it has been purely because they have brought down measures which were in entire accordance with those pledges which we gave to our constituents during the late elections. I would point to the several measures that have so far been passed by this House as an evidence of this—as an evidence that the present Ministry have gone as far in the direction of retrenchment as the most exacting could desire, and as far as could be expected of them during the short time they have had at their disposal to bring this about. They have, in the first place, carried through measures effecting very drastic retrenchment in the salaries of Ministers, and in the salary attached to the position of Governor. They have carried through Bills reducing the number of members of this House, and reducing the honoraria of members of both Houses. They have carried through land measures which are calculated to encourage settlement on the land, settlement of all classes, and to do away with many of the objections that have characterized the land-administration for some years past. They have also carried through a measure for placing the management of our railways under a Board, which I am very hopeful will have very beneficial results, and which I hope will lead to very much more satisfactory returns from the railways in the future. These measures are so much in accordance with the attitude which many of us took up during the elections that I cannot see how it can reasonably be expected that we should do otherwise than give a fair support to the Ministry during this session. What attitude we shall take in the future it is hard to say. That depends very much on how far these honourable gentlemen carry out the promises they are making to us. I hold that the position we have taken up is such that we are not pledged to them in any way, at all events beyond the present session. I shall be very much interested to notice how some honourable members on the other side of the House will reconcile their conduct to their constituents when they go before them again. Many honourable members, to my knowledge, took a very strong stand during the election on these very questions to which I have alluded and which have been carried successfully through the House. Those honourable gentlemen indicated their intention to advocate a reduction of Ministers' salaries, a reduction of the Governor's salary, a reduction in the number of members, a reduction in the honorarium, and a change in the administration of railways; and yet these same honourable gentlemen have taken a most active part in harassing Ministers during this session, and have done all in their power to prevent the carrying of these measures into effect. With regard to this loan, I do not feel myself in the same delicate position in which some honourable members have felt themselves, because, although during the election I strongly advocated retrenchment and a tapering-off of borrowing, at the same time I very clearly let it be understood that, however desirable it might be to stop borrowing in theory, I looked upon it as an impossibility and very undesirable in the circumstances of the colony. It is all very well to say, "It is all nonsense, this borrowing: stop borrowing, stop these public works"—I am perfectly certain that to do so would lead to very disastrous results. It strikes one with terror to think what would be the result of a sudden stoppage of public works: thousands of people would be thrown out of employment, and this would increase to an alarming extent the distress and depression which now exist in the colony. I feel perfectly free, therefore, to support this proposal to borrow, and to taper off public-works expenditure in such a way as is shown in the proposals attached to the scheme of the Minister for Public Works. No doubt it is impossible for any Minister to indicate exactly what shall be the course of public works during three years; but the present Ministry have indicated a tapering-off policy. As regards the loan itself, I should certainly like to have seen some provision made for borrowing in the colony. I feel convinced that, if the Minister would so formulate the proposals in the Loan Bill as that he could borrow, say, half a million within the colony, he would have no difficulty in raising the money, and he could delay going on the London market for perhaps another year or eighteen months, during which time the effect of the retrenchment and the new management of railways would be shown, and the investing public of London would be thoroughly satisfied that the honest desire of the colony is to retrieve its position and make its revenue meet its expenditure; and so, when the time came to go on the London market, we should be able to sell our loan at a very satisfactory figure. I would strongly urge the Minister to give his attention to this question of borrowing a moderate amount—say, half a million—in the colony.

An Hon. MEMBER.—At what rate?

Mr. MILLS.—I believe it possible to get it at 5 or, at all events, 5½ per cent. I contend that it would pay us to give 5½ per cent. in the colony. I would only explain that a loan in the colony would be liable to property-tax, and that we should thus do away with the heavy commissions, exchanges, and discounts on our loans raised in London; and the difference would be very little against the colony, and that little we could afford to give, because the loan would be floated within the colony and the money would be spent amongst ourselves. I think on public grounds, also, it is desirable that some such fund should be created, into which trust funds could be placed. Trust funds in the colony are increasing, small and large, and there is great difficulty in finding investments. If some such loan were set apart purely for the investment of trust funds, I am sure it would be very much appreciated. I would simply reiterate that I think such a course would tend to increase our credit in London, and would improve the prospects of our loan very much when it becomes necessary to go on the London market.

Mr. PERCEVAL.—I must congratulate the Government upon having such a hearty supporter as the honourable member for Port Chalmers. His speech has been a panegyric upon the economies of the Government. Nobody was more prepared to support a policy of retrenchment than I was, and I have endeavoured to give the Government a hearty support in their retrenchment proposals, but it seems to me that these retrenchment proposals, so far, are really very trifling. We have had the Honorarium Bill, and we have had the reduction in the Governor's salary—which, however, does not take effect for some time—and we have had the Ministers' Salaries and Allowances Bill. But the total amount saved by these measures is really very trifling, and the main question of retrenchment has really not been touched yet: that has to come. I only hope the Government will carry out the pledges they have given to the House in this direction; and I think that our time would have been better occupied if we had had more time given us to consider the retrenchment proposals of the Government in detail. I fear that when these proposals come before us we shall not have an opportunity of giving them the attention that they demand; and I think, instead of wasting the time that undoubtedly has been wasted this session, if we had given full consideration to this question we should have been doing more valuable work. Now, Sir, with regard to the present loan proposals, I must say that I have been very much surprised at the absence of criticism of the borrowing proposals of the Government. The policy of the Government may be divided into three heads—their retrenchment policy, their borrowing policy, and their taxation policy. In respect to their retrenchment policy, both sides of the House were willing to assist them in carrying that out; but, when we come to the borrowing proposals of the Government, I must say I have thought it most extraordinary that so few honourable members should have risen to oppose that policy; and I have been amusing myself this evening with turning up two or three election speeches, and I will ask the House to listen to them for a few minutes, to show what I consider the inconsistency of certain honourable members. I shall, first of all, begin with the honourable member for Eden. He is the author of the Public Works Statement which is now before us; and in turning up his speech I find the following:—

Mr. Mills

"He [the Minister for Public Works] had always voted against the borrowing system but once, when it was absolutely necessary. Their present indebtedness was £34,000,000, and he thought that at present the colony would rest. The Premier [referring to Sir Robert Stout] evidently thought differently, for he said in a recent speech that he was in favour of another two-million loan. This was said to be for the completion of the Otago Central and Helensville North Railways. Well, much as he would like to see the Helensville North Railway done, he felt that he could not give his support to such a loan.—(A Voice: 'Sorry for that.')—Yes, and so was he, for he believed that line would be the saving of Auckland, for it would open up some really excellent land. Still, he thought that they should not borrow any more until they could pay the interest of the loan from the ordinary revenue without increasing the burdens of the people. No doubt the time would arrive when that could be done."

Now, it seems to me that when the honourable gentleman gets into office he plays a different tune altogether. I am not going to read any more speeches, but I will mention the following honourable members as members who have been the most strong in their advocacy of retrenchment during the late elections. We have the honourable members for Dunedin East, Caversham, Selwyn, Ponsonby, Wairoa, Ashley, Gladstone, and Mount Ida—who are now loud in their demands for further borrowing, or rather, I should say, silent in their opposition to it. I do not say that each of these honourable members I have named goes so far as some of the advocates do. I hear the member for Ashley protesting; but, if the honourable member would like me to quote him verbatim, I can do so.

Major ATKINSON.—We would rather have the proof another day.

Mr. PERCEVAL.—I do not wish to do the honourable gentleman any injustice. What he said was this: "Any further borrowing was not necessary, and on works of this kind would meet with his strongest opposition." He was referring to the Otago Central Railway and the railway north of Auckland. "The time had arrived to cease borrowing."

Mr. PEARSON.—May I ask what paper that is reported in?

Mr. PERCEVAL.—This is from the paper which gave its strongest support to the honourable member for Ashley—the Press newspaper.

Mr. PEARSON.—That is not a correct report.

Mr. PERCEVAL.—I am well pleased to give the honourable member an opportunity of denying it. We have been told to-night by a great many honourable members that if we stop borrowing we shall inflict a very great injustice on the people of the colony. What I want to know is this: whether our public-works policy is to develop the works of the colony, or whether it is to be another means of distributing charitable aid. Honourable members seem to rely on it to provide work for the "unemployed." This, I contend, is a wrong view to take of the public-works policy; and, if it is the right view, we ought to stop it at once. We shall have to stop some time, and shall have to face the matter, and the sooner we face it the better. But it seems to me that it would have been much better if the Government, seeing the present difficulty in which the colony is, and seeing that we are to meet early next year, had said, "We will only carry out existing engagements and complete the contracts now in hand during this year." We should then have had an opportunity of criticizing the retrenchment proposals of the Government, and of testing further the paying capacity of many of these lines, because I feel assured that very many of these lines should never have been undertaken; and if you go through the papers which have been furnished by the department they seem to show this: that the farther the line is open the less it pays. There are some lines, undoubtedly, that cannot pay until they are completed; but it does not seem at all correct to say the farther you go with a line the more it pays. Now with regard to the construction of railways by means of land-grants. A good deal of our attention has been taken up with this topic; and I should like to say this: that, if we were in a different position, there would have been no stronger opponent of this system than I myself should have been; but, looking at the present circumstances of the colony, I really think it the best means of constructing some of our lines; and I shall be only too pleased to see the North Island Main Trunk line and the Otago Central line constructed on the principle of land-grants. The honourable member who spoke last made a suggestion, which I think is deserving of some notice, as to raising a small loan in the colony. If it could be done, I think it would be an excellent thing; but I think the honourable member for Port Chalmers is too sanguine in his expectations. I do not think there is money available in the colony at the present time for this purpose. I feel certain the loan would not be taken up with such readiness as he anticipates. I intend, Sir, to vote for the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin Central, because it is in accord with my election-pledges that I should vote for the least possible amount of borrowing. There are, certainly, lines in the colony which must be made. There is the line between Woodville and Palmerston—I consider that a line which cannot be delayed; and there may be one or two other lines which may be in the same position. I feel perfectly satisfied of this: that there are several lines in the schedule which we should not proceed with further; and I hope that when we get into Committee of Supply we shall have an opportunity of cutting out some of those lines. It seems to me that the course pursued by the proposer of this amendment is a proper course. It is very much wiser, in my estimation, to say, first of all, "We will only borrow so much; we think the colony cannot afford to borrow more than a certain amount, and then we will consider the works which would pay the best to construct." This seems to me to be the proper plan. I think we should do more justice to the colony by following such a course as this than by following the system proposed of considering the various works proposed in Committee, and then lessening the loan by the amount of the reductions. The reason I propose to support this amendment is this: that it is only natural that honourable members should put their heads together to assist each other to get the works they want. I think this is an invitation to "log-roll;" that is the right word, I think. It seems to me to be an invitation to this course, and that has been the ruin of the colony in the past. There is one point which I wish to lay stress upon. It is that there is no doubt that this is the worst time we can go on the market, and, as the Premier himself says in his Financial Statement,—

"If the House should so determine, it will be possible with the money at our disposal to find the funds to carry on necessary works to a moderate extent by borrowing from one Account in aid of the funds exhausted in another. And by doing this, and limiting our public-works expenditure to an average of £70,050 a month for the next fifteen months, which, I am informed, it can be gradually worked down to—as compared with an average of £97,000 a month, which it has been during the last twelve months—namely, from the end of September, 1886, to the end of September, 1887—it will be possible to find the means of carrying on our public works until the end of December, 1888."

To draw from one Account to assist another is certainly rather a pernicious system; but I think that, in the present circumstances of the country, it is better to do that and to postpone the floating of this loan for the present time, for it can only be floated with disastrous results to the country.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I regret to say that I am unable to support the amendment moved by the honourable member for Dunedin Central, although I am against borrowing, because that amendment does not fix the period over which the loan is to be spread. If the mover will make it £500,000, and no more borrowing for three years, I will support him. I think a million is more than this House should sanction, and I see no reason why a number of these small lines should be continued. For instance, I see no reason why the Helensville Railway should be continued at the present time. About £50,000 was granted out of the 1886 loan to that work, and yet we have it proposed that this line should receive an allocation out of the present loan, simply to form it some eight miles more; and it follows that, if we carry out this proposal, in the course of three years it will be necessary to raise a further sum for supplying this railway with rails and rolling-stock. I think that line might very well stand over, so far as further extension is concerned, for the present. Then, again, we have a line going up to Rotorua. That line had some £93,000 out of the 1886 loan, and now a further allocation is asked for it. It is astonishing to me that we should be asked to push on lines going through very indifferent country or opening up Native lands. Then, we have a further proposal to extend a line in the Blenheim district, though, I think, our experience of lines in that part of the colony shows us that the expenditure brings in no return. There is already in existence a Blenheim-Pictou line, on which £198,000 has been spent, and, calculating we have to pay 4½ per cent. for the money expended on that line, it yields us so little in return that we lose actually £8,900 per annum over that little line. Last year we only received back from that line towards paying interest on its cost about £98, or 11d. per cent. It seems to me a strange thing that, while the Government are passing a Bill creating a non-political Board of Management, in order to get better returns from our railways, they should proceed to construct lines which every one must know must be unproductive. Then, we have another instance in the case of a line running to Taranaki, upon which we lose £50,000 a year. If our non-political Board is to be of any use at all we must turn over a new leaf in connection with the construction of our railways, and decide not to make any lines which will not bring us in, say, 2½ per cent. on the outlay; because a non-political Board cannot be successful if new lines are constructed which will never pay. It may exercise its power in a wrong way by trying to reduce the rate of wages paid to the people who are working on the lines, and at the same time increase the price charged for carrying goods. I think this proposed loan ought to be reduced, and, though I shall support the second reading of the Bill, I shall in Committee move that certain proposed items of expenditure be lessened. I hope that the Premier will assist us as far as possible in reducing this amount. That is the object I have in supporting the second reading of this Bill. The honourable member for Port Chalmers expressed very clearly the sentiments which I intended to express as regards the Government. I agree with most of their policy; but I do not consider that the Land Act is a wise measure. I have my doubts about that measure. I am afraid that under it we shall have large blocks taken up by monopolists, and that we shall find we have begun upon a course which will not be very satisfactory in its results to the colony. The land ought not to be sold in such large blocks.

Mr. TAYLOR.—The honourable member for Christchurch South has referred to a speech made by the Minister for Public Works. It is something to this effect: that at the elections the Minister for Public Works did not consider it was absolutely necessary to have a further loan. It is quite true that he may not have considered it absolutely necessary at that time, but he was not then on the Government benches. What was considered absolutely unnecessary then may be absolutely necessary now. That is where the distinction comes in. I do not mean to say that the Minister for Public Works did not express his views honestly and fairly; but we all know that circumstances alter cases, and that what might have been very undesirable in a certain set of circumstances is very desirable now. That is what it amounts to. I have listened to the speeches of several members of this House to-night, and all I can say is this: that, so far as I am personally concerned, I should not like to be in their position. They speak one way—and what are they going to do? They are going to walk out of the House; they are not going to vote. They denounce the proposals of the Government, and yet they are going to swallow the leak. I think that it is a position in which no honourable gentleman should place himself.

Mr. HOBBS.—Oh!

Mr. TAYLOR.—The honourable member for the Bay of Islands says "Oh!" No doubt he is an intellectual and intelligent gentleman, but I have not yet heard him say one word with reference to the Government proposals. I am not certain that he is not pledged to a non-borrowing policy. We do not know. Sir, he is too astute to let us know what he was really pledged to; therefore I trust that we shall hear from him before the close of the debate. I regret extremely the action of the honourable member for Mount Ida. I have great respect for that honourable gentleman, but I can have no respect for a man who speaks one way and is not prepared to give his vote in the direction in which he speaks. I know that the Government have an absolute majority, but we have honourable members supporting them who are in a very peculiar position. I do hope that when they go before the people they will be able to justify themselves for the vote that they are giving to-night. If a public man is not prepared to stick to his opinions I do not think much of him; and I am afraid that we have a good many men in this House who have not the courage of their opinions. I can only say this: that so long as I have a seat in this House you will not find me blindly following the lead of any Government. It is all very well for the Premier to smile, as I see he is smiling. I noticed that when the honourable member for Mount Ida was speaking this evening the Premier smiled just as he did the other night when the honourable member for Mount Ida was going back from his word. The Premier, no doubt, says of that gentleman, "He may speak strongly against us, but when he is wanted he will vote for us." But are these the kind of supporters that the Premier places confidence in? Why, they may smile the other way to-morrow. I believe that no party is safe when it is kept in office by honourable gentlemen of that character. The honourable member for Caversham was quite as bad as the honourable member for Mount Ida. He does not like these proposals, but I know he is not going to vote in favour of the amendment. What a nice state of things we are coming to, when we find honourable gentlemen who do not like the financial proposals of the Government, who do not want to borrow, and yet have not the courage to vote against those proposals! I am going to vote in favour of the amendment of the honourable member for Dunedin Central, because I vote upon principle, and it is monstrous to me to conceive that any honourable gentleman should act as some are doing. I have never spoken one way and voted another; nor am I going to talk palaver of that kind. I am sorry the Premier sighs. I suppose he is getting tired and weary.

Major ATKINSON.—I am thinking of the estimates. We shall only have about two hours on the estimates to-night.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I understood the estimates were not coming on to-night. Of course we know that the hour is late, and that we are getting rather too much, and especially when you consider the gentlemen reporting.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They have stopped reporting.

Mr. TAYLOR.—Well, you cannot wonder at it, because they are absolutely obliterating any political sense when honourable gentlemen talk one way and vote another. I hope the Minister of Justice is not getting angry.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Never mind him.

Mr. TAYLOR.—Well, he is not worth minding much, excepting when he has got a little Bill on the board.

Major ATKINSON.—I would ask the honourable gentleman to remember that the Speaker is in the chair, and that Ministers have an immense amount of work to do.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I have been subjected to continual interruptions by the prominent supporters of the Government, and I have yet to learn that the honourable member for the Bay of Islands has a monopoly of speech in this House: and if he had he would not instruct many honourable members. I do trust that none of these interruptions will recur. I will content myself by simply voting for the amendment, and I am sorry that by my remarks I should have caused that serious sigh.

The House divided on the question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

Word retained, and Bill read a second time.

The House adjourned at twenty-five minutes past two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Friday, 16th December, 1887.

Second Readings—Third Readings—Culverden-Hammer Plains Road—Mangopapa and Mangoiira Blocks—Divisions—Joint House Committee—Wellington College and Girls' High School Bill—Native Land Administration Act Repeal Bill—Land Bill—Wairarapa North County Council Empowering Bill—Oamaru Harbour Board Loan Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SECOND READINGS.

Otago Harbour Board Bill, Pukekohe Borough Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Civil Service Reform Bill, Government Loans to Local Bodies Bill, Christchurch Hospital Bill, Christchurch Drainage Board Reserves Sale and Exchange Bill, Building Societies Bill.

CULVERDEN-HAMMER PLAINS ROAD.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK asked the Government, If they will take such steps as may cause the road from Culverden to the Hammer Plains Hot-springs to be placed in fair order, so that the springs may be made use of by the public without undergoing torture to reach them? He might say that he had recently visited these springs, and had found great difficulty in getting to them. It was a difficult matter even for persons in good health, much more therefore for invalids. He believed if the Government could manage to do as he had requested they would enhance the railway revenue and increase the revenue derived from the baths themselves.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said that, the Christchurch Labour Bureau having stated that this work was suitable for some of the "unemployed" to be employed upon, the following steps had been taken: The Minister for Public Works had authorised the expenditure of a moderate sum to improve the road, and steps would be taken at once to have that work proceeded with. He could hardly undertake to say whether the amount to be expended on the road would be sufficient to obviate travellers being put to the torture referred to in the question; but, at all events, it was hoped that it might alleviate their sufferings.

MANGOPAPA AND MANGOIRA BLOCKS.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND, in moving the motion standing in his name, said the document he asked for referred to a matter which was a portion of the subject of two petitions which were now before a Select Committee of the Council. He would not detain the Council with going into details upon the subject; but he desired to press the motion, because the document was of so peculiar a nature, and it appeared on the face of it to be so thoroughly irregular, that he thought it would be expedient that the Council should have before it a sample of the style of administration which prevailed, he believed, to a large extent in the Native Land Court. He begged to move the motion standing in his name.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND begged to second the motion. Only that morning, before the Public Petitions Committee, a petition was under consideration which alleged that certificates had been improperly granted by Chief Judge Macdonald in a certain case. He thought that, considering that the third reading of a Bill would come on before the Council presently which, if passed, would legalise the transactions complained of, it was necessary that honourable members should have copies of all these certificates before them; and he hoped the Council would not allow the Bill to be read a third time until this matter had been properly cleared up.

Motion made, and question put, "That there be laid on the table copies of all certificates granted by Chief Judge Macdonald under sections 24 and 25 of 'The Native Land Administration Act, 1886,' relating to the Mangopapa and Mangoira Blocks, Mokau; and of all documents on which such certificates were founded."

—(Hon. Mr. RICHMOND.)

Motion agreed to.

DIVISIONS.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE, in moving the resolution standing in his name, said he thought it was desirable that a different system of recording votes in divisions of the Council should be adopted. The proposal which he now brought forward was not a new one, because in August, 1873, he tabled a resolution to almost the same effect. It had been brought to the notice of the Council within the last two or three days that there had been some error in the record of the votes of honourable members. Such blunders should not be placed on record in the Journals of the Council. In the Imperial Parliament during divisions members passed to the right or left of the chamber, as the Speaker directed. In Canada there was a departure from this method which might perhaps meet the convenience of members of the Council. That was, the Speaker or Chairman of Committees for the time being directed the "Ayes" to stand, and during that time the Clerks at the table took down the names of the members. Then the Speaker directed the "Noes" to stand, and their votes were similarly recorded; and the Clerk, having completed the lists and counted the numbers, handed the lists to the Speaker. Perhaps that system might meet the views of the Council. At all events, he would beg to move the motion which appeared in his name.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND seconded the motion. He thought there might be one inconvenience in the latter method referred to by the Hon. Captain Baillie. Suppose honourable members were called upon to stand, and one honourable gentleman was unable to stand—an honourable gentleman might be physically incapable of rising to his feet. He knew of an honourable member who had come into the Council Chamber on crutches; so that that method might be rather inconvenient in some cases.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the divisions in this Council should in future be taken in the same manner as in the Upper House of the English Parliament, namely, the members should pass to the right and left of the Chair, as may be directed by the Hon. the Speaker or by the Hon. the Chairman of Committees."—(Hon. Captain BAILLIE.)

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER thought the proposal of the honourable member would be an inconvenient one. There were two methods of taking divisions in Canada—one method adopted in the Senate, and the other in the House of Commons, as it was called there. Perhaps the method adopted in the House of Commons in Canada would be better than that recommended by the Hon. Captain Baillie; and he proposed, That all the words after the word "taken" be omitted, with the view of inserting the words "by members rising in their seats." That was a simple method. When the "Ayes" were called the honourable members voting with the "Ayes" would rise in their seats, and the Clerks would take down the names. A similar method would be adopted in recording the votes for the "Noes." This method would not put honourable members to inconvenience, and then they would always have accurate division-lists. It was entirely the fault of honourable members themselves when errors occurred at present, because he noticed that some honourable members never spoke out. There were some few who did; and he himself always endeavoured to make himself heard on all occasions. If all honourable members did the same the present difficulty would not have arisen. The best system to adopt, he thought, would be that in force in the Canadian Assembly, where members, on the voices being called, rose in their seats.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN did not think the Council ought to alter the present mode of procedure in taking a division, as it was a very simple mode, as was proved by the fact that whilst it had been in use only one mistake had taken place. Such a mistake was not likely to occur again, and he noticed in a division that day that honourable members had spoken out more loudly than before. He thought it was a pity to alter the present system, which had been found a very satisfactory one, and he hoped that both the motion and the amendment would be thrown out.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL thought it would be well for the Council, before giving way to a sudden impulse on the part of the Chairman of Committees, to adopt in this Chamber a method of taking divisions similar to that which existed in the other Chamber. He would remark that under the present system, which had existed for fourteen years, he had only seen one mistake.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Two.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL granted that there were two, though he did not know of more than one. The present method was so simple that he noticed the last division had been taken in two minutes and forty seconds; and he objected to the "hugger-mugger style" suggested by the Chairman of Committees, of hustling honourable members away into corners in order to take their votes. The suggestion of the Attorney-General might be better, but it was rather a school-boy way of taking a division. But it should be insisted upon that honourable gentlemen should give their answer in a loud tone of voice. He had actually known a Ministry to be thrown out simply from the accident of one weak-minded member rushing into the wrong lobby to ask a friend of his how he was going to vote. This was how the Stafford Ministry, in 1861, came to grief; and this incident showed the uncertainty which would ensue from altering the present style, which was plain and straightforward.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER thought that the present system was capable of being made quite good enough if honourable members would give their votes in an audible tone of voice; but he much preferred the suggestion of the Chairman of Committees to that made by the Hon. Sir F. Whitaker. It appeared to him that if they adopted the plan proposed in the amendment there would be a great liability to mistake, as when the "Ayes" were taken down, and the "Noes" were called upon to stand up, some of them might retain their seats; and there would thus be a greater chance of making a mistake than under the present system, or that which was proposed by the Hon. Captain Baillie. He thought there was a disadvantage, however, in connection with the present mode of taking votes, because the Clerk always commenced on the same side of the chamber, giving members on the other side of the chamber an opportunity of seeing which way the voting was going.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL thought the honourable gentleman ought not to impute motives, and he believed that he was referring to him in what he had said. It seemed to be thought that he would vote in fun; but in the whole course of his experience he had never associated fun with anything he had done. He gave that assurance most solemnly to the Council, and he always gave his vote with a proper understanding of the question, as far as he could appreciate it, and with a distinct desire of expressing his vote according to his opinions.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER disclaimed any intention of imputing motives to the honourable gentleman.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said he thought the honourable member did not quite apprehend the nature of the proposal he had made. This proposal was that the names should be taken precisely as they were now, but, in order that there should be no mistakes in recording the votes, instead of sitting an honourable member should stand whilst giving his vote. A Bill was lost the other day simply through a mistake of the Clerk in not catching which way a vote was given; and the method proposed would not retard business any more than the present system.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS suggested that, if this system were adopted, in many cases members might retain their seats in both cases, and not give their votes with either the "Ayes" or the "Noes." He had seen that done in the other branch of the Legislature, where members had been lying down in their seats and had afterwards been called upon to record their votes. Such a thing might happen if this system were adopted in this Council. He did not see, however, what harm there would be done by adopting the motion, as it would be a great advantage for honourable members to go boldly forward and record their votes. He trusted that the method would be adopted, as it would do away with the practice which was followed now, of certain honourable members counting the votes as they were given, and giving their own votes accordingly.

The Hon. Captain FRASER would have much pleasure in supporting the motion. He pointed out that sometimes honourable members were apparently asleep, and had to be roused up in order to give their votes under the present system.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK said, if the resolution were carried, he did not know how they were going to give effect to it, nor did he think that there was room enough in the Council Chamber to carry out the plan suggested. He preferred the plan suggested by the Hon. Sir F. Whitaker; but he thought it would be a mistake to alter the present system, as it would lead to confusion.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES said it was easy for the Council to insist that members should give their votes in a loud tone; but he thought any change would not be for the better, such as this that had been proposed. In his opinion it was a matter for surprise that so few mistakes had occurred in the past.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER thought the amendment of the Hon. the Attorney-General would simply result in nothing. It was all very well to say that honourable members must stand up; but they knew very well that standing up would very soon degenerate into a sort of gesture, by which not a great amount of space would be seen between the honourable member and his seat; and it would be practically giving the votes as at present. He thought the fact that there had been only one or two mistakes up to the present time was sufficient to induce them to continue the present system, instead of making such a great deal of fuss about nothing. With regard to the order of voting, from his experience in the Council he did not think it mattered which side voted first; and he believed in his own mind that every honourable member voted according to his conscience.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE thought the mistakes which were made were more numerous than some honourable members might have any idea of. If honourable members had noticed the way in which some gave their votes they would notice that in many cases it was impossible to catch the voice; and he had frequently taken down the list of the division as the votes were recorded, and found that in many cases his return was altogether different from that of the Clerk, though in some cases it accorded with the Clerk's.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPHARD asked the ruling of the Hon. the Speaker as to whether the Standing Orders would not have to be altered if this motion were carried. The motion as it stood would amount to a sessional order, and would cease to operate at the prorogation.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said there was no doubt, if the motion were carried, it would have to be followed up by a notice to amend the Standing Orders.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPHARD pointed out that honourable members would only be in session for a few days longer, and if they adopted this practice their experience would be too short to enable them to decide whether they should continue it next session or not. It had been pointed out that the present mode was full of uncertainties; but this arose from the comparatively inaudible manner in which honourable members gave their votes. If they spoke out there would be no difficulty. He might say there had been a distinct misrepresentation as to what was done the other day in reference to the vote given by the Hon. Major Wahawaha. It had been said that the honourable gentleman had made a mistake in giving his vote; but he did nothing of the kind. The honourable member voted rightly, but he was not taken down correctly. He (Mr. Shephard) thought it was right to say that the honourable gentleman did not make a mistake, but that the mistake was made in the record of the Clerk.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR agreed that the method adopted at present was a very simple and correct one, as was evidenced by the fact that only one mistake had been committed under it. This question was discussed some years ago, when the Council decided to take the divisions in the present convenient form. If they were to go into the lobby, one member would follow another; and, as to taking their votes in their present order of rotation, he pointed out that members changed their places every session, sometimes sitting on one side of the room and sometimes on the other. Therefore he did not think any advantage would be derived from altering this system.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN thought there was no doubt that this change was required. The Hon. Mr. Mantell had said that during the time he had been in the Council there had been only two mistakes. These were those which had been discovered, but there were probably many which had not been discovered. He thought the remedy rested entirely with members themselves. If they gave instructions to the Clerk to ask an honourable member to repeat his vote when he was in doubt, the difficulty would be got over. For his part, if an honourable member in future did not give his vote more distinctly, he himself would ask that it should be repeated.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON gave every credit for the way in which divisions had hitherto been taken, and he must confess that he had often wondered that the Clerk had been able to carry out the work so correctly. He made it a rule, as far as he could, to count the votes as they were given, and, on referring to the Clerk's returns, he found that his own counting coincided exactly with those returns. In this particular case, with regard to the vote of the Hon. Major Wahawaha, there was no doubt that the vote was given in an undertone, and it was very difficult to hear it, though he had heard it himself. If there was any necessity for a change, they should appoint scrutineers and check each vote, as was done in the other Chamber. In his opinion, the standing-up system would still leave an opening to error, because they could not say how the vote given was recorded on paper, and it was quite possible it might be wrong. He did not think that the fact that it was recorded in a certain way on paper was a proof that there was no error.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON thought that there would be any amount of check in the system proposed. With reference to the Ministry being last, he would suggest that next year the Clerk should begin with the Ministers, and call the names on that side first—that was, if it was decided that no change should take place. But, for his part, he would vote for the change indicated in the motion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER could not help thinking that a very great advantage would accrue to the Council if they adopted what he might call a more open manner of voting, and consented to put themselves to the inconvenience of going into the lobbies in giving their votes.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES thought the great object to be gained was to have a correct record. The present difficulty had arisen from the fact that the vote of one honourable member was incorrectly heard. If they attained a system by which the votes would be taken down correctly, they would attain all they wanted. He had been surprised that more errors had not occurred in taking the votes, and the Hon. Mr. Mantell had stated that only one error occurred during the last fourteen years. It appeared that in 1873, through an error having occurred, the Chairman of Committees made a spasmodic attempt to alter the mode of procedure, as on the present occasion. It was suggested that the Clerk should repeat the members' votes, and then there would be less hazard of the record being incorrect. The Council would see that it would be a mistake to hurry into a change of the mode of procedure; even if a majority of the Council, or a large section, should think some alteration was required, it would be a very great mistake to act hurriedly in the way now proposed, and to make this alteration. But if it was desirable to alter the practice which had been in operation for the last thirty years, he thought the matter ought to be relegated to a Committee to consider and report upon. He should vote against both motion and amendment.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND thought that some honourable members were too far away from the Clerk to insure perfect accuracy in the recording of the votes; and, if it were not infra dig. for the Clerk, he would suggest that that officer should get up and walk round the chamber, and take the votes, when he would be able to hear each member more distinctly.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT said the cause of the mistakes existed in this: that honourable members were ashamed of the votes they gave, and were afraid to give them in a manly, straightforward manner.

The Council divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

JOINT HOUSE COMMITTEE.

The Hon. Captain BAILLIE said he brought up a report of the Joint House Committee on the previous day. That report recommended that honourable members residing within twelve miles of Wellington should be the Joint House Committee during the recess, and that the Hon. Mr. Mantell be the convener. He begged to move, That the report be agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL moved, That the words "and that the Hon. Mr. Mantell be the convener" be struck out. It would be perfectly useless to appoint a convener who would not convene; and such an office was not a desirable one to fill at any time. He would be unable to attend to the business of the House Committee during the recess; and he thought it would be much better to leave it to the House Committee to elect their own Chairman. He hoped the honourable the mover would withdraw that part of the motion. If the House Committee chose to elect him Chairman, well and good; but he did not like to be put into the position by order of the Council.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES thought the motion should be adopted, as it had been so heretofore. At the beginning of the present session an investigation was made into the affairs of Bellamy's, and it was found that there were a great many persons who had not paid up their accounts. It was also apparent that there was a deficiency in the revenue, and that a large amount of money had not been paid. Such a state of things should not be allowed to exist in a place of that kind. There were a great many honourable members who usually boarded at Bellamy's, and there was considerable revenue derived from this establishment. Bellamy's got coals, house-room, gas, and some of their servants for nothing; yet they could not make both ends meet. He thought the management of Bellamy's must be exceedingly defective, or such a state of things could not exist. He considered, therefore, that the House Committee should be required, at the end of every session, to send in an account of the transactions of the year, and show precisely how the different funds of that establishment stood, and who owed money, and what was due to Bellamy's. It had been found at the beginning of the session that there was a large overdraft at the Bank of New Zealand, and a considerable sum of money was due to Messrs. Cockburn and Campbell. He was happy to say that the little he had done had assisted in putting the matter to some extent right again, and that shortly after the commencement of the session nearly, if not all, the amounts then owing were paid. There was no difficulty in keeping this matter straight. It only required a little business capacity, and he thought some one should be on the Committee who would insist on a proper management of Bellamy's.

The Hon. Mr. LAHMANN said that at the last meeting of the Joint House Committee an arrangement was proposed in order to put the matter on a more businesslike footing. He had no doubt that, if these proposals were carried out, it would be found that next session the expense in connection with Bellamy's would be considerably less, the profits would be larger, and the present debt would be paid off altogether.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND thought the management of Bellamy's ought to be very narrowly looked into. He remembered that in his second session he was called upon to contribute two guineas to make up a deficiency in connection with Bellamy's. A contract had been entered into that a man should cater for Bellamy's, and the House Committee wanted to get rid of him; so honourable gentlemen had to contribute two guineas all round in order that the Committee might get rid of that contractor. If this matter were not looked after very narrowly, one of these fine days honourable members would find themselves called upon to contribute five or ten guineas each in order to make up a serious deficiency, so as to prevent a claim being made on the country: and in times like the present he did not think that any House Committee would dare to propose to make the country pay it. Therefore honourable members would have to make up the deficiency, whatever it might be.

Motion agreed to.

WELLINGTON COLLEGE AND GIRLS' HIGH SCHOOL BILL.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—Before proceeding to the orders of the day, I will give a ruling on a question which was referred to me by the Council. It was good enough to give me time till to-day to consider the matter. When, yesterday, the Hon. Mr. McLean brought under the notice of the Council that there had been an error in the division taken the day before, several honourable members expressed their opinions on the subject, and the Hon. Major Wahawaha was interrogated from the Chair, and he informed the Council that on the occasion in question he had given his vote with the "Ayes," whereas upon production of the division-list it appeared that he had been counted as having voted with the "Noes." If his vote had been recorded with the "Ayes" the Bill which was then under consideration would have passed by a majority of one, instead of being lost. I had then to consider how far that record should remain unchallenged, or whether it was right that the minutes of the Council should be corrected. The general rule, which I had carefully to consider, is, undoubtedly, to this effect: that, upon the question being raised as to the accuracy of a division-list, it should be of essence that such objection should be taken there and then. But, upon the maturest reflection which I have been able to give to the subject, I have come to the conclusion that that principle rests upon the practice which, if not the universal, is the general method of taking divisions, and is a different method from that which exists in this Council. By the parliamentary method generally pursued there are different steps taken. There are persons who check, and there is a going-out into different lobbies; and the procedure is of that character that, if the accuracy of the division is not challenged there and then, it is taken for granted that it has gone by default, and no Speaker would open the question afterwards. But it is a very grave question whether that rule which is generally observed, and for very obviously good reasons—whether it ought to be pursued in this Council, where our method of taking divisions is different. If in reality it were adopted, then any error must remain an error, and there are no means of checking it. I considered very carefully the Standing Orders of this Council, and, although I am bound to confess, in some respects, some of our Standing Orders are perhaps not the most accurate definitions, nevertheless on this occasion I think there has been a sagacity shown that is not perhaps apparent in every case. Standing Order 79 is as follows: "In case of confusion or error concerning the numbers reported, unless the same can be otherwise corrected the Council will proceed to a second division." That is, there and then, when the error occurs, and attention is drawn to it, the Council gives its decision in another division. But then comes the other case: Standing Order No. 80 says, "If the numbers have been inaccurately reported, the Council, on being afterwards informed thereof, will order the Journals to be corrected." Now, we have before us this fact: It became obvious that an error had been made, and the division was so close that the fate of the Bill depended on how that vote was given. I have come to this conclusion on the matter: that the minutes of the Council have to be altered, and I shall give direction accordingly that the division-list shall be amended, and the name of Major Wahawaha placed with the "Ayes" instead of with the "Noes;" and I now instruct the Clerk of the Council to place on the Order Paper to-morrow this order: "That the Wellington College and Girls' High School Bill be now read the second time." That will be the question that will be brought before the Council, and it will be in precisely the same position in which it was when this error was made. I should do wrong and fail in my duty towards an officer of this Council if I did not bear my testimony on this occasion as to the accuracy with which the Clerk performs his duties in taking divisions; and I say, with the greatest respect, that the error has arisen entirely owing to the inaudible manner in which honourable members sometimes give their voices.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—Sir, before proceeding to the orders of the day, I would ask the permission of the Council to make an explanation of a personal character. I need scarcely remind honourable members of some facts in reference to this Bill. My attention has been drawn to a paragraph which appeared in a paper published this morning in the City of Wellington, to which I desire to call attention, especially as it affects myself in connection with the Bill which has been before the Council. The paragraph is as follows:—

“Seeing that the members of the Legislative Council are so very anxious just now to impress on the public the great value of their services, and the inadequacy of the reduced rate of payment now to be given by an ungrateful country for those services, it is a little unfortunate that they should have done such a foolish and unwarrantable thing as to throw out the Wellington Girls' High School Bill. It will not enhance the public admiration of the Legislative Council to learn that many of the Councillors spoke and voted against the Bill in manifest ignorance of the merits of the case, and that the Bill was lost not by a direct vote, but through the mistake of a new Maori Councillor, who was unacquainted with the procedure, and inadvertently voted on the wrong side. Nor will it enhance the local appreciation of the Wellington representatives in that Chamber to know that no fewer than five of them—Messrs. Buckley, Martin, Grace, Hart, and Waterhouse—voted against the Bill; although, to their credit be it said, Mr. Randall Johnson and Mr. Pharazyn supported it. Neither will it greatly raise people's opinion of Mr. Buckley's consistency to see that he helped to throw out a Bill which was approved and virtually fathered by the late Ministry, of which he was a member. Indeed, he may be said to have practically defeated his own Bill, seeing that, had he voted for it, it would have been carried in spite of Major Wahawaha's blunder. As, however, that blunder is undisputed, and the Speaker confesses to some doubt as to his course of action, we trust he will give the Bill the benefit of the doubt, and not allow it to be destroyed through a mere inadvertence on the part of a new member.”

If it had not been for the respect which I have for the proprietor of that paper, whose large-heartedness, I know, is such that he is incapable of reflecting on any member of this Council personally, I should probably have made this a question of privilege. I think I need not go far to find out the writer of that paragraph; and the wonder is, he did not finish with some eulogium on himself.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who is he?

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—I would rather not mention the name. I should like to explain my action in connection with the Bill in question. The Hon. Dr. Grace was good enough to call attention to the fact that he endeavoured to persuade the Council not to pass the measure which caused the beginning of this trouble. He referred to the fact that there had been a violation of the rights of the citizens of Wellington in depriving them of an endowment to which they were entitled. I refer to the Special Powers and Contracts Act. I was surprised to find that in the schedule to that Act there was no mention whatever of the subject-matter of this Bill—that is, the land on which the Girls' High School has been erected—but on closer examination of the Act itself I find that the 6th clause of the Special Powers and Contracts Act, giving the Governors of the Wellington College possession of the land, referred to a piece of land under the provisions of an Act passed in 1878. Now, Sir, my object in calling attention to this Special Powers and Contracts Act is this—and I shall not detain the Council very long in doing so: I find that in 1885 this land was given to the Governors of the Wellington College, and I find shortly afterwards also that a mortgage of a very elaborate character was prepared and executed at the instance of the Governors, to enable them to raise funds for the purpose of erecting a girls' high school on the land. I was handed this mortgage to examine to-day, and I may explain to the Council that I never had an opportunity of seeing it before, although the newspapers say that I was the father of this Bill. I find that the mortgage was executed in December, 1886, and was prepared by the solicitor to the Board of College Governors, who is probably one of the best conveyancers in the colony. It was specially prepared in accordance with the law which then existed, and the Act which enabled it to be done was the Public Bodies' Leaseholds Act of 1886; and special attention was given to the execution of the mortgage. Powers were given by which the parties could mortgage the land, and the amounts of the lands referred to and anything else for the purpose were indicated. The land consisted of 2,974 acres and 5 perches; it was mortgaged for the purpose of erecting a girls' high school; and these lands were given to the Board for college grounds by the Special Powers and Contracts Act. Upon reading this mortgage, I find there is in it a special provision that the Governors shall have no personal liability, as far as they are concerned, and that they shall have the same powers as were given under the Act to which I have referred. By the power given to the mortgagees they may enter on the premises and account to the College Governors for any deficiency or any profits of which they may be possessed. When they are pressed for money a Bill is introduced, and I find a statement has been made to the effect that this mortgage had received the sanction of the late Government. I say in my place that it never received the sanction of the Government as a Government; but the Minister of Education approved of the mortgage, as any one would have done; and he was only acting within the four corners of the law, as I stated at that time. The mortgage bears on its face the approval of the late Minister of Education—the Hon. Sir Robert Stout—and nothing more; and I say he had every right to approve it, because it did not violate the provisions of the existing law. Sir, this was not a public or a Government Bill. I refused to introduce it; and the Hon. Mr. Reynolds—my colleague—undertook to take it up. I do not agree with the Bill; and I did not agree with the view of my colleagues in regard to the present system of education. I never have agreed to it, and I never will; and I am not going to alter my views in regard to this system in order to satisfy anybody. The present mortgage, as I have said, strictly came within the four corners of the law; but it was found impossible to pass the Bill, and a new one was introduced, with a certain amount of padding which I think was not at all necessary. In the action I took on this occasion I was only doing my duty in trying to prevent what was a violation of the law; and I voted against the Bill. I will not give way to any man in this Council in my desire to assist education; and, while I voted against the Bill, I trust I shall be acquitted of having any interest in taking the action which I have taken.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I think it is right to call the attention of the Council to one feature of this mortgage which my honourable friend has neglected to mention; and, in doing so, I have not the least desire to suggest that my honourable friend has wished to suppress anything whatever. I think it is right—

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—The honourable member is out of order. He will have an opportunity of making any remarks he may have to make later on.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Then I will take the opportunity of making the remarks which I have to make when the time comes.

NATIVE LAND ADMINISTRATION ACT REPEAL BILL.

On the motion for the third reading of this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND said,—I wish to ask the honourable member if he is really going on with the third reading of this Bill. I would point out that the petition which has been referred to this afternoon has gone to the Native Affairs Committee, and it is really necessary that we should know the report of that Committee upon the petition before the Bill is proceeded with further. I think it would be a great injustice to go on with the third reading at once.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND.—I wish to ask my honourable friend the Attorney-General—who is in charge of the Native Land Administration Bill—to grant as much delay in the third reading as may enable me to confer with him to ascertain whether anything can be introduced into the Bill to protect persons interested.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who are they?

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND.—Mr. Owen and the Mokau Coal Company: to protect such persons against any retrospective action that may be confirmatory of the certificates referred to in the petition before this House as having been granted by Chief Judge Macdonald, without the authority of law, in favour of one Neville Walker in respect to some land on the Mokau River. I ought to state there is no power under the Act, or anywhere else that I am aware of, for granting a rehearing in this case, and it is one which, upon the face of the document of which I have a copy, absolutely requires a rehearing in the interests of the Court itself.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I would gladly comply with the request of my honourable friend, but the time at our disposal to get this Bill to the other House is so short that I firmly believe that such a step would lose the Bill altogether. I have examined the petition of the persons mentioned. I will confer with the honourable gentleman, and, if there is anything to be protected, I shall be glad that the Government should take the necessary steps with this object in the other House.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I would ask the same in regard to Mr. Owen's petition, which was received to-day. I understand there was a distinct pledge that no legislation should take place this session which would affect any claims of this kind.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—The petitioner withdrew his claim.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I understand that he did so in consequence of the promise I refer to.

Bill read a third time.

LAND BILL.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—In introducing this Bill to the notice of the Council, I think I shall be best consulting the wishes of honourable members if I avoid going into minute details of the Bill, and confine myself to the larger principles and the more important clauses in the measure.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—Possibly, I may be allowed to mention that it has been usual, heretofore, to take the discussion after the Bill has come from the Waste Lands Committee.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I think, Sir, it was quite the other way. The Government have thought that the time has come when every facility should be given, within reasonable limits, and without in any measure tending to an injurious system of land-acquirement, when all unnecessary restrictions should be removed as far as they can be; and that the greatest facilities should be afforded that we can offer for the settlement by people of the lands of the colony. Sir, the Government, in making proposals which they think will tend in this direction, do not propose anything of a revolutionary character as regards the land-systems in force. At the same time, I must say that the proposals they make do more or less make important changes in the direction I have spoken of. Sir, honourable members must have observed that for some considerable time past the land revenue has been gradually diminishing. This fact has become only too apparent, and it has appeared to us advisable that, so far as can be safely done, an effort should be made to restore it to something like reasonable dimensions. There is a passage in the Crown Lands Report, which was laid on the table of the House last session, which appears to me so important that I will read it:—

“The cash sales on freehold tenure have diminished very much of late years, partly, no doubt, from the available Crown lands lying farther back, but in a greater degree from the policy of offering all the best lands on settlement conditions as they become opened out by roads. With the exception of town lands, which are always sold for cash, there is very little opportunity given for acquiring Crown lands on immediate payment.”

Now, Sir, we have found that, if there is one thing which would tend to assist the settlement of the country more than anything else, it is that there should be a choice of tenure. We are aware that for a considerable time past there has been a great amount of difficulty in people acquiring land on precisely the tenure they would prefer; and these are not land-speculators, but those whom we should all desire to see occupy the lands of the country. Any one who has any experience in England becomes aware at once of the demand there is there for a plain answer to a very plain question. Wherever you go in England you meet the parents of young men who are anxious to enter into the occupation of land in this colony, and also persons in a humbler condition of life who are extremely anxious to do so; and the first question they ask is, “Can you buy land in New Zealand?” The answer to this question is, “Land can be bought in almost innumerable ways—by deferred payment, perpetual leasehold, or by the system of homestead settlers, or village settlers, or village-homestead settlers;” and, in fact, there is a list of systems which it is quite unnecessary to go through at the present time; but, when they ask you the plain question, whether they can come to the colony and buy land for cash, you are not able to say with certainty whether that is the case or not. Honourable members are as well aware as I am that every one who writes or speaks to the public now lays stress on the importance of obtaining not so much persons of the mere labouring-class, but those who have some capital. The constant cry is that we want people to come to New Zealand who have some capital to begin with. As a general rule, if you go before this class of people and explain that they could get land on any one of these more or less complicated kinds of tenure, they become so bewildered and confused, I may say, with the complication of our land-laws that they practically turn their affections from this colony and go somewhere else. And I am sure that, even in England, some of our old settlers who are there absolutely do not feel themselves in a position to give a plain answer to a very plain question, owing to the complications which attend it. The Government have, in a modest way, thought it to be their duty to establish, as far as they are able, a greater freedom of choice; and therefore they determined, if Parliament will allow them to pass this measure, that it shall not be in the power of any Minister to proclaim blocks available only to one class of settlement, whether it be for deferred payment or perpetual lease, or for cash only, but that the blocks, when open for sale, shall be equally available to all three classes of purchasers; and we venture to think that this will have a tendency to encourage in a by no means unimportant degree the settlement of the land. In making this arrangement we have also thought it advisable to classify the land on a different system from that which now obtains. We have therefore proposed this—and it will be seen from clauses 2 and 9 that the Bill gives larger powers of classification than there are now; and there is also power to lower the upset price at which land shall be offered to the public. The classification will be in two divisions—first-class land and second-class land; and the upset price of first-class land will be £1, and of second-class land 10s. There are several provisions in the 3rd clause relating to particular provincial districts in the colony—that is to say, that, wherever land in such provincial districts is of third-class quality, the upset price would remain at 5s. In Nelson, Marlborough, and Wellington, where there is no third-class land, the same price is also adopted. In lowering the upset price, and in undertaking this new classification, we have of course taken care in the Bill that it shall be competent to raise the price of land that is really good land, so that it shall not be necessarily offered at a less price than it is worth. Wherever land is worth £2, £3, or £4 an acre it would not be offered at a lower price than its supposed or real value. In the Bill precaution has been taken to insert a limit: the limit for these different classes of land will be—for the first class, 640 acres; for the second class, 2,000 acres; and that is the limit provided by the Bill of land which can be acquired by any one person—that is to say, he can take up 640 acres of first-class land and 2,000 acres of second-class land. There is also a provision that those who already hold land will not be able to exceed these limits when the extent of their own land is added to the amount of their application. That is to say, the total holding will be limited in the same manner as it is in the present Act, the provisions of which honourable members are familiar with. We think, notwithstanding some remarks that may be made, and some opinions that may be held, that the proposals, especially the one I have mentioned, do not tend to the acquisition of land for merely speculative objects. We say we believe the limits we have proposed are not of an extravagant character, and are not too strict to be a fair encouragement, and no more than a fair encouragement, to persons desirous of settling upon the lands of the country. On the goldfields we propose to permit the purchase of the freehold of lands which are now held on perpetual lease, under precisely the same safeguards in regard to mining as now exist. It will be remembered that when we inserted a purchasing clause in connection with perpetual leases we excluded the lands in the goldfields. It is felt that the holders of these lands should be permitted to acquire the freeholds if they think fit. It is known, of course, that the holders of agricultural leases can, under certain restrictions, obtain freeholds; and it has been considered by us, and also by the other Chamber of Parliament, that there is no reason why the same power should not be extended to these leaseholders of acquiring freeholds as is given to persons differently situated. We propose also, by the 19th clause, to give relief to the deferred-payment settlers. I would here make a remark that, if that is done, we shall have done as much as we think can at this period be done in the direction of relieving those persons who hold land under deferred payment in the way in which we were invited to do that by the motion of the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse. It will be seen that the rents that have already been credited to the tenant will help him largely to pay his arrears. The payments he has already made will go towards the payment of his arrears, by a system of antedating these payments, and by extension of his time. It thus becomes evident that he will get considerable pecuniary relief for the time being; and we consider that will be sufficient to encourage him to continue, and will, in point of fact, afford him very considerable relief. I might here say that the other class of tenants to whom the motion of my honourable friend refers will be dealt with by a separate measure, which is now before Parliament. We trust that the view of the Council will be that this relief which is now proposed to be given will be as much as can reasonably be expected at the present time. If it should turn out to be insufficient it will be, of course, in the power of Parliament to extend the relief by special Act, or by any other way they may think fit. We do not think it necessary to go further than that in the present Bill. We propose—and this is a very important portion of the Bill, to which I call the attention of honourable gentlemen—we propose that the deferred-payment settlers and the perpetual-lease holders who have complied with the conditions of their tenure as regards improvements shall be permitted to purchase without waiting any longer; and that will, in some degree, relieve these tenants, because they will be able to make arrangements, no doubt, where they are not overburdened by too high prices, by which they can acquire the freeholds, and in some instances relief will come from that source. We see no reason whatever why, when they have completed the improvements specified by law, they should be kept waiting any longer for their title. We have good reason to believe that this will not only be eminently satisfactory to bonâ fide settlers on the land at present, but will encourage future occupants; and that it, generally, is a reasonable thing to do, and is one which the settlers have a fair right to expect at our hands, and one which there can be no possible danger in giving.

Hon. Mr. Stevens

Then, we propose further—and this will be in some degree a measure of relief—that the perpetual-lease holder may be converted, if he pleases, into a deferred-payment settler. At present a deferred-payment settler may be converted into a perpetual-lease holder, and we see no reason why the systems should not be, as it were, interchangeable. The next proposal I have to call attention to is the increase of small grazing-runs. The limit of small grazing-runs at the present time is 5,000 acres, and that limit it is proposed in the Bill to increase to 20,000 acres; and the reason for it is this: It has been found from practical experience that 5,000 acres of this land is insufficient for a person to get a living from. Therefore it seems to us reasonable and expedient that there should be a change made in this direction. We are quite unable to see that any possible harm can arise from it; and, indeed, I may say many persons are of opinion that this system could with very great advantage be extended very much further than it is now in regard to the area of country over which it has been made to apply. Honourable gentlemen are aware that the pastoral deferred-payment settlers are no longer in our land-law, as far as the future is concerned. We can no longer give that kind of tenure; but those who took up land on that system are of course still holding it on that basis. We think that, in cases where they find that they cannot struggle along under it, it is desirable that they should be permitted to change their pastoral deferred-payment tenure—which would, of course, end in a freehold—into that of small grazing-runs. They will, of course, lose their power of purchase; but they will instead gain considerably in the annual charge on the lands; and it is considered—and, in fact, I believe there is no doubt of it—that very considerable relief will accrue to these persons if this provision is extended to their cases. It is proposed to deal with unsurveyed lands in the manner referred to in clause 17. I mention this rather specially because there has been occasionally some misunderstanding on the subject. It is not intended that the applicant to have the land surveyed which is now unsurveyed should in any way have the land surveyed by unqualified persons; but this clause means that the Surveyor-General, or whoever may be a proper officer at the time, may send some person who is qualified for the purpose, but not necessarily an officer of the department, to survey specially for the applicant who requires it to be done; and it is intended that that should apply mainly to bush land. By reference to the clause it will be seen how the process is to be carried out, and how the payment for it is to be made. Then, as to simultaneous applications, the Bill provides that priority in cases of simultaneous application shall be by lot. There is no doubt there is a wide difference of opinion upon that subject. Some people believe that auction is a better system; and others, as shown in the Bill, believe that deciding the matter by lot is the best system. I only mention it in order that honourable members may be aware that the subject has been dealt with. I have now to draw attention to the proposals as to Waste Lands Boards. The view of the Government was that the Waste Lands Boards should be done away with, we believing that they have to a very large extent outlived their usefulness—that the altered conditions of the colony and the altered circumstances in connection with our lands, and one circumstance and another, have rendered it desirable that these Boards should no longer exist. I may say that is not the view of the majority of the other branch of the Legislature; and, although the existing Land Boards have not been maintained in the Bill—in point of fact, they have been extinguished—a new system has been imported into the Bill. It will be found by honourable members in clause 83. It will be seen that we have here a Board of four, in addition to the Commissioner, who is a permanent officer. Three of these four members are to be elected by the Councils of the counties comprised within the land district, and one by the Councils of boroughs in the land district. Of course, as I have said, that is not the view of the Government; and whether that view will be taken by honourable members I cannot undertake to say. But we adhere to our view that it would be better to do away with the Waste Lands Boards. I have no doubt, however, that this new provision will receive its proper share of attention at the hands of honourable gentlemen. There will be a new clause which I propose to introduce into the Bill. It is not of a very important character as far as dealing with land is concerned, but it will have a very good effect in the way of convenience. It is that certain land districts shall be made coterminous with the land-registration districts, and we have come to the conclusion that this will be a measure of great convenience, and that it cannot by any possibility lead to any harm. As I said at the outset of my remarks, I shall not deal with the minor clauses—such clauses, for instance, as that relating to a small case at Clutha, and the case of the Kermadec Islands. I will not occupy the time of the Council on the motion of the second reading in dwelling on these smaller subjects. I will merely recommend to honourable gentlemen this proposal of the Government. It is one which is not made with any idea of undoing the acts of preceding Governments. It is not brought in with any intention whatever of subverting the present systems in the existing law; but we do feel that there must be something more in our land-system than experimentalising. We think, although all these systems may be very excellent, that they should not be carried on to the exclusion of anything that is likely to effect the settlement of our lands to the best possible advantage; and I trust honourable members will have gathered from the remarks I have made that to effect settlement is the sincere desire of the Government. That, in point of fact, is their only desire. And I sincerely trust I shall have the hearty co-operation of this Council in supporting the views of the Government.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I should certainly not like a measure of this importance to go to a division without any discussion. The Bill is one of the most important Bills which could be brought before this Council, and it requires the attention of honourable members more, I believe, than any other Bill which is likely to come before the Council. With the proposals in the Bill I may say I pretty well agree, especially with that one which will be a great temptation to people to make this country their home—that is, giving people the right to make freeholds of their perpetual leases. No matter what systems may be in force, if we once establish as a fact that a man's selection of land is to be his own he will not run away and leave it. Men will then become good settlers and good colonists. I have always felt that it is more important to get these men tied to the soil than to get a high price from them for the land. While I hold that, I think the price of the land should be a fair price. As to this question of letting land by lot or auction, there is no objection to the system of lot provided a valuation is put on the land before the result of the drawing is declared. In my opinion, whether the system of lot fails or whether it is unfair depends upon whether the quality of the land varies. We all know that when a block of land is open there are often several sections in it double or treble the value of the other sections. Therefore, when these lands are open for sale, if a valuation has been put on them, the method of lot is a fair one; but I do not think it should be allowed when one person may get a section worth three or four times the value of the land adjoining at the same price as the adjoining land. I think that people should pay in proportion to the value of the land. Then there is the question of free selection. This question of free selection, especially in a hilly country like Otago, it is very necessary to be careful about, because in free selection of certain land you may take away the whole of the summer country, and leave the winter country, which by itself may be worth nothing. That ought to be carefully guarded against, and I should like to see that matter thought out and guarded against. I hope honourable gentlemen will give their attention to this point when the Bill goes into Committee. The Bill has, I think, carefully provided for the small runs. However, when you come to large runs, like those in Otago, for instance, it often cannot be arranged that you can get sufficient winter and summer country within 5,000 acres. The great merit of this Bill, in my opinion, is that it brings in a little money, as well as the other provisions which it makes. It is all very well to say, Give the people the lands; but these theoretical principles of American writers do not come out well when you come to the practical part of the matter. You should get some money out of the lands at the same time as you keep the settlement in view. While you allow perpetual-lease holders to get houses for themselves, the colony should get some money out of the land. It is absurd that the Colony of New Zealand should not have sufficient return from the land to pay the charges of the land-administration. Why should people have their hundred or four hundred pounds in the bank, and not be able to buy a piece of land from the Government, paying down a certain portion of the money, and devoting their own labour to improving the land? This would keep settlers in the colony. These men who have got four or five hundred pounds in the bank, and have sufficient interest coming in to maintain them without much work—it keeps them about town blocking up the labour-market, because, as long as they can get a few days' work in the month, added to their interest, they can afford to live without additional labour. If you give these men a piece of land, and take a certain amount of money for use of the colony, and let these persons bestow their labour on their property, it will be an advantage to the colony in various ways. It has been an extraordinary thing to me that we should refuse people's money for land and allow them to go elsewhere. Rather accept their money, and keep them here as settlers. This provision, to my mind, is one of the great recommendations of the Bill. It does not go too far. I think, myself, from the way the Bill is drafted, that there is no fear of large monopolies in land. In fact, just now land is not very saleable. People are not anxious to go and buy big blocks of land now. There is a necessity to get settlers on the land, and to give them every facility to settle, because these people can grow everything they eat, and they can live on very little beyond what the land can produce. With their dairy produce, their fowls, eggs, and a little grain, and so forth, they can make a sufficient amount of money to make fair wages for themselves. At present it does not pay any man to pay labourers, even at a much smaller rate than the ruling rate of wages. It will not pay farmers to pay for labour in some parts of the colony. I know settlers in Southland who have only netted a shilling a bushel from their oats, and therefore it would take one thousand six hundred bushels of oats in order to pay one man's wages. We should encourage smaller settlers to occupy land, and thus become independent.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—I should like also to congratulate the Government and this Council, and, I think, the colony too, upon having this measure brought before us, and upon common-sense prevailing once more in our counsels. We have seen, during the past few years, all the new-fangled theories of Messrs. George and Co. introduced into this colony, and we have heard declamation of a rather violent kind against the alienation of what is called "the people's patrimony." We have heard very high-sounding phrases used; and laws have been introduced for the purpose of stopping the sale of land altogether. I think we have seen it pretty well proved that all these theories have utterly broken down, that we have been endeavouring to legislate against human nature, and that the innate desire of almost every man to have a piece of land of his own is the only true foundation upon which our land-laws must be framed. I cannot help thinking that this Bill will prove of immense benefit to the country. I believe that it will restore to us a very considerable amount of prosperity. I am certain of this: that under the existing land-laws the progress of settlement would have altogether ceased: in fact, it had, you may say, practically ceased. The extent to which settlement has been arrested may be gathered from this consideration: that hardly any land has been sold even by private persons. The only land, practically, offering for sale has been that of private individuals, and during the last two or three years scarcely any of that has been sold. There is no stronger proof that settlement has almost altogether ceased than that very fact. It is a well-known fact that in some parts of the colony land is absolutely unsaleable at any price. That is the position into which we have got at the present moment, and I have no hesitation in saying that our land-laws have been partly the cause of this state of things; and, as if low prices and the general depression and the high taxation were not sufficient to prevent people from taking up land, we have lately had before the people a Bill which, I think, would make it utterly impossible to induce persons to come to this colony. The people were told that a Land Acquisition Bill would be passed in this colony, by which land would be taken by the State from the large proprietors. Now, Sir, it appears to me that this is one of the most extraordinary propositions that ever were proposed, because, setting aside the immorality of the thing, which must be obvious to any reflecting mind, there can be no doubt whatever that the remedy would be worse than the disease in regard to these large holdings. Can it be supposed for a moment that people would be attracted to this colony if they knew that there was a law by which they might eventually be dispossessed of the land which they had purchased? However, I do not wish to enlarge upon this subject; but I think we ought to take notice of it here, because during the last election, I may say, this doctrine has been very largely made use of; and it has been almost held up as a threat ~~in~~ terrorem over the heads of those who take an opposite view. In this country—at any rate, in the South Island—land has been acquired in a legitimate manner. I know estates which in 1868-69 were going a-begging for months and months. There were large tracts of magnificent land which were absolutely going a-begging, and when persons came forward to purchase these lands it was thought doubtful if it would be a profitable purchase at the time. A candidate at the recent elections gravely informed the people that he thought it would be advisable that a measure should be passed by which the Government should cut up all the land where he was living into ten-acre blocks. It does seem to me to be an extraordinary thing that any Government should think it necessary to preach such a doctrine as this, which, as I have said, must lead to disaster to the community. I am not one of those who think that it is at all desirable that land should be held in such large blocks. I think that very large estates are not for the good of the community, and it is better for the country at large that land should be held in moderate areas. What is the fact in regard to the colony now? I believe there is a great deal more money in this colony than people think. There are people who have money on deposit in the banks; but do you ever see them investing in land now? You find in the country an invincible dread of investing in land, and the money lies in the bank doing nothing whatever. And I say that this has been brought about by the land-laws, as well as by the depression from which we are now suffering. With regard to perpetual leasing, I hold that, as a rule, those persons who have had practical experience in the working of land do not advocate that system, because they are aware of the immense injury which would accrue to the State if we were exposed to having the lands exhausted by these leaseholders. People who are not acquainted with the working of land can have no idea of the enormous loss which the State would sustain if it allowed irresponsible people to occupy the soil. In years when the price of wheat is high we might have thousands of thousands of acres of land exhausted by growing several crops of wheat in succession, and if the price fell the people might leave the land; and the loss to the State would be something beyond all calculation. Anybody who has dealt with exhausted land knows that it takes years and years to bring it round again. As a matter of fact, there are scarcely any lands in New Zealand that will stand two successive years' crops of wheat-growing. With regard to the small grazing men, I am glad to see the truth has at last come out. Setting aside all the outcry against the runholders, and so on—and there, again, I do not want to say that the lands should be occupied in very large holdings—it is necessary that they should not be held in limited areas. I do not want to take up the time of the Council in going into this Bill. I really do think that, after all we have heard about these theories and “fads” regarding the acquisition of the land, we may certainly congratulate ourselves that the Government of the colony has brought forward a Bill now which is returning to simple common-sense views. My idea is that no true progress can be made unless the land is held by the owners of the soil, who will devote all their energies and time to its cultivation, and will treat the land in such a manner as not to impoverish or exhaust it.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT.—Though a prolonged discussion on the many details of such a Bill as this may be inadvisable, yet, on the other hand, I agree with the Hon. Mr. McLean that it is not well to let a Bill of this very important nature be introduced unnoticed and without a word of welcome. It is said that good wine needs no bush, and no doubt this was the principle which actuated the honourable gentleman who introduced the Bill. I regard it as an era in our land-legislation. It is evidently the work of an eminently-practical mind, a mind capable of taking a wide and varied view, and that pays no attention to “fads” and theories in connection with the occupation of the land. The question has often been discussed as to the best mode of tenure, and it appears to me that the best is that which best meets the wishes and circumstances of the persons who are to occupy the land. This, to my mind, is one of the attractive features of the Bill. Another is that it will remove a portion, at least, of the vexatious and harassing restrictions in connection with the perpetual-leasing and deferred-payment systems. Our land-laws have had a very demoralising effect on account of the ambiguity and uncertainty of the language in which these restrictions are made. All this offers constant temptation to evasion—a temptation which in many cases is not resisted. Another attractive feature of the Bill is that it provides a good system of electing Land Boards. I believe it is the wish of the country that Land Boards should remain, and that they should not be abolished, as was proposed in the Bill as it was introduced in the other House. I think that the system of election proposed is the best, as it secures responsibility to the public, and, at the same time, also secures the best men to act as members of the Boards. As to electing the members of the Boards directly by the people, that seems to me very inadvisable. The members of these Boards are called upon very often to act judicially, to decide conflicting claims; and direct election by the people would be consequently objectionable. There are many other features in the Bill which seem to me to be of a very admirable character, but I will not say any more.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I do not think it necessary, where there is such a great consensus of opinion in favour of the Bill, to say much on this occasion. There are one or two points which I should like to refer to. In common with others, I think we are acting wisely in taking the steps proposed in this measure. I feel perfectly satisfied we shall never get the same population in the colony by giving them leaseholds as we should by giving them the actual freehold of the land. There used to be only one opinion on that subject, and I think the public mind is coming back to that opinion now. I may say, Sir, that I am not altogether favourably disposed to the limitation clause in this Bill as to the extent to which these cash-purchases may be made. I should be inclined to give it a wider scope—not limit it to 640 acres of first-class land and 2,000 acres of second-class land. I do not think that that limitation should be insisted upon. I may also say that I am in favour of the provisions which enable land in mining districts to be acquired, but I should like to see those provisions made somewhat fuller than they are at present, more particularly in the interests of mining. The 16th clause of the Act provides that all land acquired under that clause shall be subject to the provisions relating to the resumption of land for mining purposes. I should like to see it go a little further, as recent events in a large mining district have led me to this conclusion: that in mining districts riparian rights should not belong to the freeholder. The persons who purchase land in mining districts are acquainted with the risks they run in respect of riparian rights, and I think they ought not to have those rights on acquiring the land. A case occurred in the Hokitika Supreme Court lately in which it was sought to stop the operations of the whole of the miners of Kumara living on the Teremakan, by preventing them from throwing their tailings into the river. And there was a similar case on the Arahura, where the freeholders and leaseholders prayed that the miners should also be stopped. In a mining district one freeholder on any of the rivers which may be discoloured by the mining operations in the district can stop the whole of the mining industry in that district; and, in dealing with the cases to which I have referred, the Chief Justice stated that the Supreme Court was not the place where justice could be done to either of the parties; and he intimated that, while he was obliged to give nominal damages, he held back his hand and refused to grant an injunction until Parliament should place the matter upon a satisfactory footing. The Crown should not, in my opinion, give certain rights to creeks for tailings-sites to enable people to mine, and then permit persons holding land on the rivers these creeks fall into to have the power to bring actions for damage and to stop mining. I should be glad to see some provision put in this clause similar to that which is contained in a Bill which is also before us—the Otago Central Railway Bill—in which it is provided that there shall be no riparian rights in the districts over which the Bill will operate; and I think this provision might very well be put here. I think it is desirable that this should appear in the Land Act, and I trust the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill will have no objection to the introduction of the amendment. In regard to Land Boards, I am sorry to say that I disagree with the honourable member who spoke last as to the desirability of retaining these Boards. I think the time has arrived that the Land Boards are no longer required, and I think it is very much to the interests of the whole population that the administration of the lands should be directly in the hands of the Chief Commissioner and the Minister, who would be directly responsible to Parliament for all their actions. At the present time the Boards simply act to some extent as buffers between the Government and the Parliament, and they are to a certain extent irresponsible bodies. Under the present system the Chief Commissioner is able to shelter himself under the Board, and if the course were adopted that I have suggested we should have the administration carried on in a much more satisfactory way than at present. For a long time I advocated strongly the principle of nominated Boards, and thought that was a good thing; but experience has changed my mind on that subject, and especially when I see that these appointments to the Boards are made for political purposes. I have seen that done, and I think it is time these Boards were knocked on the head. I shall be glad to move in Committee in the direction of striking out the clause relating to the Boards altogether, so as to reinstate a clause which appeared in the original Bill, that the Boards shall be abolished. With this exception I shall give the Bill my hearty support.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—I heartily sympathize with some of the objects of the Bill we are considering just now. This question has been before us for several years back, and I have expressed my views fully in former sessions in relation to the subject. The present Bill reverses a policy which has prevailed for many years back, and, in my opinion, it carries the reaction a little too far. I agree with the proposals contained in the Bill, except with regard to one or two minor details. With reference to the riparian-rights question, there never used to be any such rights laid down. But we have allowed the matter to drift on, and have given rights to different classes. My honourable friend has put the case of miners pretty strongly, and urges the honourable member in charge of the Bill to take this into his consideration when the Bill is passing through Committee. I see no harm in his suggestions, but I trust the honourable member will also take into consideration the other interests which are concerned, and which are even more important than those of the miner. The use of water for domestic and agricultural purposes is of more importance than the use of it for the purposes of mining. Cases have occurred in this colony where districts which had been settled and occupied for years before the mining industries sprang up found that the mining operations affected the course of streams, and spoiled the water, and withdrew it from their use. I remember a serious grievance of this kind, which no doubt the Hon. Mr. Holmes will also remember. It came before the Provincial Council of Otago some years ago, where there was a river on which there were several mills, and the millers complained of the effect of the mining operations. I say we should take a lesson from the legislation of other countries. In old Roman legislation it was laid down that the water was the property of the State, and its use was given by way of lease, revocable at any time that it could be shown that other interests were injured. I trust that the Hon. the Attorney-General will turn his attention to this point, and consider whether it might not be well to lay down some broad principle on which water-rights could hereafter be dealt with. I think we could hardly improve on the wisdom of the old Romans in this matter.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—With regard to the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Bonar, I think the most convenient method would be if, when we are in Committee, he will give me a full explanation of the form he wishes his amendment to take, and then probably I can postpone the clause if I find it requires much consideration. Then, as regards the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Menzies, he has observed that he thought there might be a reaction against the new proposals. He was afraid they might be carried too far. I conceive that that to a great extent is a matter of administration, and I trust that a reasonable amount of wisdom will be found in the manner in which the Crown lands are administered both by the Government and its successors. The opinions expressed in the debate have been altogether of so favourable a character to the measure that I do not think it necessary to occupy the time of the Council longer in reply.

Bill read a second time.

IN COMMITTEE.

Clause 26, subsection (7).—Renewal of education-reserves leases to be subject to approval of the Minister.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES moved, That the subsection be struck out.

WAIRARAPA NORTH COUNTY COUNCIL EMPOWERING BILL.

The Hon. Mr. HART said, as there was no honourable member present in charge of the Bill, he would move the second reading. He was Chairman of the Committee before which this Bill was brought, and he would therefore explain its provisions. Through the Township of Eketahuna a reserve was made for the railway and for the road. The railway had been carried outside the township in another direction. Therefore the land set apart for the railway was not required for that purpose, and, on account of the reserve adjoining the road, it made the road too wide. This Bill had been introduced for the purpose of enabling the County Council to convey the small pieces of land comprising the railway reserve in front of the sections to the section-holders, so as to reduce the road to a reasonable width. The price to be paid to the County Council would be equal to that which the section-holders paid for the land when they obtained it from the Government. The Bill also provided that a receipt or discharge for the purchase-money should be sufficient title to the land. He moved, That the Bill be read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR thought that honourable gentlemen should have full information in regard to this Bill, because the terms and conditions were of a very arbitrary character. Section 3 provided that the sale should only be made to the owners of the freehold land adjoining the road, and provided that the price to be paid for the land should not exceed the price paid per acre by the original grantees from the Crown. He did not know whether this was right or not. It seemed to him that the amount of money to be received for the land would be very small indeed. Then, there was another extraordinary provision in the Bill. Clause 6 provided that the receipt or discharge for the purchase-money should be sufficient title to the land. That appeared to him to be a perfectly novel provision. He did not think he had ever seen such a provision in a Bill before. It appeared to be creating a new species of title. The provision was of such a character that he thought the Council should not be asked to assent to it until further explanation was given.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER would suggest that the discussion on the matter should take place in Committee. There were other things in the Bill which required consideration.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY moved, That the debate be adjourned.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON expressed regret that he was not present when the Bill was called on; but when he left the Council it did not appear possible that this Bill would be reached so soon. The fact was this: that, when this township was laid out, it was laid out with the intention of carrying the railway through the centre of the main street, and therefore the road was made three chains wide. Since the township had been settled the Government had determined to carry the railroad in a different direction, some distance from the township, and this portion of the road was no longer required for the railway. At the same time, it was found that the street of three chains in width was a very great inconvenience. It was impossible for the settlers to make the whole of the width into a road, and to have a portion of waste land on each side would be very inconvenient. The consequence was that it was desired to get rid of this difficulty by making the road of the ordinary width. A chain and a half had been reserved for the road, and it was proposed to sell to the holders of the land on each side of the road those portions of land between their sections and the new road. He might say that the County Council had the full power to do this. The land was vested in them, and they had the power of selling in the manner provided by the Bill. It had been objected that the provision with regard to the price was a rather strange one. This place being a village, it was thought only fair that the persons who took the pieces of land in front of their sections should have them at the same price which they gave the Government for the land when they took it from the Crown some time ago. It would be unfair to compel these persons to buy at a price higher than what they gave for the land originally. With regard to the 6th section, he was told that this was not a very unusual method of conveyance under Act of Parliament, and it gave a perfectly good title. With regard to the 8th section, the figures that were wanting in the Bill were filled in when the Bill was before the Select Committee. The amendment that had been recommended by the Committee would, of course, come up for discussion when the Bill went into Committee. He thought that ought to meet with the satisfaction of members.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY asked if the honourable gentleman could inform the Council how many persons were affected by this measure. Was there more than one person?

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said a great number were affected. The Bill, in fact, affected land of more than a quarter of a mile frontage.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY repeated his question as to the number of persons who were affected.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said the number might be judged from the fact he had just stated. He could not state the exact number.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY asked if the Committee did not take evidence as to that.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said that was not before them. The Bill affected all. The evidence that came before the Committee was, as far as he knew, perfectly clear as to what was intended to be done by the Bill. There were three cases, he thought, in which the occupiers of these sections had only a short term of lease, and they did not care to be forced to take up this land. The 8th clause provided that the Council might withhold from sale any portion of the land fronting the sections in question which might be required as metal reserves.

The Hon. Mr. HART said there was no necessity for doing that by the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said it might not be necessary to insert such a clause as that, but he was advised that it was necessary for the purpose.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY moved the adjournment of the debate. He did so for this reason: that the more the Chairman of the Committee tried to explain the position of the Bill the less the Council understood it. The honourable gentleman had given no information except the explanation of the terms of the Bill. He was surprised that the Hon. the Attorney-General had not given them some observations upon this matter, a matter which, it seemed to him, affected land belonging to the Crown. He was assured by persons from the neighbourhood that the Bill affected one individual only. The provisions of the Bill as brought forward were the most extraordinary that had ever come before Parliament. He thought the consideration of the Bill should be postponed until the Council had the desired information. He did not think any harm would be done to the Bill by adopting that course.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said that, as it had been stated that the local Boards were unanimously agreed upon this matter, it seemed to him a very proper thing that the land should be apportioned in the manner provided. The matter had been made thoroughly public, and the authorities in the district were, as he had said, agreed; and they ought not to hang up the Bill in that Council. He believed it was quite a proper Bill and ought to be passed.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said the remarks that had been made by the Hon. Mr. Buckley left the impression on his mind that the honourable gentleman considered there was something suspicious about the Bill. He had not the slightest idea to what the honourable member alluded, and had no information of anything otherwise than what he had stated to the Council, and if there was anything in the Bill which was objectionable he certainly had no wish for the Bill to pass. He did not think a Bill of this description should be postponed and laid on one side simply on suspicion.

The Hon. Mr. MCLEAN suggested that they should read the Bill a second time, and put the committal down for next day, when they could discuss the thing.

The Council divided on the question, "That the debate be adjourned."

WESTPORT HARBOUR.

Mr. WHYTE brought up the following report of the Select Committee on this subject:—

"Your Committee—having been directed to consider whether the works for the improvement of the Westport Harbour have been hitherto carried on economically and satisfactorily by the Harbour Board, and to report their opinions whether the present mode of carrying on the works should be continued, or any other plan adopted, also whether the endowments of the said Board are being satisfactorily administered—have the honour to report that, after having taken a large amount of evidence, they are of opinion (1) that these works have not hitherto been carried on satisfactorily or economically by the Harbour Board; (2) that the present mode of carrying on the works under the management of a local Board should not be continued; (3) that the Government should resume control of the works under the provisions of section 13 of 'The Westport Harbour Act, 1884;' (4) that the endowments of the Board have not been satisfactorily administered, the conditions of the mining leases having been so far relaxed as to permit the growth of an undesirable monopoly. With reference to the evidence laid before the Committee, it was unanimously resolved that, considering the time at their disposal, that the evidence affects persons who were not before them, and that some of it dealt with questions not material to the order of reference, it is inadvisable that such evidence should be laid on the table or otherwise published."

Mr. O'CONOR.—I understand that the evidence in connection with this report has not been laid on the table by the Committee; and, inasmuch as that evidence has been obtained at great expense to the country, witnesses having been brought up here all the way from Westport for the purpose of being examined, and, moreover, as most of that evidence has been already printed, I think that the House ought to demand that the evidence shall be laid on the table, especially as I think there is an attempt to keep this House in the dark as to the proceedings of the Committee. I have the strongest possible reason for asking that the light of day should be thrown upon this matter, and I do appeal to honourable members not to allow that evidence to be suppressed. It will be remembered that, previously to the commencement of the inquiry, means were taken most unfairly to prejudice members by distributing, in the form of parliamentary papers, in the pigeon-holes, ex parte statements with regard to this matter. Those statements have completely broken down before the Committee. I went to a great deal of trouble myself to furnish the Committee with data in the way of extracts from the minutes of the proceedings of the Board for three years past, and also extracts from the report of the Engineer. Those extracts show that for some time past the Engineer had been guilty of gross incompetence, and that, in consequence of the manner in which he carried on his business, backed up by members of the late Ministry, grievous loss has been inflicted upon the public; and I took upon myself, as the member representing that district, to point this out. But I was fighting against great odds; I was contending with men with enormous influences in that Committee, and I believe that those influences are at work in this House. Therefore I do hope that members will insist upon seeing to the bottom of this affair. Was it worth while for the colony to pay the heavy expense of witnesses coming from a distance, to pay for evidence being reported and printed, and then for the Committee to come down and bring this report, which gives us very little information, and does not place before us the evidence on which the report was based? I want this House to have an opportunity of discussing this question. I also want to call attention to the nature of that evidence. I wish to show the House that false evidence has been taken; and I now call your attention, Sir, under Standing Order No. 219, to the fact that false evidence has been given before that Committee. I called the attention of the Chairman of the Committee to the fact, and I wrote him a letter stating explicitly that the evidence was false, and could be refuted. The honourable gentleman promised me that that letter should be attached to the evidence. I do not know whether it is intended that that letter shall not be published. I have referred to statements which have been circulated with the object of prejudicing members of this House against members of the Harbour Board. Those statements have been disproved by myself; and other statements made to the Committee by Mr. Bell have also been disproved, with the result that he was compelled to withdraw them and apologize. Is that fact to be suppressed? Do I rightly understand the honourable gentleman to say that that is not so?

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—Yes.

Mr. O'CONOR.—Well, let them produce the documents and show that it is not so. I do not know whether it is according to our Standing Orders that a Committee may report in this manner, without producing the evidence. I understood the other day that evidence must be produced when the report was laid on the table. The expense has been already incurred, and, for the most part, the evidence has been printed and published, for I have the greater part of it here in my hand now. It is rather too much for the Committee to expect that they can deliberate upon an important matter of this kind, send a report up to the House at the end of the session, and then refuse to give the evidence. Why, there are many members of that Committee who cannot know what evidence was taken. I attended there daily, and I know that there was only a bare quorum present during the whole of the proceedings.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—No.

Mr. O'CONOR.—Does the honourable gentleman deny that too? Let the minutes be produced. The honourable gentleman was there, I am aware, defending himself and the late Ministry. The honourable gentleman ought not to have been a member of that Committee at all, because both he and the honourable gentleman who sits alongside him (Mr. Larnach) are a great deal to blame for what has taken place, and ought to have been in a position of having to defend themselves before the Committee. I have had to take a "lone hand" in this matter against very powerful men and very powerful influences; and, in order that the public may see what has taken place, the whole of this evidence ought to be printed. I shall therefore move that the report be referred back to the Committee, in order that they may add to it the evidence taken, and bring it down in proper shape to the House. I ask the House to discuss the whole question. It is too big a question to be "slummed over." I am willing to admit that the Committee may have had too little time for their work. It may be that they were compelled to refuse evidence. Certainly they have refused evidence. I was not called upon. It is true I was called upon to give a large amount of extract matter which they have in their possession: still, they never called me up for examination. Then, although Mr. Bell was brought up at great expense, and made several charges, there was no opportunity to answer those charges, as I was not examined. I asked to be examined, but I was not allowed to give evidence. The Committee refused to take evidence from parties who were capable of giving evidence as to the state of things that exists. They preferred to base their report upon mere opinions expressed by interested people. There has, I venture to say, never been, among the many extraordinary things that have been done in this House, anything done by a Committee which more requires the light of day to be thrown upon it than the proceedings of this Committee; and, as the Committee has not furnished to the House the evidence as far as it has gone, I move, That the report be laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I beg to second the motion, and in doing so I must express great surprise that the Committee should have sent down such a report as this. I am not so much interested in this matter as is the honourable member for the Buller; but a portion of the work done by this Board has been done in my district, and I think it is a ridiculous thing that a Committee should have spent so many days, I may say weeks, and should have come down to the House with such a poor and meagre report. After hearing the report read by the Clerk, it still further convinces me that the evidence should be laid on the table. About that I have no doubt. It strikes me forcibly there is a determination on the part of the Committee to choke this inquiry. Now, I know that within the last two or three months the work on the harbour-works at Westport has been progressing most satisfactorily—in fact, much more so than heretofore; and I am convinced that had the evidence produced before the Committee been laid on the table this House would have known that the work was being far better done by the local body than it could be by the Government. The Government, I am informed, have a report of every wrong that has been committed, of every laches that has occurred; and I am informed, further, that since the nominated Board was done away with, and the elected Board established, the work has been done far more satisfactorily, and that the evidence would show that. Then, I cannot understand why certain gentlemen who were ready for examination were not examined. I believe I am right in saying that the gentleman who acted as engineer of the works was not examined; and I believe also that the honourable member for the Buller was not examined. I maintain that those two gentlemen should have been examined on this matter. The honourable member for the Buller, I believe, was Chairman of the Board; and it is a well-known fact that certain differences of opinion existed between the Engineer in charge of the works and that honourable gentleman. I think it is only right, in the interests of both these gentlemen, and more particularly in the interests of the gentleman holding the position of Engineer for the works, that they should be examined and the whole thing brought to light.

Mr. WHYTE.—I think that the House will probably agree with me when I say that it is not desirable to enter into a long discussion upon the merits of this report, whether it be a wise one or an unwise one, because, if it be acted upon, it will necessitate a Bill, and when that Bill comes up the reasons which actuated the Committee in coming to their conclusion will no doubt be laid very fully before the House. The principal reason why we objected—and the Committee did very strongly object—to the evidence being laid on the table of this House or otherwise published was that it reflects on certain private individuals, who have not, owing to the shortness of time at our disposal, had an adequate opportunity of defending themselves; and, moreover, it became quite evident to us that, even if we had had another month at our disposal, it would be quite impossible for us to go into these things satisfactorily, as they involve many technical and professional points, which could not have been gone into satisfactorily by a Committee sitting in Wellington. These were our main reasons; but, further than that, to a very large extent these questions were not material to the points at issue as set forth in the order of reference. The order of reference directed that we were to inquire into these points: first, as to whether the past conduct of these works has been satisfactory; secondly, whether we could make any suggestions regarding the future prosecution of the harbour-works, and also with regard to the management of the endowments. These were the points before us, and we dealt with them. We did not think it necessary that we should go into an elaborate inquiry as to whether the Engineer was right in every particular, or whether the honourable member for the Buller was right in every particular. As I have said, I do not now intend to go into any lengthy defence of our report; but I should just like to read one short letter, which comes from a gentleman who is well known to every member of this House; and I think I should be reflecting upon no one if I said he was the leading man in the Buller District.

Mr. O'CONOR.—Does the honourable member propose to read from the evidence?

Mr. WHYTE.—No; not from the evidence, but from a letter which was laid on the table of the House, and has been open to inspection for the last month; it is dated the 30th April of this year, and, as I have stated, it is written by the leading man in that district.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who is the leading man?

Mr. WHYTE.—The letter is signed "Eugene O'Connor." That is the leading man to whom I refer. He says,—

"I believe the system now in operation to be almost as bad as it could be. I propose briefly to give my reasons, and I hope I may also be allowed to offer some suggestions regarding proposed changes.

"Both Westport and Greymouth are small trading centres, and the principal persons in both places are connected with local trade interests, and are engaged in very keen and constant struggles of trade competition. Appointments upon the Board are eagerly sought for, in most instances, as giving patronage and influence in the expenditure, which is expected to give a status and advantage to members of the Board over those who are not so placed. The persons in either place who have any standing or experience are very few. Consequently it would be difficult, if not impossible, for Government, even if taking the most eligible, to appoint disinterested and competent persons. The want of knowledge and the bias of trade would be sure, again, to lead to error. The loss would fall upon the colony. I could illustrate this by a great many instances which have come to my knowledge during the past two years. But it is not easy for Government to select the most eligible. The appointments are far more likely to be made from the most influential or the most pressing in urging their claim. Then, again, the money is placed in the hands of those Boards without any apparent check or incentive to economy. There is an endowment which they do not administer: they have a net balance of revenue and a guaranteed loan to expend practically without check or control, either by Government or public opinion: not by Government, because neither the auditing of the accounts nor even the perusal of the minutes gives the necessary insight into the details of management, which would show the difference between good and bad; not by the public, because the institution is in the nature of a bureau. The public have no voice in the matter, and take no interest in anything except the expenditure per se.

"Not to dwell too long on this part of the subject, I will now ask you seriously to consider the large expenditure in both places in maintaining separate and heavy establishments, and to put the results against the cost, and then determine whether I am not right in saying that a change should be made. I beg to enclose a copy of the Buller Miner of the 22nd instant, which contains a report of my remarks upon the subject, and to assure you that I am fully in accord with my constituents in the observations and assertions expressed in regard to the Westport Harbour Board.

"I have two plans under which the harbour-works in both places could be conducted with greater economy and efficiency. The first is, by having the work continued under the direct control of Government. In both places the work consists of quarrying stone and depositing it on breakwaters. In doing this in both places a railway and machinery are used, the engineering plan of works having been laid down by Sir J. Cooke. In both places an Engineer of the Public Works Department is located, and also, in connection with the Government railway in both places, an expert in railway management and machinery. Now, I would like to know what more is required to conduct the works. The quarrying and loading should be let by contract, the carrying and unloading under the direction of the Public Works officers without additional expense."

And then he goes on to suggest an alternative, which I will read if desired. These were the reasons, or part of the reasons, which influenced the Committee in coming to the decision set forth in the report; but, as I have said, I think it is much more advisable, if this debate is to come on and be fully gone into, that it should come on when the Bill comes up, as it must come up if the recommendation in the report be carried out. As I have already said, we have not put the evidence upon the table for good and sufficient reasons; and I wish the House to remember that this Committee was absolutely unanimous in the matter; there was not a single difference of opinion during the whole time; there was not a division taken during the whole of these continued sittings; and we unanimously came to the conclusion that it would be exceedingly unfair to certain people if this evidence were made public by any means whatever.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—The simple question the Committee had to decide was, whether the business of the Board could be administered better by the Government than by the local Board. It did not require the eye of a prophet to see, at the outset, that to have a Board of local men interested in the expenditure locally meant that they would carry on this expenditure to the day of judgment; and the interest of the Board is inimical to the interests of the public. The honourable member for the Buller has very graphically set that forth in this letter of the 13th April. Sir, it became quite obvious that the simple issue for us was, whether the affairs of the Board should be administered by the colony—by an independent body—or by the local Board. The honourable member for the Buller wished to introduce a totally different element for consideration—namely, some squabbles between himself and the Engineer and other members of the Board, extending over a very long period. These matters were purely subsidiary and almost totally irrelevant. In the first Board, I believe, the honourable member was almost by himself. There was another member with him, but the majority of the first Board was hostile to the honourable gentleman.

Mr. O'CONOR.—They appointed me Chairman for three years.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—Yes—for reasons; but he almost always stood alone. He had one or two occasionally who agreed with him, but the great body of the Board was decidedly adverse to the honourable gentleman; and he was also, apparently, time after time, arrogating to himself the position of engineer. In fact, he wished to “boss the whole concern”—Engineer, Board, and inhabitants of the district. The honourable member, according to his own judgment, was the mouthpiece of all these; and any member of the Board, or any employé of the Board, would have no peace if he was at variance with the honourable member. Well, Sir, the Board degenerated into this simply; and, the Board being composed of local men—some publicans, storekeepers, and butchers—every man had to patronise these various members of the Board in their businesses, and the result was that a species of the truck system of the very worst kind was being introduced there.

Mr. O'CONOR.—I do not think the honourable gentleman ought to make a statement like that with regard to the evidence, when the evidence is not put on the table. I say distinctly that that was quite contradicted by evidence which the honourable member was not there to hear.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—I have heard more than I wanted to hear, I can assure you; and I venture to say that the whole of the proceedings were thoroughly discreditable,—from almost every point of view. It was a mistake for the Bill of 1884 to place the administration of this loan in the hands of the local body interested in the expenditure of that loan—I say it was a most vicious scheme. Now, what is the result? The honourable member for the Buller and the Engineer had been at loggerheads, apparently, from almost the outset; and if we had to decide between them we should be sitting there until next April listening to all those squabbles between the honourable member and different members of the Board, and between the honourable member and the Engineer. But the Committee came to the conclusion that these questions were purely subsidiary and irrelevant to the main question. The honourable member for Inangahua has referred to some elective Board. There is no such thing. It is a nominee Board. Certain members were recommended by the County Council, and others by the Borough Council; but all these were interested in appointing men, so to speak, of their own “kidney.” They were all interested in promoting the same object, and their names were submitted to the Government by local bodies, if possible, worse than the Board itself.

Mr. O'CONOR.—The honourable gentleman is very grossly misrepresenting men who have given their services to the country.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—The Committee found that the honourable gentleman, after writing an autobiography of himself—

Major ATKINSON.—Is the honourable gentleman not giving us a précis of the evidence?—which may render it necessary to have it all published; and I believe that would be very objectionable, as far as I understand.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—After apparently working day and night, the honourable gentleman gave an autobiography of himself from 1874 to the present day. In this autobiography Mr. O'Conor, of course, figured very conspicuously and very favourably; whereas a large number of persons residing on the West Coast were in some way assailed, and the Engineer was spoken disparagingly of. In fact, everybody was wrong but Mr. O'Conor. But I think the House will agree with me that any witness giving evidence of that character had an immense advantage over men who had no opportunity of defending their characters. I ask, would it have been fair to go on taking that kind of evidence? If we had done so the whole of the men on the West Coast should have been here. We felt, however interesting these questions might be to the parties themselves, that it was not material to the question to be considered by the Committee, and that to place the evidence on the table of the House and have it published would be very damaging to men who had no opportunity of defending their own character. A great deal of the evidence which was put before us, to save time, was written evidence, and the expense was incurred of printing some of it before the Committee came to the conclusion they did come to, that it would be unfair to publish it. When we came to see the nature of the evidence we saw that, if we allowed evidence of that kind to be continued, it would be an interminable inquiry, and that the result, besides the enormous expense, would be that there would be nothing done this session. We therefore determined that the scheme, as administered, was a bad one; and that the sooner the colony, which was responsible for this and further loans, took it out of the control of the local body the better. And, as a large portion of the evidence was totally irrelevant, and cast reflections on persons who had no opportunity of defending themselves, the Committee unanimously came to the conclusion that it was not fair to give a one-sided version of this affair, to the detriment of persons on the West Coast. And I think the House will unanimously come to the same conclusion—except the honourable member for the Buller himself—that what the Committee has done is in the interests of the public and the parties affected, and that this inquiry was not intended, and should not be used, simply to ventilate any grievance which the honourable member may have, and so give him an opportunity—I will not say, to damage, in one sense of the term, but—to injure in a very serious manner persons, I believe, of good character and professional attainments on the West Coast, and some of whom we had not an opportunity of seeing. The strong point of this report is flattering to the honourable member, because it carries out his own idea of taking this matter out of the hands of the local body. The Committee adopted that very course. Since then the ground has been altered, and a professedly-elected Board has come in; but it is simply a nominee Board, which is carrying on the administration of affairs in a way that is certainly not more satisfactory than before. I dare say this House will not go into any personal squabbles, and will come to the conclusion that the course recommended by the Committee is the best one to adopt in the interests of the colony.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would direct attention to Standing Order 195, which is as follows:—

"The evidence taken by any Select Committee of the House, and documents presented to such Committee, and which have not been reported to this House, ought not to be published by any member of such Committee, nor by any other person."

Mr. WHYTE.—I was just going to ask your opinion on that point. The honourable member for the Buller told us he held in his hand a considerable part of the evidence. I wish to say that was given to him by me confidentially, for his own private use, and not to go any further. He was to return it to me, and has not done so.

Mr. O'CONOR.—The honourable gentleman says he handed this document to me for my personal use. I tell the honourable gentleman distinctly that the copy he gave me is now in my valise. I offered it to him next day, and I have not got this from him. As far as concerns the copy he gave me, it is at his disposal as soon as he chooses. I offered it to him once before, and he said he did not require it. This document was given to me in quite a different way.

An Hon. MEMBER.—How did you get it?

Mr. O'CONOR.—That is my business.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I think it is very much to be regretted that the honourable member for Dunedin West has made the speech which he has just made. It was referred to this Committee "to consider whether the works for the improvement of the Westport Harbour have been hitherto carried on economically and satisfactorily by the Harbour Board, and to report their opinion whether the present mode of carrying on the works should be continued, or any other plan adopted; also, whether the endowments of the said Board have been satisfactorily administered." That was a distinct reference to the Board, and the way the Committee reported on this reference was equally distinct. They report,—

"(1) That these works have not hitherto been carried on satisfactorily or economically by the Harbour Board; (2) that the present mode of carrying on the works under the management of a local Board should not be continued; (3) that the Government should resume control of the works under the provisions of section 13 of 'The Westport Harbour Act, 1884'; (4) that the endowments of the Board have not been satisfactorily administered, the conditions of the mining leases having been so far relaxed as to permit the growth of an undesirable monopoly."

And they added to that,—

"With reference to the evidence laid before the Committee, it was unanimously resolved that, considering the time at their disposal, that the evidence affects persons who were not before them, and that some of it dealt with questions not material to the order of reference, it is inadvisable that such evidence should be laid upon the table or otherwise published."

Now, I must say, upon that report, my opinion was that such an amendment as that moved by the honourable member for the Buller should not be passed. But, coming upon that, what have we? We have what I can only characterize as a violent attack made by one member of the Committee on the honourable member for the Buller; and in that attack he makes use of facts which have come before him as a member of that Committee, and which would not have come before him had he not been a member of that Committee—facts which are not before us, which are not included in this report, and therefore on which we can form no just opinion. Now, Sir, it seems to me very much to be regretted that any member of a Committee, when speaking in support of a report brought before this House, should refer to facts of which there is no mention in that report; because the House has no means of judging whether his inferences are correct or not. For that reason, I think that many honourable members may be inclined to vote for the amendment of the honourable member for the Buller; but, on principle, I cannot do so, and for this reason: that I think, as honourable men, we should not permit accusations against private individuals to be printed and appear as records, unless those accused have some means of appearing and clearing themselves from the accusations brought against them. That I take to be one of the leading rules we should be guided by under all circumstances; and I should be very sorry to see any particular circumstances connected with this present debate lead us to depart from that rule, and I shall therefore vote against the amendment. But, as a matter of fair-play between man and man, I think we should allow the honourable member for the Buller an opportunity of replying to the speech of the honourable member for Dunedin West. It is suggested by the Chairman of the Committee that there is a Bill to come before us; but there is no certainty that it will be debated in the House this session. If any member of the Government can assure me that such a Bill will come before the House this session, then I will not move the motion I intend to move. I think the manner in which the subject is brought before us is grossly unfair to the honourable member for the Buller, who has no opportunity of replying to the statements made by the honourable member for Dunedin West, and I therefore beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GUINNESS.—I second the motion, and, in doing so, I suggest that the debate might be brought to a close very speedily by the Committee agreeing to excise those portions of the evidence which they say reflect upon other persons, and to publish the rest of it; because I maintain that it is very desirable and necessary for this House to have before it the minutes of evidence upon the points remitted to the Committee to consider, in order that we may see whether the Committee have gathered sufficient facts to warrant them in coming to the conclusion they have come to.

Mr. DODSON.—The simple issue, notwithstanding that the adjournment of the House has been moved, is, whether it is desirable to publish the minutes of evidence or not; and, as one of the Committee who sat from day to day, and therefore one not open to the charge of non-attendance, I have come to the conclusion, after mature deliberation with the other members of the Committee, that it would be very undesirable indeed, for many reasons, to publish the evidence. I am not going into the nature of the evidence—it is not proper to do so; and perhaps the honourable member for Dunedin West has gone into it further than he intended when he began; but it is necessary to say that the evidence is very voluminous, and that the honourable member for the Buller had ample opportunity of laying his case, which he did in writing, deliberately before the Committee. And that was fully gone into, minutely weighed, and carefully considered. I may say also that I, for one, approached the consideration of this subject with a strong feeling in favour of local management of local works of this kind—I have always been an advocate for local management wherever possible—but I must say that the revelations as to the actions of this Board have a great deal shaken my belief in the use of local Boards. The works do not seem to have been carried on in the manner they ought to have been; but, under all the circumstances, better work has been done by the Board and its Engineer than one could have believed to be possible. With the adverse conditions surrounding the Board, the wonder is that the work has not collapsed altogether. As to the suggestion about excising portions of the evidence, that is utterly impossible. You must excise the whole or none of it, because the evidence put before us in many closely-printed columns was one long string of accusations, and it is impossible to separate these accusations from the rest of the evidence. If the House knew as much about that evidence as the members of the Committee do, I am quite sure that not a single member would for one moment advocate that it should be published. I therefore hope the House will not order the evidence to be produced, but will simply take the report for what it is worth.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think the Committee is to blame for the trouble it has got itself and the House into. From what I can understand, the part of the evidence that it would be objectionable to produce is simply a series of charges formulated by the honourable member for the Buller, the late Chairman of the Board, against other members of the Board and those connected with the management, such as the officers of the Board. Seeing the wording of the order of reference, I think the Committee have taken a very peculiar course in admitting such evidence. I am told that the honourable member for the Buller was allowed the services of a shorthand-writer, to whom he dictated a statement of great length, and that it is this statement that contains—what the Committee say ought not to be laid on the table of the House—the accusations against others that have been referred to. But I think it was the plain duty of the Committee, when they got that statement, to see how much of it was relevant to the order of reference, and themselves expunge all that was not relevant. If that had been done this difficulty would not have arisen at all. The Committee should not have recognised those personal charges as evidence at all, and should have refused to accept it; and if that had been done there could have been no objection to produce the remainder. I blame the Committee for the position that the House is now in, for if they had obeyed the order of reference strictly the difficulty could not have arisen. However, as the order of reference is very definite, and the report of the Committee is very definite, the House is in a position to deal with it. I do not blame the honourable member for the Buller so much as the Committee. He took the position of being the one assailed, and acted on the defensive.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No; he applied for the Committee.

Mr. SEDDON.—He did not apply for the Committee as against others. He applied for it in self-defence—at least, so I was told when the Committee was first formed. It appears, however, that before the Committee the honourable member, instead of confining himself to his own defence, exactly reversed the position, and made a series of accusations against others—accusations which, I think, the Committee wrongly admitted in evidence. The Committee had no power to deal with such charges; they were not within the terms of the order of reference, and the Committee should have expunged all charges of that nature from the evidence. I believe in fair-play, and I do not think, where charges have been made against persons, and where from any cause there is not an opportunity for those persons to meet the charges, that those charges should be allowed to be published, and especially where those charges are made against traders and persons in their professional or official capacity. In such circumstances it would be very unfair if the House should order that the charges which have been made in this case, and to which those charged have had no opportunity of replying, should be disseminated. No doubt the honourable member for the Buller himself will see that it would be unfair, and I hope the House will unanimously refuse to let it be done.

Mr. FISH.—I do not think there can be the least doubt that, from the constitution of the Committee, the report must be a very impartial as well as an able one. I shall certainly not vote for its being referred back. I say, further, that, under ordinary circumstances, the report might be allowed to remain just as it is; but it appears that, as a result of it, legislation is to be initiated this session the effect of which will be to take powers away from a local body. Now, I think this House should always be extremely jealous of any proposal to destroy any local body, except under very extreme circumstances. I think local bodies of all sorts should be held so precious as not to be abolished except for very serious reasons. I think it is quite possible that in this case those reasons may exist; but how are we, as members of this House, to know that we shall be justified in passing an Act to abolish the Board and vest its functions in the Government, unless we have the evidence on which that course is recommended? Except the portions which may be of a personal character, and the publication of which would be injurious to individuals, I think the House should be in possession of all the information on which the Committee came to its conclusion, so that we may know whether it was a proper conclusion or not. The Committee, as sensible men, I have no doubt came to the right conclusion; but, before passing a Bill to do what they recommend, I think every honourable member should be in possession of the same information as the Committee had.

Mr. MACARTHUR.—In moving that the evidence be produced the honourable member for the Buller can have only two motives. Does he desire to show the House that our report is not justified? That report is altogether in accordance with the sentiments expressed by himself in his letter of the 30th April. The reasons he then gave apply quite as forcibly to the new Board as to the old one—they apply equally forcibly to any local Board that could possibly be constituted. He states in that letter that it was impossible to get eligible local men not associated with local interests; and every one's experience in matters of that kind must tell him that that statement is perfectly correct. Although the new Board may be more in harmony with the honourable gentleman's views than the last was, that fact does not justify its being continued in existence. The reasons he applied so forcibly against the other Board apply equally to the present Board, which, on his own statement, cannot carry on the work in a better manner than its predecessor. So, on the honourable gentleman's own showing, our report should be adopted. The honourable gentleman in his letter fully agrees with our finding. What other ground than to show that our report is not justified can the honourable gentleman have for wishing the evidence to be produced? The only other reason he could possibly have would be, that he wished to publish personal matters of no public interest. I do not think the honourable gentleman can wish that the numerous personal matters in the evidence should be made public. I have read the evidence very carefully, and, as has been said by other members of the Committee, it is utterly impossible to strike out the personal matters. They are so inextricably interwoven with the rest, both in the replies to questions and in the honourable gentleman's own statement, that it would be impossible to excise them without cutting out the whole of the evidence altogether. It is unfortunate that it should be so; but I maintain that there is sufficient evidence in the honourable gentleman's own letter to justify the Committee's report, and that the experience of every honourable member must be in accord with the statements made in that letter. For the reason I have stated, the production of the evidence has been rendered unnecessary; and I do not think either he or the House would wish the evidence to be produced merely to secure the publication of the personal matters.

Mr. O'CONNOR.—Sir, the House is in a most extraordinary position. On the pretext of defending a person who may be absent—whose name I do not know, and of whose existence I am not aware—it is asked that the evidence before the Committee should not be published. I distinctly say that any reference in the evidence to any person who was not and could not be heard before the Committee I should wish to be excised before that evidence was produced. I am willing that anything and everything of a personal nature should be eliminated before it is laid before this House. But I say that the House has had really a gross misrepresentation of the nature of that evidence from the speech of the honourable member for Dunedin South, who has chosen to misrepresent a statement I gave at the request of the Committee, which consists of neither more nor less than, principally, a number of extracts from the minutes in the books of the Harbour Board in the possession of the Committee, which were placed in my hands, and which were open to any one. Surely there was nothing offensive in those minutes! Then, I also made extracts from the published reports of the Engineer, and there can be nothing offensive about them. My whole statement, occupying about seventy pages, was entirely composed of extracts taken from the minutes of the transactions of the Board and from the reports of the Engineer; and, although it has been spoken of as being an autobiography of myself, I say such a statement is utterly unfounded, and that its only object and all it does is to give this House a clear insight of what took place on the Board. I quite agree that great wrong has been done, and that a great waste of money has taken place; and the first person who found fault with that was the late Minister of Mines and a gentleman in the Upper House, who wrote the first letter complaining of the want of progress of the work. That was followed up by me in endeavouring to stop the illegal action that was being taken—and the evidence shows that—and the unwise expenditure under which a great deal of public money had been wasted at that place. It shows the part that I took in striving to prevent that waste of money, and the part which the Ministry of the day took in not at once putting a stop to, but rather encouraging, the illegal expenditure which was going on. That is the autobiography to which the honourable member for Dunedin West refers, and which he considers it right to describe in the terms which he has used to this House. But I do hope that this evidence will not be allowed to remain secret, because it will show that, although the honourable member accuses me of writing an autobiography, and making slanderous accusations against individuals, I was really only giving extracts from the minutes of a public body and from the reports of the Engineer. I want this question—which has given me a great deal of trouble, and in which I have had to fight against the Government of the day, and against persons who were personally interested in the matter, and amongst them a Minister of the Crown—to be brought to the light of day; but, I say, it is in their interest that it is to be suppressed. As I have said, I agree that things were unsatisfactory; but how are they going to cure them? By handing back these works to the Government, who have already been the cause of everything that has been wrong. They know they were doing wrong, because their attention was called to it by myself; and I will give the House one or two instances of the waste of money which was going on, and which I tried to prevent. In one instance it was proposed to make a railway to a quarry in the neighbourhood, and all the material and plant were imported from England to construct that railway; but the gentleman who reported on the quarry knew nothing about stone, and the result necessarily was loss and sacrifice of material, plant, and everything else. I afterwards discovered that the stone had not been sufficiently prospected, and I did all I could to prevent the waste of money going on; but I was opposed month after month; and at last, when I represented the matter to the Government, and urged that an inquiry should be made to ascertain whether the stone was worth anything, an inquiry was made, and it was found that all the money had been wasted, and that the quarry was not worth working. Another instance I may give is that of a contractor who took a contract to make a railway for some £6,800; and, although it is forbidden by law for a local body to let any contract under £50 without calling for tenders for it, this contract was added to to the extent of over £2,000 for the benefit of the contractor, without tender. That contract was, illegally and through gross partiality, given to this contractor, and he got an additional line to construct in another direction. That was totally contrary to law, for the money appropriated to the Harbour Board was also diverted to make a road for the benefit of this contractor. I called the attention of the Government and of the Audit Department to the matter; but nothing whatever was done, and it is now too late to do anything. The Government pretended to make an inquiry, and they sent the Minister of Mines down there with a shorthand reporter; but what happened then? He went to live among the very people who were interested in keeping up that sort of thing, he made common cause with them, and they kept this wrong-doing going on in spite of everything I could do, and against all my efforts. The statement which I made about this illegal transaction is amongst these suppressed letters; and the first letter to me from the Minister is one asking me to withdraw the statement, and then he pointed out to me that, if there was anything illegal in the transaction, I was responsible, because I continued a member of the Board; and he recommended me to resign the Chairmanship. But I declined to do that, because I did not want the work to fall into his hands and into the hands of his creatures whom he had placed on the Board. That is why I remained on the Board. The thing went on in this way; and then he took himself away and returned to Wellington, and represented that everything was settled to the satisfaction of all parties, myself included; and that statement was circulated through all the papers in the colony, although at the time I was protesting against this illegality and impropriety, as I now protest against the slur which is being cast upon me on account of those proceedings. My constituents at Westport were anxious to have this wrong redressed; and let me tell the House that no Government and no set of people in the colony can be so interested in this work as are the people of Westport. Their future depends on the progress of these works, and they are ready to sacrifice anything so as to secure that progress, and if their advice had been taken none of these things would have occurred. The whole of the coalfields there are monopolized by one or two persons, and the trade of the place is being ruined, and the extension of the harbour is thrown away for the benefit of these people. So strongly did the people of the place feel on the subject that they went to the extent of appointing a vigilance committee to watch the proceedings; and they addressed themselves to the Minister of Mines, who was himself a shareholder, and all they got was an offensive answer; and the matter has been put off and put off, and the line has been blocked up for the benefit of these monopolists, while the people of Westport have to pay £1 5s. or £1 6s. a ton for their coal. Sir, it was my duty to see that such an enormous public estate was not handed over for the benefit of a few private individuals; and, if we are not to do that, we must allow the persons who have an interest in the progress of the work to have a voice in the matter. We have tried everything we could try to get this endowment properly administered, but we have not succeeded; and why? Because the illegal transactions are done from Wellington. I believe that the Minister has made illegal terms with regard to these coal leases. It is required that each company shall turn out a certain quantity of coal; but they arrange between themselves so that the necessary quantity is turned out by one or the other as they can. The whole thing is monopolized by one company, and they do as they like; and all our attempts to prevent this are idle. What is the use of going on with the harbour-works at Westport, if we cannot put a stop to these things? We are opposed in every possible direction. This point was made a test question at the late elections, and every attempt was made to unseat me, and if it was not that I thoroughly represent the views of the people of Westport I should not be here now. I have no personal interest in the matter, and I have no personal grudge against anybody; but, on public grounds, I demand that those documents shall be put into the hands of honourable members; and, if the Committee will not do that, they will compel me to lay them before the country through the pages of Hansard. I have no wish whatever that any word reflecting on an absent person shall be published. I called the attention of the Chairman of the Committee to two instances in which false evidence was given, and that gentleman told me that my letters should go with the evidence; but, if both are to go into limbo, what satisfaction is that to me? There is no doubt that false evidence has been given to the Committee, and there is to be no punishment for that. I say the whole thing requires daylight. I have no personal interest in it; but the public have a very great interest in it, for it is their interest to stop wrong-doing. And let me say that the uncalled-for abuse which I received from the honourable member for Dunedin West shows clearly that he is misstating what appears in my compilation, or else he has not read it, for seventy pages of that statement are nothing more or less than extracts from public prints, from the minutes of the Harbour Board, or from the reports of the Engineer. I want honourable members to understand that, and to see that the honourable member's assertion that it is only an autobiography of myself and a slandering of other persons is utterly unfounded. What I desire is this: that the report and all the evidence shall be before the House in such a position that they can be fairly discussed. I wish honourable members from other parts of the colony to understand this, because as the matter stands now it is a slur upon gentlemen who have taken every possible care and trouble in local administration, and it is a slur upon local administration in all parts of the colony. The Harbour Board of Dunedin and every other local body stand in the same position. They do not pay rates to the Harbour Board in Dunedin, and I am astonished at the ignorance displayed by the honourable member for Dunedin West of matters at his own door.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—We pay dues.

Mr. O'CONOR.—So do we. The whole of our revenue is from this endowment, and the people pay heavy rents for the land, in the hope that it will contribute to the great work on which their hearts are centred. It would be unwise to say that the intelligence of the people there shall not be used to secure a fair and honest expenditure of the money. And they are not to blame for what has taken place; nor is it any reason why the matter should be handed over to the Government. Is any member of the Committee prepared to say that the Government have acted rightly with the endowments which were virtually in their hands? Certainly they have not; and the grossest maladministration has taken place when they have had charge of it. What act of maladministration has the Board been guilty of? On the contrary, they have shown where illegal expenditure has been going on, and that expenditure has been supported by the late Minister of Mines—accepted by him and supported by him. It has been carried out by an engineer who was forced on the Board, for it was not with the free approval of the Board that he was appointed. They wanted a gentleman with local experience, and at a lower salary; but this engineer was forced upon them, with a larger salary. They desired to get the work done more economically; and what has the Board done now? It has reduced the cost of the stone, and increased the output; so that the works are proceeding much better and more economically than they were. They have had to put up with an engineer who is receiving £1,000 a year, who is allowed to act in a similar capacity for the Midland Railway, and who only now and then puts in an appearance at Westport, when it suits him. I recommended the late Minister for Public Works and the Minister of Mines that the Engineer's services should be exclusively confined to the work of the harbour—that was the unanimous wish of the Harbour Board; but they authorised him to take other employment: he is sometimes away for a month at a stretch, and yet his money is paid to him all the same. And when an independent man comes forward to put a stop to that sort of thing he is refused a fair hearing. These are the things which I wish to have investigated. I have been stigmatized by papers which are in the interest of the honourable member who has just spoken as being only influenced by personal motives. Personally, I am nothing in this matter. No person can say what my motives are; but any one can say what my actions are: and what have they been? I have had no motive but the desire to discharge a public duty for the benefit of the public. When I prevailed upon the Government and Parliament to bring forward this Westport Harbour Act, to enable that harbour to be proceeded with, I pledged myself to do my utmost to secure economical results; and I defy any one, going through the whole of the minutes, to find one single instance where my action has been otherwise directed. Since the honourable member has spoken of my "blowing my own trumpet," I will tell the House what I did. I tried on every possible occasion to stop illegal expenditure. Was that done from a personal motive? I spent days and nights working for the interests of the district and the colony in this matter during the whole of the time that I was Chairman; and I may say that I might have been Chairman at this present time were it not that my other responsibilities prevented me from again taking office. I venture to say that everything was worked to the very best advantage, so far as I was concerned; and the evidence that has been given before the Committee will show that this is true. Perhaps that is the reason that some honourable members are anxious that it should not be printed. It shows that what was done wrong by the late Board was done with the consent and connivance of the late Government; so that, so far as that is concerned, newspapers connected with certain honourable members have been barking up the wrong tree, waking the wrong man. The whole of the wrong-doing of the late Board was the wrong-doing of the late Ministry and those whom they supported. I endeavoured to show where the wrong-doing was going on and to stop it; and, forsooth, because we are not miserable cravens, serfs, because we will not bow down to and accept the wrong-doing of those gentlemen, we are to be treated as selfish, grasping people who think of nothing but seeking their own advantage at the expense of the colony. I challenge the honourable gentleman to bring forward a single instance in proof of the accusations made. On the contrary, my whole efforts have been directed to frustrating and preventing these large concessions illegally made to contractors. When my motives are spoken of, why should it not be pointed out that the conduct of persons who are mixed up with these transactions requires consideration? Can it be said that I was actuated by personal motives when, to the best of my judgment, I worked three years, gratuitously too, in the interests of my people and in the interests of the colony, while no personal motives are to be attributed to others who either have had large salaries paid to them or have exercised large influence for their own purposes? Is the honourable member for Dunedin West quite free from personal motives in all his actions in this House? When the question of opening the profession of the law to the public comes before this House does he always act purely in the public interest? If we are to banish all considerations of that kind, then I am afraid we shall get nobody to take part in public affairs. And I want to point out this, in connection with the proposal to hand this harbour trust over to the Government: that there is not a man in Westport whose interests are not bound up with the success of these works. It is not so here in Wellington. Patronage prevails here. No matter what Ministry may be in power, they are certain to have a desire to put into good positions persons with whom they are friendly. The present Government might not exercise that power improperly, but there would be the opportunity. The recommendation of this Committee simply means the abolition of local self-government; and we are to take this step upon a report brought up by a Committee which does not dare to give the evidence upon which it arrived at the conclusions we are asked to accept. I venture to say that that evidence, if produced, would show beyond a doubt that the Government has done the wrong, and not the Board; and yet we are asked, on account of the wrong-doing of the Government, to take this matter out of the hands of the Board and put it into the hands of the Government which has done the wrong. This is a much more important question than some honourable members are inclined to imagine. It is a question on which we are asked to come to a decision that would sap the whole foundations of local government. It simply amounts to this: that we say to a local-governing body, "If you dare to have opinions of your own, you will be abolished;" and that is a proceeding which I do not think the honourable member for Dunedin West will support. I should like to hear him attempt to justify such a proceeding. Can any one say that there has been any special wrong done by the present Board? And I must draw a distinction which the honourable gentleman has failed to draw between the past and the present Board. Now I will refer to a letter which has been read by the honourable member for Waikato. I asked him on several occasions to read the letter which followed it. I will state the circumstances under which that letter was written. By means which I will not characterize, the old Board was appointed, and persons were put upon that Board who should not have been put upon it; but they were appointed owing to influences which I need not refer to further. I saw that appointments of that nature would be fatal. I saw that wrong was being done—that illegal expenditure was going on; and the system was such that I never could know what wrong would be done next. I saw that it should be stopped at any risk, though I did not even then realise how badly the Government were acting; and I wrote that letter, pointing out that one of two things should take place—that either the Ministry of the day should undertake the administration of the works in such a way that there should be no buffer between themselves and responsibility, or that the people of Westport should be allowed to have a substantial voice in the management of the works—which at that time they had not. Why, it was a long time before the Board admitted the public even to their deliberations. They looked upon themselves as responsible only to the Minister. The new Board was constituted under my mediation and on my representation, and the Government practically acknowledged the wrong-doing of the first Board by agreeing that the people of Westport should have a voice in nominating members of the new Board; and they did not replace the honourable gentleman's nominees, but elected men who had sufficient intelligence to speedily change the whole system of action, not only as regarded the conduct of the Engineer, but in the conduct of the works. And I appeal to the evidence brought forward to show how advantageous to the public interest has been the result of their working. The new Board has more than doubled the work done, and reduced the cost of the material by half. If it is possible for those members who are supporting this report to point out a single instance of where wrong-doing has been done by the new Board, then I say, Abolish the Board. But I defy any of these honourable members to point to an instance of the kind. If there had been any wrong-doing on their part we should have had it exposed at Westport at the meetings which have been held there. With regard to the charges against the old Board and the Government, they have been made openly on the public platform in Westport. There is not a single one of the statements made before the Committee which has not been made public, and I do not wish a single thing to be brought before this House except the extracts from the minutes of the proceedings of the Board, the reports of the Engineer, the letters which have appeared in public prints, and such other evidence as shall not affect other persons. I have no personal motive in the matter whatever. My name can be rubbed out of the whole thing. The evidence is not interwoven with anything of that character, because all that I have put before the Committee is in the shape of extracts from public documents, which I could read without the slightest fear of being contradicted. And I say plainly that, if this evidence is not produced here by the Committee, I shall reproduce it in this House, and put the documents upon record in Hansard, if the rules of the House will permit me to do it. I think there is nothing to prevent me, when this Bill comes on, from giving to the House a history of the proceedings of the Westport Harbour Board for the last two years, and also a résumé of every report that the Engineer has made. I shall be compelled to do that as a protest against and as a refutation of the false representations that have been made in this House, both with regard to the works themselves and to the manner in which they have been affected by the wrong-doing of those who now wish to screen themselves at the expense of the people of Westport. It must be plain to every one that, when a great work is being done in a district, every one in that district has a paramount interest in seeing that work progressing—an interest far higher than a mere political interest. It may be—though I do not say that such a thing would be done by the present Premier—that it would be to the interest of the friends of a Government to entirely stop these works. I have some experience of the management of public works, and when the proper occasion comes I will point out instances where a Government has grossly wasted and squandered money which would have done very valuable work if the administration had been in the hands of the people of the district. Is it to be supposed that because we make a man a Minister he thereby becomes immaculate? Is he not more liable to temptation, more liable, owing to the influences to which he is exposed, to occupy a less independent position than he formerly did in the House? Is he likely to have a greater interest in such matters than the people of the district? I deny that the people of Westport have any interest in this matter apart from the public interest. This grievance is with two members of the late Ministry. Reference has been made to a letter of mine. They might have given another letter too. It is said that I applied to the Government for a change of system of election because I had some personal grudge against the Engineer; but I say that I had no desire to interfere with him so long as he honestly did his work, and did it economically. But I did want a change when I saw that that gentleman was backed up by political influence in pursuing a course which my judgment and conscience led me to condemn. I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the House; but I do not know of any more important subject to the constituency I represent, and I could not say less than I have said. If this evidence is put on the table I shall be satisfied. I think I have a right to ask that there shall be laid before the House all the evidence, eliminating personal matters from it, and only including extracts from public prints or records, and public documents, and such evidence as can be easily put in without hurting anybody. That is a request which cannot well be denied, if the Government is to be asked to step in and take over the harbour upon the recommendation of the Committee. If that evidence is produced, I venture to say it will show very good reasons for not blaming the present Board. It will show that the chief wrong-doer is the late Minister of Mines, who went down to Westport on the pretext of making an inquiry; but he desired the Board to take upon themselves the whole of the wrong-doing which the Committee has now condemned, which was done entirely with his sanction, with his support, and against my protest. The honourable gentleman told me I might have resigned my position as Chairman; but he might have been told that he should have resigned his position as Minister, for, as he nominated, he was responsible for the action of his nominees. If any one is to be responsible for the conduct of nominees, surely it is the person who appointed those nominees. But what is proposed here is that the people who succeeded the honourable gentleman's nominees shall be held responsible for the conduct of his nominees, simply because they would not submit to be creatures of his. I challenge the Committee to put the evidence on the table, and, until they do put it on the table, I ask the House not to be led away by statements circulated by Mr. Bell, the Engineer. Now, I state deliberately before this House that I informed the Chairman that false evidence had been given, and that I could substantiate that statement before the Committee; but, beyond an assurance that he would put my letter with the evidence, I got no satisfaction; and now it is proposed to send the evidence and my statement with regard to it to limbo. I say, with regard to Mr. Bell, that he has himself asked for this inquiry; he petitioned for it, and I gave a statement, from his reports and from the minutes of the Board, of the occurrences that took place. He came forward with a long statement, in which several false accusations were made against myself; and I stated, publicly and openly, that those accusations were false. The report of that statement was circulated and put, like a Government paper, in the pigeon-holes of honourable members. It was proved before the Committee that part of that statement was distinctly false, and Mr. Bell withdrew and apologized for it. I ask that that statement of his withdrawal of the personal statement against myself as unfounded should be put in. Is not my reputation of any value, is not my good name of any importance, that this should be suppressed? There is no denying that my feelings are perfectly outraged by the conduct of the Committee. I am surprised that, on any pretext whatever, any gentleman should support it. Let the evidence be sent to a Committee of the House to extract everything that it is desirable should not be published, and then let the rest of the evidence be put before the House. I say that the House should not come to a decision blindfolded. Let me make a remark now with regard to the statement referring to Westport and Grey-mouth, which has been carefully read out. My recommendation, as a member of this House, as one having an interest in both works, is that, in order to carry on the works safely, you require to have a balance of power of management as between the central Government and the local interests, so that one will check the other. Another recommendation that I made, in the Committee and elsewhere, was that the number of members of the Board should be increased, and that the elective principle should be brought in, so that a certain number of the members of the Board should be responsible to the people. My experience leads me to believe that that would be best for both those places, for it would provide a safeguard. I believe that in the multitude of councillors there is safety; and I believe that the people are in the main thoroughly honest, and that if a man conducts himself dishonestly he is sure to meet with reprobation at the hands of the public. I object to the nominee system; and when the nominee system proves to be bad it is on account of bad selection. Surely that is no reason why the public of a district should be condemned, particularly when they have no voice in the matter. I say that the great safety for this

House and this country lies in investing the people of the district with power to help the General Government with the work. But I want the Audit Department also to do their duty, and to stop illegal expenditure on the part of the General Government and their engineers; and then everything will go on safely. Let me explain to this House that the plan for these works did not emanate from any engineer in the colony. The plans and specifications, and everything in connection with them, were prepared by Sir John Coode, and all that was required was a man competent to follow the specifications of the superior engineer. I was very suspicious when I found that a gentleman at £1,000 a year had been forced upon us to do that. But I know why he was forced upon us, I know the influence that was brought to bear to get him appointed, and I know what I have had to contend with whenever I have pointed out any wrong being done. I am prepared to point out to the House that wrong has been done; but I say that in no instance is there any reason to complain of the people of Westport, excepting for this: that they allowed themselves to be led by those gentlemen who were appointed by the Government, and whom the Government insisted upon keeping there. I say that it was wrong to the country that this gentleman should receive £1,000 a year as a subordinate to carry out the plans of another engineer. And there is another matter I would call attention to, and it is that he has been absent, and has received his pay by fraud. I say fraud, for it is so most distinctly; and he could not get paid until he got a certificate signed stating that he has been doing his work all the time. That was signed, and the Audit Office should have been there to stop it. But whose fault was it that it was not? I say it was the fault of the Government, and not of the local Board. Instead of leaving me to fight this battle, to contend against wrong-doing, the Government should have given me assistance and have had the inquiry that I asked for. If the papers were produced they would show what part I took in asking for an inquiry. They should have had an inquiry conducted on oath, and then they would have brought out much more than this Committee has done, because I do not think that one-half has come out. It is not in the interests of the colony to have an extinguisher put on this, or that it should be manipulated to the advantage of certain people. I warn the House that if they want that coalfield administered in the interests of the public they must guard against a monopoly being granted; they must allow the people of Westport, whose sole interests lie in the development of the coalfields, to interfere, and to give advice when things are going wrong—they must not scorn their pointing out things for the advantage and progress of the district. I should not care who takes charge of the works, provided the people are not debarred from having a voice in the matter, and the progress of the work is secured, so that they may reach the ultimate end for which they are being constructed. The honourable gentleman who has sat as Chairman of that Committee knows perfectly well that I undertook a great task, and was going through the papers and documents extending over three years. He knows perfectly well that the shorthand-writer who was referred to was only employed for a short time, and only transcribed from the minute-book certain things, and took down other things necessary to save me the trouble of writing. He knows perfectly well that I have laboriously discharged the duty that I undertook, and that persons outside have been supplied with copies of everything that this House is to be denied now. Numbers of people outside the doors of this House have had an opportunity of contradicting or checking every statement that I made; and he knows they have failed to do it, and that, when I asked that the petitioning person, Mr. Bell, should be called up and examined, they refused to allow it, notwithstanding that he was here days and days in this building, at the expense of the country, looking over these very documents. Sir, the whole thing is, to my mind, a perfect fraud. They dared not go on with the inquiry, and why? Because they were beaten at all points. I had torn aside the veil from the wrong-doing that had been annoying me for a long time, and now they want to prevent that action from taking effect, and perhaps to have a Bill hurried through this House that will effectually stop any further discussion.

Mr. LARNACH.—I do not intend to take up the time of the House very long, but I think it is necessary to put the House right in reference to one or two statements made by the last speaker. He has treated the House to a history full of misstatements; and first of all he has said that I, as Minister of Marine, was responsible for the appointment of the Westport Harbour Board and of the Engineer to the Westport Harbour works. Now, I may state that at the time they were nominated I was not even a member of the Government; but I may further add that, had I been, I should have been very proud of the appointments then made. I certainly should have been glad to take that responsibility. The honourable member has also stated that I went to Westport to make an inquiry. I may tell the House plainly that the Government was being continually worried by the honourable gentleman, both personally and by letter, to send to Westport and to make such an inquiry, and that until then the Government never had interfered, but left the sole control of the matter to the Harbour Board, having every confidence in the Board as constituted. Well, at last the honourable gentleman so tired the Government by his communications, both verbal and in writing, asking that the Minister of Marine should take some steps, that the Government thought it desirable to do so, and I determined to go to Westport and to make an inquiry. I need not tell the House that, not only before I went to Westport, but after I arrived there, he continually threw himself in my way, and was fully primed with his grievances, and tried to prime me with solely his own views. I listened attentively, I may say, on all occasions to what he had to say; but I had made up my mind to take my own course with respect to the inquiry; and the course I thought best was to take the minutes of the whole of the proceedings of the Board from the very commencement, and the whole of the correspondence that bore upon those proceedings, and afterwards to examine the members of the old Board. This I did; and I may say that I did not rely upon my own judgment entirely, but also had the opinion of one of the most able officers we have in the colony—at any rate, the opinion of a gentleman whose position warrants me in saying that. I consulted the Engineer-in-Chief, Mr. Blackett, who accompanied me to Westport, and he was with me during the inquiry. After going through the evidence, and hearing what each member of the Board had to say, I came to the conclusion that, instead of those charges which the honourable member for the Buller—who was then Chairman of the Board—had made against the Engineer and his own colleagues on the Board being true, they were entirely unfounded; and I tried, Sir, to show him so by conversing with him quietly. But he was not contented with the view I had taken, but “opened fire” by correspondence in the direction of challenging my view. His letters I was compelled to reply to, which I did, and I believe the correspondence has been laid before the House. I could come to no other conclusion than that the whole of that honourable gentleman's career since his first connection with the Board has been in opposition to the members of the Board, and that, as Chairman of the Board, he has been nothing less than tyrannical, not only to the Engineer, but to every member of the Board. I found that even a member of the Board who generally voted with the honourable gentleman had no fault to find with the Engineer, or with what he had done. And we were forced to the conclusion that, with the continued interference on the part of the Chairman not only with the Engineer; but with every subordinate officer, it was impossible that the officers could do their duty. In fact, I felt surprised that the Engineer was able to do his work as well as he did, considering the amount of interference he had from the Chairman, and I had the satisfaction of telling the honourable gentleman this to his face. The reply that he gave me was one of his usual kind of replies—it was not straightforward. He has spoken of a vigilance committee at Westport which had been appointed. It is a very singular thing that this vigilance committee was appointed immediately after I had given my opinion in reference to the inquiry I held, and I have not the slightest doubt the honourable gentleman was the chief mover—though in pulling the strings he kept behind the scenes—in connection with this vigilance committee. In fact, he has shown that he belongs to that class of persons known in another part of the world as “moonlighters,” and I had pictured him as amongst the very worst of that class, and felt sorry that such a specimen of the class should be living in Westport. Well, Sir, just to give you an idea of the audacity of the honourable gentleman, I will mention a circumstance that occurred between us recently. Of course the House is aware that he was a supporter, or pretended to be a supporter, of the late Government. I believe he was,—for purposes no doubt best known to himself. He had the audacity one day to come to me, after I had given my opinion in condemnation of his proceedings—I say he had the audacity to come to me in my office in Wellington and state this: He informed me that he was, and had been, a consistent supporter of the Government, and that I was not treating him well in not falling in with his opinions or giving him some support in the matter of his quarrel with Mr. Bell; and he intimated the probable withdrawal of his support from the Government—

Mr. O'CONOR.—The honourable gentleman is making a statement to which I wish to give a flat denial.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. The honourable member has been heard.

Mr. LARNACH.——if I persisted in disagreeing with him; and I immediately told the honourable gentleman that he might repair to—another place. I thought, as a member of the Government, that, if we had to depend on such support as the honourable member had indicated, the sooner I and my colleagues were out of office the better. The honourable gentleman never tried me again on that tack. Well, now he has stated that the members of the late Board were creatures of the Minister of Marine, meaning me. If the matter had been left in my hands I should have reappointed the whole of the members of the old Board; but, as it was dealt with by the Cabinet, other steps were taken. With regard to Mr. Suisted, one of these supposed "creatures," he has just been elected Mayor of Westport; so I presume that is a very good record in his favour from the ratepayers. Mr. Hughes, the late Mayor, has been returned unopposed to the Council; while we find on the other hand that the late Chairman of the Harbour Board, the honourable member for the Buller, has been rejected by a large majority. I think that is a fair indication of the direction in which public opinion is going. I would like to say this before concluding: that, so far as I was able to discover, the honourable gentleman was most enthusiastic in his desire to push on the Westport Harbour works. I admit that, and that he worked hard and with great energy; but his enthusiasm carried him too far: he wished to be not only Chairman but the whole Board itself. He wished also to be engineer, treasurer, clerk, ganger, blacksmith, platelayer, navy—in fact he wished to be every possible thing in connection with the Board; and any one who attempted to foil him in that direction or to stop his impetuosity made the honourable member his enemy for all time; and the honourable gentleman was never satisfied from the time the Engineer would not run exactly and blindfold in the path he chose to mark out for him, and, to speak vernacularly, he has had his knife in the Engineer ever since. The honourable gentleman has told the House that I am largely interested in the Westport coal-fields.

Mr. O'CONOR.—Yes; that is your whole motive.

Mr. LARNACH.—Sir, for once the honourable member has told the truth. I am interested. I can tell the House that, shortly after I came to New Zealand, nearly twenty years ago, I was one of the first of a few enterprising individuals who took up some of those Nelson coal-leases, which at that time I had never seen. I held my share of the leases up to the time I assisted to form these leases into a company with the object of opening up the coalfield, because I thought at the time that I should do good to those interested and to the colony, because I knew the colony had spent a quarter of a million on a railway there. So far as that interest of mine is concerned, I am sorry to say I hold it still. It has never brought me in anything. I hope some day it will; but heretofore it has been nothing but money out of pocket. I have purchased no further interest since. I never acquired any mining interest while I was a Minister of the Crown or any new interest but the interests I held, although I had many opportunities. How long I may be able to hold my present interest I do not know. The honourable gentleman should have said he knew there was a large interest in opposition to the Westport Coal Company, and that only a few miles off, known as the Mokihinui, and some inquisitive people choose to insinuate that the honourable gentleman, the member for the Buller, is working his "level best" and trying all he knows to injure the Westport Coal Company.

Mr. O'CONOR.—To break down the monopoly.

Mr. LARNACH.—He is using all the influence he possesses with the Government to continue the railway on to the Mokihinui field, with a view, if possible, of bettering his own interests and injuring those who have vested interests at Westport. Whilst he holds to and supports one interest he should be candid and honourable, and state both sides of the question fairly. However, he has allowed me to do that for him. As I said before, the Government never interfered in connection with the conduct of the harbour-works until forced by the honourable member. They believed, so far as it tended in the direction of local government, in leaving everything to the members of the Harbour Board; and, in my opinion, things would have gone on well had the honourable member for the Buller never had any connection with it. I think that is the sole cause of the break-down of the whole thing, and I found out, not from one alone, but from the people generally of Westport, that the honourable member was the evil one and the stumbling-block. Did I think that the honourable member would leave Westport to-morrow, and never return to it, I would say to the Government, "Leave the Board as it is;" but, as he is likely to return and remain there for some time, I agree with the report so far as it runs in the direction of taking the work out of the control of the honourable member for the Buller, and not allowing him to put his fingers within reach of the Board's affairs again in any way.

Mr. WITHY.—I am quite conscious that this matter has occupied too much time already; but the honourable member for the Buller has delivered such a strong speech, casting accusations about in all directions, that I feel obliged to say a few words. I think it is material to the issue that I should state that when I commenced to sit on this Committee I knew none of the members of it and none of the disputants. I might also say that throughout my life I have been connected with the carrying-out of practical works; and I therefore know what is necessary in the way of discipline to insure the best results being attained. Now, I would ask the House to consider the peculiar position which the honourable member for the Buller occupies in this House. If this had been a question of some other Board, where no member of the House happened to be a member of that Board, we should have had none of this discussion, in all probability. I would ask the House to remember that the principal disputant in this case is the honourable member for the Buller, and he is the mover of the amendment which the House is asked to accept. I would ask the House further to notice that no member of the Committee supports him in this matter. The Committee was absolutely unanimous. It is quite true the Committee found it utterly impossible to go into the whole of the questions which the voluble member for the Buller would have placed before it. He has tried to represent in the House this afternoon that this evidence is of an exceedingly innocent character; but I would ask the honourable gentleman if that evidence does not purport to set forth his views on the question at issue, and I would point out to the House that the speech which he has just delivered is probably also an indication of his views on the same question; and I would ask, is it desirable that evidence which the House may suppose to be very much on the same lines as the speech—and which goes from minor accusations of favouritism up to charges of perjury and fraud—I would ask, can the House consider it desirable that that should be printed and go forth to the country? I think the speech of the honourable member for the Buller will satisfy this House that the documentary evidence is not such as should go forth. As far as the Committee is concerned, they can have no objection to this evidence being printed. No one, looking into that evidence, would come to a different conclusion from that which was unanimously arrived at by the Committee. But what the Committee had to consider, and what I hope the House will agree with the Committee should be considered, was the interest of people who have not been brought before the Committee to speak for themselves. I think the speech of the honourable member for the Buller has made it quite clear that it is mainly a personal fight, from first to last, between the Engineer and the ex-Chairman of the Board. He has made it quite clear in his speech that such is the case. The Committee saw clearly that that was not in the order of reference, and was not material to the main question at issue—whether the works had been conducted satisfactorily by the Board or not. Now, with regard to copies of the evidence having got outside, the Committee took considerable pains to avoid that coming to pass, and how it has happened I cannot say. The honourable member himself, of course, had a copy of his own evidence, and had copies of the statements which were put in by the Engineer.

Mr. O'CONNOR.—No; they were not given to me.

Mr. WITHY.—The honourable member's speech has shown that the report and recommendation of the Committee are practically in accordance with his own views. He spent a good deal of time in speaking about the coal-reserves and monopoly, and the objectionableness of such a state of things. That will be found in the report, which declares that the management of these reserves has had a tendency to raise up an undesirable monopoly: so there again the Committee is in accordance with the honourable gentleman. Another question he has introduced in order to get votes in the House in his favour is that of local bodies. I suppose we are all radical enough in this country to wish to have local bodies wherever it is possible to have them. He also stated that he wished to have an elective local body.

Mr. O'CONNOR.—Partly.

Mr. WITHY.—What constituency is to be formed as the body from which a Board is to be elected? There is not a constituency of ratepayers of this harbour. It is a question of administering funds guaranteed by the whole colony. I hope the House will entirely refuse to allow this evidence to be placed on the table.

Mr. WHYTE.—I do not wish to say a single word to prolong the debate, nor do I intend to follow the speech of the honourable member for the Buller; but I think it is necessary to explain to the House how it was that this evidence, which we refuse to publish, was allowed to be laid before us at all. It happened in this way: We had the honourable member for the Buller up before us, and during one day he gave us the commencement of what evidently would be a very long statement indeed, and we came to the conclusion that it would be better—I am happy to say that not only was that my idea, but I was supported by every member of the Committee in it—if he were to give all this to one reporter in one of the Committee-rooms, instead of keeping ten of us sitting round the table, perhaps for a fortnight, listening to him. It accordingly resulted in this: He was given the use of the Committee-room, access to all the papers, and the help of a shorthand reporter, and there is no doubt the honourable gentleman worked very hard indeed—morning, noon, and night; but, although I was constantly at him, and asking him to condense his statement, it took him fully a fortnight to bring it up, and the result was a mass of evidence such as has been described by previous speakers. Now, it may quite reasonably be said that the objectionable part of this evidence—that which we now object to have published—should have been eliminated; but, as has been said, that was simply impossible. It is so interwoven with the rest that it would be quite impossible to eliminate it. Moreover, although a great deal of it may not have borne directly on the order of reference, there was a drift all through it which could not be ignored, and that drift was generally in the direction of the report which we have brought up. It is fair to the Committee that I, as Chairman, should state how that happened, and to show that we have been compelled, in justice to certain people, to withhold that evidence. It will therefore be seen that the primary cause of all this hubbub is the action of the honourable member for the Buller himself, and that it is not the fault of the Committee. As this is the last opportunity I shall have of referring to the subject this afternoon, I wish again to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee were absolutely unanimous in everything they did, and the House has therefore got the opinion of ten impartial men, not one of whom is connected with the locality, as against the opinion of the honourable member for the Buller alone. A Bill must come down if the report of the Committee is to have any effect; and when it comes on there will be an opportunity for honourable members to speak on this subject, and therefore I trust we may proceed to some other business now.

Motion for adjournment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment negatived, and motion agreed to.

CHINESE.

Mr. FISHER, in laying on the table a return to the order of the House, on the motion of the honourable member for Kumara, said that it would show that the number of Chinese in the colony had decreased by 462 since 1881, the numbers being 5,004 in 1881, and 4,542 in 1887.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCILLORS.

On the motion, That the House, at its rising, adjourn to next day at eleven a.m.,

Mr. SAMUEL said,—May I be allowed to say a word or two with regard to a question which I have put on the Order Paper? A few days ago I brought a certain matter under the attention of the Government and the House relating to certain Legislative Councillors having lost their seats. Since then I have found, on further inquiry, that two of the gentlemen whom I mentioned as having forfeited their seats in the Legislative Council—namely, the Hon. Mr. Holmes and the Hon. Mr. Menzies—have not so vacated their seats. I had looked carefully through the Journals of the Legislative Council, but was misled owing to the fact that the Journals for the two sessions of 1884 were bound up in one volume; and, on further search, I have discovered that I was mistaken in respect to those two honourable gentlemen, they having had leave for both sessions. I have, however, found out this still more important fact: that the Attorney-General, the Hon. Sir Frederick Whitaker, has also vacated his seat—that is to say, if my contention is right. He seems to have been absent during the two sessions of 1884—namely, one from the 5th June to the 24th June, and the other from the 7th August to the 10th November. He received leave for the session beginning on the 7th August, and for that only, so far as I can ascertain from the Journals. The matter therefore involves some inconvenience, as, no doubt, from his official position, that honourable gentleman will have to make the inquiry, if the Government institute one. As he is one of those who have apparently vacated their seats, the discovery is of considerable importance.

Major ATKINSON.—The matter is now under the consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

On the motion to go into Committee of Supply,

Mr. KERR said,—I think it is a very great pity that the House decided last night to read the Loan Bill a second time, authorising the raising of £2,400,000. I feel satisfied it is against the wish of the country, and it is very wrong to do so when our credit in England is so bad as it is at the present time. I also feel satisfied that, if the Premier were really in earnest in his assertions with regard to economy, he could very well have done without borrowing at all during the current year. His own statement and that of the late Colonial Treasurer have proved satisfactorily to me that there is plenty of money for the next year's work; and, if it were not so, I think that such railways as the North Island Trunk line and the Otago Central Railway could very well be put off for another year. That would do the credit of the colony a great deal of good, and any prudent man would take that course before running the risk of further injuring the credit of the colony in England, where it is already so bad. I am certain that people in England will think we are very imprudent in going on the money-market again for such a large sum. The whole of the constituencies in this colony have protested strongly against more borrowing; but, now that the Government has a strong majority, the Premier is doing exactly what he has done before, and is going to borrow as long as he possibly can. The last time he was in office he borrowed eight millions, and spent it, and left a large deficiency when he retired; and I feel satisfied that all this talk about the retrenchment that is to be carried out will amount to nothing, and we shall have this borrowing system carried on from year to year so long as the honourable gentleman is in office, and so long as he can get a shilling to spend, in order to keep up the majority he has now got. I know that people in my constituency are very strongly opposed to this borrowing, and I am bound to protest against it. The people there are taxed now to as great an extent as they can bear, and they get little or nothing for it; but they have to keep on paying, until at last it will break their backs. I feel satisfied that if the honourable gentleman is in power for the next three years he will spend this £2,400,000, and then, before long, be asking for more. It cannot be doubted that the country, at the late election, said there ought to be no more borrowing. The honourable gentleman's own followers said from one end of the colony to the other that they were going to retrench—they were going to have no further taxes or borrowing; and these loan-proposals are the result! And I protest strongly, as strongly as I can, on behalf of that part of the country I come from, against this borrowing scheme in any shape or form, particularly after having heard the Treasurer and the ex-Treasurer last night agreeing that we could go through this year without borrowing any more money. Our credit in England is really bad at present, and for that reason alone we ought not to go to the London money-market for any more money just now. I will not take up the time any longer. The Premier says I have stopped business more than any other person in the House, and I suppose he will say the same thing again. I protested against the Representation Bill because I felt it my duty to do so—my constituents asked me to do so. The Premier, every time he gets into power, does something to injure that part of the country from which I come, for what reason I cannot tell; but I am bound to protest against this borrowing because of the injury it is doing to the colony, and, having done that, I will take up no more time of the House.

Mr. FULTON.—I have just a word to say to correct the statement of the honourable gentleman who has just sat down. With many of his remarks against excessive borrowing I entirely agree, but I wish to correct him on one point. He said that the Bill before the House proposed to borrow £2,400,000. But I would refer him to the 3rd clause of the Bill, which says that the Treasurer may borrow a sum not exceeding £1,000,000 sterling, as the Governor in Council may determine.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—During the late election there was a general feeling expressed on this question of borrowing, most of the electors having come to realise that what we borrow we are expected to repay, and before we repay we are called upon to pay interest in the meantime. People are beginning to realise that every million we borrow means an annual outpour from this colony of £40,000.

An Hon. MEMBER.—£50,000.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—It may be £50,000. But I was taking it at the lowest sum, though I do not think we should be able to borrow at par at the present time. Now, I cannot help thinking that the present is a most inopportune time to borrow, remembering the position in which the colony stands in the London market. We know that some financial institutions connected with this colony have not been very successful during the past year, and the result is that we are—I do not want to say "fly-blown," but—not in a position to enable us to go on to the London money-market with any advantage. I should have been glad if the Premier had seen his way to curtail the loan to the lowest limit. I should be sorry to see any Government placed in a position which hampered them in connection with their finance; but I do feel that the proposals of the Government are extravagant, and are not required by the exigencies of the colony.

Mr. FULTON.—Cut them down.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—The honourable member's words are very smooth; but, when it comes to the vote, I will not say he always votes contrary to his expressed opinions, but I will say he is not so independent in his voting as he is in his speaking; and I should be satisfied to hear the honourable gentleman speak less independently if he would vote a little more independently. It is this sort of smooth-speaking that has done so much to place the colony in its present position. We have had many apostles of borrowing in this colony, and until we abolish the system of borrowing the country will never make that real advance which we all wish it to make. It should be the aim of every member of this House to curtail borrowing proposals within the narrowest limits. Not until then shall we have real prosperity instead of the fictitious prosperity that has had such disastrous results so far as the financial affairs of this colony are concerned. It seems, after the remarks of the honourable member for Christchurch North, which were almost corroborated by the Premier, that we have enough funds in the colony now, if we judiciously arrange matters, to prevent the necessity of going on the London money-market for eighteen months; and I think we should endeavour to make arrangements to secure that end.

Major ATKINSON.—That is on the supposition that we should raise the North Island Trunk Loan, and that we should have all our securities turned into cash.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—Well, I do not see what is to prevent that from being done. What I rose to say was this: that the electors, from the North Cape to Stewart Island, are extremely anxious that we should adopt a policy radically different from that which has been carried on for the last six or seven years—that we should really adopt a cautious progressive policy instead of the careless and reckless policy which we have been pursuing for many years past. There has been a suggestion, of which I highly approve, that this should not be treated as a party question. I do hope that honourable members will not be led to vote against their convictions from any question of party in this House. I do appeal to honourable members, in the interests of the colony, to see that we do not go on drifting year by year into a worse position than we are even now in. When I was in this House in 1879 practically the very same outcry was raised against borrowing; and what was the result? During the last eight years we have increased our debt considerably; and I believe that, unless we take very decided action, those of us who live to see another eight years will see that the debt has increased just as much as it has done during the last eight years. I do not desire to hamper the Government in their finance, because I recognise that they are in a difficult position; but I do appeal to honourable members to see that we do not borrow more than is sufficient. The taxation of this country is gradually becoming so great that persons who are investing their capital here will have to look out for another field, and we know that any withdrawal of capital will be exceedingly detrimental to the colony. We hear a good deal about the working-classes, but, unless we have men of capital and enterprise introduced into the colony, the position of the working-classes will become very much worse, for capital is as essential to this colony as blood is to the human system. Unless we have men of enterprise, confidence, and capital we shall not see the country progress. I hope that we shall see honourable members who pledged themselves to their constituents to go against borrowing acting up to their professions, instead of putting their consciences into their pockets, when the time for voting comes.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I am in full sympathy with the greater part of what has fallen from the honourable member who has just sat down; but I cannot help saying that I think it scarcely became him, in view of some of his actions and some of his votes in this House recently, to say what he said with regard to the honourable member for the Taieri. I think that honourable member can show a record which compares very favourably in these respects with that of the honourable member for Dunedin West. As to the other part of his speech, I thoroughly agree with the honourable member for Dunedin West that there are amounts on these estimates in connection with railways and other works which ought to be cut down, and I hope that we shall have his valuable assistance in that matter. I regret that the Government have found themselves compelled to put various amounts on the estimates in connection with railways to be extended within the next three years, when these amounts, most of them small ones, cannot but give unsatisfactory results. I do hope that, when the estimates are discussed item by item, a great many of these sums may be struck out. With regard to the North Island Main Trunk line, I was one of the very few who, when the Million Loan was authorised in 1885, protested strongly against this work being undertaken, and I think that the House and the country are now coming round to the same opinion. I hope that all further progress in connection with that work, with the exception of satisfying liabilities, will be stopped.

Mr. MILLS.—Very little has fallen from the honourable member for Dunedin West with which we cannot all agree. There is but one opinion, I think, and that is that we should curtail the borrowing as much as we can, so that at the earliest possible moment we may do away with borrowing altogether. But it is peculiar for the honourable gentleman to stand up and declare against borrowing, seeing that he was until recently a supporter of the borrowing policy of the last Administration. It is easy to say that borrowing should be stopped at once, but it is more difficult when one comes to study it with a feeling of responsibility, in order to decide how it is to be done. I was as averse from borrowing as any one; but I have studied the Statement of the Minister for Public Works, and also the Statement of the Treasurer, and I feel convinced that we cannot possibly carry on without a loan to some extent. We find, Sir, that the colony is committed to a number of works which cannot be altogether stopped in their present condition. We find also that not only is the colony committed to unexpended balances, as shown in the accounts, but also for liabilities in excess of the funds at present at the disposal of the Treasurer; and therefore it will be necessary to borrow for the purpose of balancing the accounts, besides what may be required for the purpose of perfecting works during the next year or two. I and several of my friends have gone very carefully through the estimates, and I am in hope that we shall be able to persuade the Government to reduce the estimates to some extent. I think that, without doing any great harm, without arresting works at a point which would be disastrous to them, we can curtail these estimates by at least £250,000. I merely state this to indicate what course we shall take after the Bill gets into Committee. In Committee it is our intention to challenge several of the items, and to try to reduce the total amount of the votes by £250,000. If that is the case, it will reduce the Loan Bill to £750,000. I think also, Sir, that an effort should be made to stop the progress of the North Island Trunk Railway on the termination of the contracts now in hand. I certainly think—after the statement of the Minister for Public Works that this railway, instead of costing £1,000,000, as originally estimated, is to cost something near £2,500,000—we may take it for granted, from our experience of previous estimates, that it is more likely to be £3,500,000. That being so, we surely ought to pause before going on with the railway. It seems to be very important also that, before any progress is made with the line, all the land through which it will pass should be acquired from the Natives, and also that there should be some further investigation made as to the route of the line, and as to whether the central route or the one by way of Taranaki would be best. Then, before we go any further with it, there should be a thoroughly reliable survey and estimate of its cost. I hope some honourable member will, during the debate, or at the proper time, move in the direction of emphasizing the opinion of this House that the North Island Trunk Railway should not proceed any further till these steps have been taken; and, in the event of that being carried, we shall not need more than one-half of the North Island Trunk Railway Loan; and, with the other reductions I have suggested, that will make our borrowing £1,250,000 instead of £2,000,000, and so a very appreciable saving will be effected.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN.—I think that the speech of the honourable member who has just sat down is the best that has been made on this subject; and it is, to my mind, the only speech that has honestly dealt with the question outside party feeling. We have had a great many honourable gentlemen addressing the House on the second reading of the Bill who told us in very plain language that they were opposed to any further borrowing; but each of those honourable gentlemen concluded with an "if" or a "but," and that "if" or that "but" completely destroyed all that they had expressed in their speech. I was very much pleased to hear that the honourable gentleman who has just sat down was prepared to back up his convictions. I shall be found acting with him, and I say this outside of party motives altogether. Any vote that I give in Committee will be only for giving the Government such funds as are necessary for carrying on the business of the country; and to refuse such funds as are not necessary is, I think, our bounden duty. I would remind this House that it seems a very absurd and unwise thing to hand over the control of our affairs for the next three years; and that is virtually what we are asked to do. If we hand over to the Colonial Treasurer this sum of money to expend we put it to a certain extent beyond our control. The business of the House is to vote supplies for a year, and not to vote supplies for three years, which we are virtually asked to do. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House, but I hope these few words of what I call real common-sense will have some influence.

Mr. WARD.—I am somewhat perplexed at the remarks that have fallen from the honourable member for Port Chalmers, and I should like to know who are the honourable gentlemen he refers to who have gone with him into the estimates in the way he states. I think, too, that it is only right the House should have some idea as to what the savings are that are referred to and which amount to the sum of £250,000. I cannot help thinking that when we get into Committee on this matter some of the items which the honourable gentleman and his friends have selected for reduction will raise very keen, vigorous, and animated debates; and I venture to predict that, if a combination of honourable members have selected certain items for reduction, there will be a further combination to block votes in which the honourable gentlemen are interested; and I hope that by doing this we shall be able to effect a further saving than the £250,000.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

The House went into Committee of Supply.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.

PART I.—Chargeable to the Unexpended Balance of Loans raised prior to the 31st March, 1886.

CLASS IV.—ROADS.

Roads, bridges, and wharves, north of Auckland, £3,870, agreed to.

Main roads, £18,650.

Mr. KERR said it seemed to him very strange that so much money was put down for Auckland and so little for the part of the country he came from. They paid taxes in Nelson District the same as any one else, and were entitled to more consideration than had been shown to them. For instance, £500 was altogether too small a sum to put down for the main road through Pelorus District and Rai Valley.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that, as the financial year would end in three months, £500 was as much as could be spent on that road during this period, and the honourable member for Waima, in whose district the road is, was satisfied with that amount.

Mr. GUINNESS considered, with reference to the Christchurch-Hokitika Road, that the contract system should be substituted for that of day-labour, as the work would be more cheaply done. A great deal more than £500 a year would be saved if the contract system were adopted. If a motion were carried to reduce the item by £100, would the Minister for Public Works accept it as an indication of the opinion of the Committee that the work should be done by contract?

Mr. MITCHELSON said there was no necessity for this course. If on making inquiry he found that the work could be done more cheaply on the contract system, of course the day-labour system would be done away with, as it was his desire and intention to save every possible penny.

Mr. BRUCE moved, That the item, "Hokitika to Christchurch, £6,000," be reduced by £1,000; as, from what the honourable member for Greymouth said, it might be fairly assumed that the work could be done for £1,000 less than the sum on the estimates.

Mr. FISH would point out that, if the Ministry found that less than £6,000 was wanted, it would not be spent; but if the vote were reduced to £5,000, and if that were not found to be enough from any cause, there would be no more to be had. He understood that the Young New Zealand party had met and determined to reduce certain items, depending on the help of the Opposition. He wished to say he would be no party to that, but would support the Government straight out in the details of their policy. The House had supported, the previous evening, the policy of the Government in bulk in this matter, and they should not oppose it in detail. He warned the members for the different districts interested in these votes not to listen to these motions, of which they would probably have a number. He thought the public-works estimates on the whole were very fair, and that the Minister had exercised a wise discretion in framing them, for he had apparently acted very fairly and equally.

Mr. BRUCE said he had consulted with no one and was acting with no party in this motion. The honourable member for Avon had said he had done this very work for £2,000 less. Those who had supported the Government policy in the main as to public works had left themselves free to object to votes in detail.

Mr. MILLS said the honourable member for Dunedin South had, as he often did, found a "mare's nest." The action that had been determined on with regard to reduction was not as to the departmental estimates, but as to the loan votes.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH would remind the House that they were now making large reductions in the means of local bodies, and those bodies would doubly suffer if, in addition, the maintenance of arterial roads were thrown on them. This was really, in his opinion, the only class of votes for roads that the House should continue to pass. In many parts of the colony the local bodies were not strong enough to keep up the main arterial roads, and they would be still less able now that subsidies and other assistance were reduced. In these circumstances, if the maintenance of main arterial roads were thrown on local bodies it would cause enormous difficulty. The House might reduce the votes for miscellaneous roads and works, but of all the items on the estimates this was the one that the House could most legitimately pass.

Mr. BRUCE said he moved the reduction based on the local information supplied by the honourable member for Greymouth and the honourable member for Avon. The country had decided that they should exercise every possible method of economy before additional taxation was placed on the people.

Mr. GUINNESS said he was perfectly satisfied with the assurance of the Minister that he would consider the advisability of doing this work by contract. He himself thought the work could be done for considerably less than was put down for it; and in that he was borne out by the honourable member for Avon, who had been a contractor for the maintenance of the road.

Mr. BUCHANAN said there was £1,500 down for the Oxford-Rotorua Road, which, he understood, was for metalling. Now, traffic on that road had very much decreased, owing to other means of communication, and possibly a considerable sum could be saved by delaying that work. In Wairarapa they had often to delay metalling, and even to go with roads unmetalled. He thought they should save wherever they possibly could.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the honourable member was mistaken when he stated that the traffic upon this road had decreased. The road itself was in a very bad state, and the amount asked for was for sending it as far as the money would go on the worst parts of the road through the bush; and he could assure honourable members that the road was a most useful one, and was used a great deal for tourist-traffic.

Mr. GRIMMOND said the peculiarities of the Hokitika-Christchurch Road should not be forgotten. It ran along the sides of valleys and through river-beds, and there were often large slips to be cleared, and a great deal of new construction required. A contract system would require much supervision and specification, which would be very expensive. A large slip had to be often cleared in a short time, so as not to block the traffic. He hoped the vote would not be reduced, for it was really a colonial work.

Mr. BRUCE said those who complained of want of information had the same information as he had. The honourable member for Avon had put all the information in a few words by saying he had maintained the road for a little over half what was now proposed. This instance showed the difficulty there always was in getting any reduction effected in the estimates.

Mr. BLAKE said it must be remembered there might be a lot of new construction.

Mr. BRUCE said, if, after the information that had been given them in this case, a reduction could not be effected, it would be hopeless to expect to make a reduction in any case.

Dr. HODGKINSON asked what was the use of talking about retrenchment if they were not prepared to make reductions. The fact was, the country simply had not the money to spend. He should like to see this item reduced by £2,000.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN was well acquainted with the whole of this road, and could assure the Committee that, if its maintenance were let to a contractor, the contractor might either make a very good thing out of it or he might be involved in heavy losses. Sometimes there were heavy landslips to be cleared. The circumstances were such, in that respect and others, that it was necessary to put down a large sum to provide for contingencies; and if the money should not be wanted it would not be spent. He thought it was quite right to ask for this amount, for it was possible every pound might be wanted, though it was also possible that much less would be enough if it was a fortunate year. Last winter there was a great landslip, when hundreds of acres of surface slid right across the road, sweeping it into the river-bed. A contractor last year, therefore, would have made a heavy loss; but such a thing might not occur again for years, and so if a contract were let on the basis of last year's expenditure the contractor might make a very good thing of it. The Committee should remember that very often on this road totally new construction was required, and it was quite impossible to say at the beginning of the year within £1,000 how much actual maintenance would cost, from the causes he had stated. There had been £3,000 of liabilities incurred already, through the damage done last winter.

Mr. PEACOCK said that, according to the statement of the honourable member for Egmont, £3,800 would be sufficient, with the liabilities of £1,180, to keep this road in repair, and there would still be left £1,200 for the four months to the end of March, after £1,000 had been taken off. He would vote for the reduction.

Sir J. VOGEL said it was simply waste of time to talk of reducing these estimates, as they had been brought down by the Government after mature consideration. Nine months of the year had already expired, and no reduction of any consequence could be made for the next three months—none, certainly, which would not be covered by the unauthorised expenditure which the Government was entitled to incur. There were a few stupid boys in the House, if he might use the expression, who thought it was their duty to spend the whole of the session in trying to give effect to their personal feelings, irrespective of considerations of public duty. They required a lesson in public duty. When they had an opportunity of reducing the estimates by limiting the amount of the loan, instead of taking advantage of it they said they would vote for the loan and would reduce the estimates. They had, however, greatly mistaken their power, and they would find every day they were in the House that they had a great deal more to learn than to teach. He would recommend those who had voted for the reduction of the loan, and whose views were not carried, to support the Government now in carrying the estimates as they stood, which covered only the necessary expenditure required during the next three months. Any person of experience would tell the young gentlemen to whom he had referred that the way to reduce expenditure was not in the estimates, but in voting on broad principles. If that were desired there would be another opportunity when the Loan Bill came up for further consideration; and this was not the time to attempt it, because there was no opportunity in Committee of Supply to consider the expenditure for the next three years, or even for the next three months, for, of course, these estimates were based on the expenditure which had already been going on. The proposals of the Government included an expenditure for the second half of the year of £96,000 more than had been expended in the first half; but that, no doubt, was intended to meet unforeseen expenses, and would not be expended unless the Government found it absolutely necessary.

Mr. LEVESTAM did not think the fact that the work could be done more cheaply was any reason why the vote should be reduced, because the Government would not spend the money unless it was necessary. He was astonished that the supporters of the Government were not prepared to trust them when those who had opposed them were ready to do so.

Mr. MILLS did not think it worth while to reply to the remarks of the honourable member for Christchurch North with regard to young members. The action which the younger members proposed to take was in reference to the schedule of the Loan Bill, and not with regard to the items of the estimates.

Captain RUSSELL would like to ask the Minister for Public Works why he had ignored the Palmerston-Woodville Road, which was in a similar position to that of this Christchurch-Hokitika Road. It connected two systems of railway, and was in a very dangerous state; and something ought to be done to repair and widen it, for there was a daily-increasing traffic on it.

Mr. BRUCE said, if the remarks of the honourable member for Christchurch North meant anything they meant that these estimates should be passed en bloc. He had the greatest confidence in the Ministry that they would use the money voted in the best way; and, as the Minister for Public Works had given an assurance that the money for the Christchurch-Hokitika Road would be expended in a more judicious manner than it had been in the past, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELSON said there was no analogy between the Palmerston-Woodville Road and Christchurch-Hokitika Road. The former ran through two counties; and the latter ran for a long distance through unpopulated country, and had had to be provided for out of either consolidated revenue or loan for many years past.

Mr. SMITH said the unfortunate part of it was that the longer portion of the Palmerston-Woodville Road ran through the Wairarapa North County, which had no interest in it, and would do nothing for it; so that a heavy toll had to be put on it. It was in a very bad state, and was too narrow; and it was entitled to just as much consideration as any other road on the schedule. There were no rates to keep the road in repair, and it was much more used by travellers from one part of the colony to another than by the people in the immediate vicinity, so that the local authorities had not so much interest in it as they would otherwise have. He was not going to oppose any of the votes, for that was not the time to make reductions, seeing that the Loan Bill had been agreed to.

Mr. SEDDON had voted for the second reading of the Loan Bill because, as he had said at the beginning of the session, while there was so much depression in the colony it was inadvisable to cut down the public expenditure to the extent which many honourable members advocated. Nine months of the year had gone by, and works were in hand which must be completed to a paying point; and it would be doing wrong not to give the supply which the Government asked for. For that reason he should vote against the proposed reductions, reserving the right to vote against all reductions except in the case of new works. As to the particular road under discussion, it was a provincial liability, and it was as much the duty of the colony to keep this road in order as it was to run railways in other parts of the colony. The people on the West Coast had no railways, and they might reasonably expect the Government to maintain a road such as this, which had been and still was used largely for the conveyance of mails from Australia received by way of the West Coast, and for the conveyance of all inland mails between the East and West Coasts. As to the suggestion of the honourable member for Greymouth, all experience showed that it was practically impossible to maintain such roads as these by contract; it was much cheaper to do it by day-labour, and much more satisfactory. The Greymouth County Council, of which the honourable gentleman was a member, had tried maintenance of roads by contract, and had last year given it up.

Sir G. GREY said that ever since he had been in the House he had supported votes for the maintenance of this road; for he believed it was one of the most important roads in the colony—that it was essentially a colonial road, and one which the local bodies would not be able to maintain. The Government ought to be placed in possession of funds sufficient to enable them to keep the road open in case of such misfortunes as landslips.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES had no objection to the vote for this road, which he thought was necessary, but thought there was reason for complaint that the Government had not made more liberal provision for the maintenance of a far more important road than this one—that from Nelson to Greymouth via Reefton and Lyell. It was not only a more important road, but there was more mileage on it.

Sir J. VOGEL said that, as the Government, apparently, were going to have great opposition from the honourable member for Port Chalmers and his friends, he might inform them that they could have, from his side of the House, sufficient weight of numbers to carry the estimates without sacrificing any votes that they deemed necessary to meet expenditure contracted for.

Mr. KERR said that most important roads in his district had only received enough to cover liabilities, and, taking the district as a whole, it was £28 to the bad. He did not know how the estimates had been prepared, but it seemed to him that he had been very badly treated, whether consideration had been given to "party" or not.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that in the preparation of these estimates parties were not considered.

Mr. Bruce's amendment withdrawn.

Mr. WARD believed that the estimates had been made up quite irrespective of party; but he could not help saying that, so far as the Southland District was concerned, there had been apparently a great want of attention to the requirements of the district. For roads in the Southland District comparatively nothing had been placed on the estimates. In Seaward Bush there were a number of deferred-payment settlers who had no means of getting from the locality to the main road, and he hoped that in the supplementary estimates the Minister for Public Works would make provision for affording these settlers the necessary means of communication.

Mr. BEETHAM hoped that in the supplementary estimates the Wellington District would receive some consideration, as there was not one sixpence down in the estimates for main roads, and it was well known that a larger amount of settlement was going on in the Wellington District than in any other district of the colony.

Mr. MARCHANT thought the Minister for Public Works should also make provision in the supplementary estimates for the District of Taranaki.

Mr. TAYLOR would ask the Minister for Public Works to place on the supplementary estimates the sum of £5,000 to assist the Sydenham Borough Council in purchasing a reserve, which was absolutely required for the people there.

Mr. R. THOMPSON said that, although the Auckland members were supporters of the Government, not a shilling was put down for roads north of Auckland. What appeared on the estimates was for liabilities.

Mr. SEDDON said there was a sum of £34,000 for village-settlement in the Auckland District.

Sir J. VOGEL hoped that the Minister for Public Works would not forget the Sumner Railway in his supplementary estimates.

Vote, £18,650, agreed to.

Miscellaneous roads and bridges, £34,500.

Mr. TANNER thought that a little explanation was due from the Minister for Public Works as to the items under this head. The remark that supporters of the Government were better served than the opponents of the Government was altogether refuted by the figures appearing under this head; and the honourable member for Motueka ought to have been the last to complain, as there was £33,000 down for the Nelson District, and only £50 for Hawke's Bay.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable gentleman was putting six provincial districts together.

Mr. TANNER would prefer to have an explanation of the items from the Minister for Public Works.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that the liabilities for works in the Nelson District amounted very nearly to the total sum asked for.

Mr. KERR said if the honourable member for Waipawa examined the items more closely he would see there was nothing whatever for Nelson proper; it was for the West Coast mostly, and other districts next to Nelson.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH said it was generally impossible for the merits of works in particular districts to be understood by honourable members coming from other parts of the colony, and he thought, therefore, the only practical thing for the Committee to do was to intimate that it was inexpedient that the Government of the country should continue to be endowed with this power of corrupting the political feelings of the country by the votes under the heading of "Miscellaneous Roads and Works." With a view to testing the opinion of the Committee in this respect, and at the same time not embarrassing the Government, he would move, That this vote be reduced by £500. That seemed a small sum, but it would be noticed that the liabilities in this item nearly equalled the vote. This vote gave opportunities for a large waste of money throughout the country, and he had himself seen large wooden bridges erected by the Government in districts where it was impossible for the local bodies to maintain them: and they would be still less able now with their reduced means. Now that the colony would so soon have to entirely depend on its own resources, the Government should not be allowed to squander money all over the country under this vote in places where roads and bridges were not required, but where the money was spent merely to conciliate political support. He took it that it was one of the most vital questions that could come before them, this question of putting a stop once for all to this waste of money throughout the country: a very large portion of it was nothing but pure waste. He hoped the Committee would make the reduction he proposed, simply as an intimation to the Government that this class of vote should cease to disfigure and disgrace the estimates.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the liabilities so nearly equalled the vote that a reduction of £500 could not be made. He must again request honourable members to bear in mind that nearly nine months of the present financial year had expired.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH said, in that case he would simply propose to reduce the vote by £1, to test the feeling of the House.

Mr. O'CONOR said there was not a single item on the estimates for the district he represented: indeed, in one case there was a liability of £500, which it was not proposed to meet. He would call attention to the utter insufficiency of the provision made for maintaining the main road between Nelson and the West Coast. The Government were sweeping away the revenue that had accrued to the local bodies under the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act, and they were leaving his district—which was mostly unsettled and uninhabited—without any provision whatever for opening up new land for settlement or mining. In the present state of affairs it was not wise that the Government should spend so much of the public-works money in the neighbourhood of towns, instead of devoting it to the encouragement of gold-mining, and to settling people on the lands. In fact, he would sooner see the system of railway-construction discontinued, and the money devoted to these purposes.

Mr. KERR would like to point out that the honourable member for the Buller ought not to complain, as there was £4,208 for roads in his district.

Mr. O'CONOR said that nearly all that money was for works which were already under contract; and he might very well complain that the Government had not done justice to his district.

Mr. Stuart-Menteath's amendment withdrawn.

Vote, £34,500, agreed to.

Grants in aid, £72,600, agreed to.

Roads to open up land before sale, £60,000, agreed to.

Village special settlements, £23,000, agreed to.

Roads on goldfields, £31,000, agreed to.

CLASS V.

Waterworks on goldfields, £1,200, agreed to.

CLASS III.—RAILWAYS.

New Plymouth-Foxton, £1,200, agreed to.

Wellington-Foxton, £500, agreed to.

Hurunui northwards, £100, agreed to.

Springfield Branch, £900, agreed to.

Lincoln-Little River, £300, agreed to.

CLASS VI.

Purchase of Native lands, £1,000, agreed to.

CLASS VII.

Telegraph extension, £20,100, agreed to.

CLASS VIII.—PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Parliament Buildings, £100.

Dr. NEWMAN wanted to know what this £100 was for.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it was to pay expenses in connection with the proposed erection of a new library, which, however, had not been proceeded with, and it was not intended to proceed with it this year.

Dr. NEWMAN said this was a striking instance of the miserable waste of money which sometimes went on in the colony. The House by a unanimous vote had decided to have a brick library erected. The plans were approved; large holes were dug to find bottom for the foundations; tenders were advertised for and received; and then the vote was allowed to lapse in spite of the will of Parliament. He wished to protest against votes being solemnly passed by the House, and the expenditure being left to the whim of the Minister for the time being. He thought something should be added to the Appropriation Act making it necessary for the Ministry to expend votes, instead of leaving it to them to determine whether they would or would not carry out the will of the House.

Mr. WALKER thought it was rather comical to find the honourable member for Thorndon taking the Parliament Buildings under his wing. If ever a vote was passed in a hurry and without due consideration it was the particular vote to which the honourable member referred. Fortunately there were sometimes appeals from Philip drunk to Philip sober, and, though the vote was passed while the House was in a state of temporary exhilaration, after a period of reflection the House deliberately determined that the vote should not be expended. The majority of the House was exceedingly glad that it was not expended, for it would have been an utter waste of money, and would have meant the breaking-up of all those pleasant associations that honourable members connected with the library as an adjunct to the House. He would be glad to see a proper library erected alongside the corridor fit for the reception of the splendid collection of books which Parliament possessed, but he would be sorry to see sixpence expended after the manner proposed by that Committee of which the honourable member for Thorndon was a prominent member.

Vote, £100, agreed to.

General departmental offices, £19,800.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN asked what would be the additional cost for completing the printing office beyond the amount set down in these estimates.

Mr. MITCHELSON said another £5,000 would be required over and above the amount appropriated last year, making, in all, £18,800 for building and machinery.

Mr. SEDDON would support this vote very heartily if part of it were to be spent in pulling down the partitions in the Government Buildings, so as to allow a better supervision over the persons employed there. No bank or insurance office put its employés into little rabbit-warrens, where each could do as he pleased. The buildings he referred to seemed expressly designed for the purpose to which they had been put. The lack of facilities for supervision enabled some men to do little or no work, while others had to work day and night. There would be a great saving if the suggestion he had thrown out were taken advantage of.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said that, although the vote was for £19,000, the estimates seemed to commit the House to an expenditure of £37,000, and he would like to know where the money was to be spent, because wherever he went the public buildings seemed to be ample for all requirements.

Mr. PERCEVAL said it seemed to him they were about to enter upon an undertaking that would cost £20,000, of which the sum of £3,000 was to be expended during the present year. They should know what the character of this work was.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the building was to provide office accommodation for the Customhouse, Public Works and Survey Departments, and offices for the Official Assignee. The rents now paid for these offices in Auckland amounted to a very great deal more than the interest would come to on the sum required for the construction of the proposed building, besides giving to the citizens of Auckland greater facilities by having the whole of the departmental offices near the wharf, and in the principal business part of the city.

Mr. FISH thought a great deal more information was required about this matter. The sum might have been on the estimates before, but that was no reason why this work should be undertaken in a time of depression. It appeared that this was an instalment of an expenditure of £20,000, and, as they were decreasing salaries and cutting down expenditure in all directions, it appeared to him this work should not be gone on with; and, in saying so, he was not taking a provincial view of the matter, for had the vote for such a purpose been for Otago he would have opposed it under present circumstances. He hoped the House would unite in striking out this item.

Mr. PEACOCK said the House should bear in mind that there was a great want of proper office-accommodation in Auckland, and that tenders had actually been received last year; but, as they were slightly in excess of the amount voted, they were not accepted, and the specifications had been altered so as to come within the scope of the vote.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN thought that this vote was unnecessary and extravagant, and should be struck off. If the buildings had served for six or seven years, this was not a time to commence a large expenditure of that kind. He moved, That the amount, £3,000, be struck out.

Mr. KERR was of opinion that a time of depression was the proper time to have a building constructed, if the building was wanted. As a matter of fact, they were losing money by paying high rentals amounting to a much greater sum than the interest on the proposed expenditure would be.

Mr. T. THOMPSON hoped the vote would not be struck out. The Customs Department at Auckland carried on business in a very unsuitable building, for which a rental of £500 a year was paid. Not only had the money for this purpose been authorised the previous year, but the tender and deposit were actually held over by the Government, because the tender exceeded the amount voted.

Mr. SEDDON hoped that the vote would be passed, and that in the morning the Minister for Public Works would announce that the Government had accepted the tender. The depression was very much felt at Auckland; bricklayers were at work on the gumfields, and some were in the ranks of the "unemployed;" and this work would provide means of employment which would be of advantage to the State. He thought they should do anything they could to relieve the depression, and would remark, as a South Island member, that Auckland was worse off for public buildings than any other part of the colony.

Mr. FISH thought they should get a very substantial building for a rental of £500 per annum, and if the one now rented was not suitable for the Customs Department the Government were paying a great deal too much for it. The argument that in erecting this building they would find work for the "unemployed" was all very well, but it could not fairly be applied unless its application were made general and similar works were carried on in all parts of the colony. Then, the interest on the proposed expenditure for these buildings would amount not to £500 per annum, but to at least £1,000. He should oppose these proposals as unjustifiable in the present state of the colony; and he would vote against the item for the building of a doctor's residence at Seacliff, on the same principle that he now opposed this one.

Mr. MOSS said that it was not a building that was rented for the Customs Department, but simply the upper storey of a bonded store. The building proposed was not merely for the Customs Department, but for other departments.

Mr. SAMUEL considered that it was a piece of gross folly to go on year after year spending large amounts on public buildings in the cities when for want of roads the settlement of the country was being retarded. The representatives of the towns should be above these merely local views, and endeavour to have the country opened up, and to bring about the prosperity of the colony. That would be of much greater benefit than the spending of thousands of pounds upon public buildings.

Sir J. VOGEL said it did seem to him an absurdity to cavil over the cost of a building which was absolutely required for public purposes in the City of Auckland, and it was false economy not to erect a building of sufficient capacity for the near future as well as present requirements.

Mr. KELLY said the present Customhouse was a disgrace to the City of Auckland, and he hoped the honourable member would withdraw his motion to strike out this item.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN did not intend to withdraw his motion, and he would take exactly the same course if the item related to Christchurch or Dunedin. During the elections honourable members declared that they would vote for retrenchment in the expenditure upon public buildings, and he hoped they would not so soon forget their promises.

Mr. MILLS said that, although he shared the disposition of the honourable member for Lincoln to curtail expenditure in this direction as much as possible, still he thought the Committee ought to support the erection of this building in Auckland. In respect of its Customhouse that city compared very unfavourably with other cities in the colony, and he would support the vote.

Mr. MARCHANT contended that money ought only to be borrowed for the purpose of promoting settlement, and it was altogether wrong to spend loan-money in the erection of expensive public buildings.

Mr. GOLDIE maintained that these buildings were really required; and there were numbers of skilled mechanics who wanted work, and if they could not get it they would go out of the colony. It would be a saving to the country to keep these mechanics here for a year or two, until Protection was introduced, when they would have no difficulty in finding employment.

Mr. WARD thought that Auckland should receive fair consideration at the hands of the Committee. Wellington, Christchurch, Oamaru, Timaru, Dunedin, and Invercargill each had had large sums expended on public buildings, and Auckland had not had its share of expenditure in this direction. He would like to hear the views of the Premier on the subject.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE objected to the argument that all this money should be spent for the purpose of finding work for the "unemployed." If these buildings were required for the public service they should be erected, but not otherwise. He thought that £12,000 would erect a building that would answer all purposes, and therefore the vote could be reduced by £5,000.

Mr. FITZHERBERT would like to see this vote pass if the country could afford it; but he did not see how it could do so. Considering all the circumstances, he did not feel inclined to vote away this large sum of money.

Major ATKINSON said that no doubt a very large amount of public money had been wasted in public buildings throughout the country; but every one who knew the requirements of Auckland was perfectly aware that this building was very much needed. He thought they could afford to do whatever was necessary, and they would be wise to erect this building, because it was required in the interests of the public service. The Survey Office and a large number of valuable plans were now in an old tumble-down wooden house, where Parliament used to meet thirty years ago; and, when they bore in mind the large number of taxpayers in Auckland who would be interested and inconvenienced in these new buildings every day, he thought a good case was made out for their erection.

Dr. FITCHETT said as he had no personal knowledge on the subject he should support the vote simply because it had been put on the estimates by the Government. He could not presume to criticize it. It seemed to him the proper attitude for a member who had no knowledge of the subject to rely on the knowledge of the Ministry, who were the responsible persons. It had been said that this vote involved a sheer waste of money; but the Minister had shown that, as compared with the rent that now had to be paid for hired buildings, there would be an actual saving—the interest on the cost would not be so much as the rent now paid. The work would give employment, and it would effect a saving to the country; and these reasons were quite sufficient to justify the Committee in passing the vote.

The House divided on the question, "That the item, 'Departmental buildings, Auckland, £3,000,' be omitted."

Item retained.

Mr. J. McKENZIE moved, That the item be reduced by £1,000. He wanted the Minister to pledge himself that the building should not cost more than £12,000. They could get a building ample for all the requirements in Auckland for that sum.

Mr. FISH said it was last year proposed this building should cost £12,000, and now it was £17,000, which meant £20,000. That was shameful extravagance. The Premier said these were days of retrenchment and we must pinch and pinch; yet he was entirely inconsistent in supporting such extravagance as this. If it had not been for the extravagance of the last Government he (Mr. Fish) was certain that several works for which large sums were now asked would not have been begun. If any building at all was required in Auckland, they could surely get one that would answer all purposes for £6,000 or £7,000. They did not want a lot of waste in ornamentation, of which there had been so much in our public buildings; and, as a practical man having some experience in these matters, he knew that a commodious and substantial building could be got for £7,000 or so. He must make a final protest against this vote.

Mr. SAMUEL hoped the reduction would be carried, and he quite agreed with what the honourable member for Dunedin South had said. This proved the insincerity of the Government in claiming to be desirous of effecting retrenchment. The honourable member for Auckland West had shown plainly the object of the vote—it was to provide work for the Auckland “unemployed.” It was all very well for other honourable members to say “No,” but that had been stated freely and candidly. There had been a great talk about determined retrenchment, but here were votes put on to give members a little popularity in their districts; and by these votes members and the Government were alike showing their insincerity in their retrenchment talk. He hoped the vote would be reduced by £1,000, at any rate, to show that there was some sincerity in the demand for retrenchment, and that they were not all prepared to be slaves to carry at the bidding of the Government votes to enable them to secure political support.

Mr. SEDDON said that if the Stout-Vogel Government had remained in office the honourable members for New Plymouth, Waihemo, and Dunedin South would have been found supporting this vote. The £12,000 had been found not to be sufficient. Tenders had been called for, and had remained for five months in the hands of the Government, as it was found that the building could not be constructed for the Architect's estimate. It was necessary, in regard to all Government buildings, to look a little ahead and erect buildings rather larger than were required for immediate purposes. That was a much better plan than to put up small buildings now, and have to patch and extend them afterwards. He would vote for the item.

Sir J. VOGEL might say that the requirements for each of the departments had been estimated in connection with these buildings. The Architect was of opinion that they could be completed for about £12,000; but on calling for tenders it was found that they would cost £17,000. That was only partly the fault of the Architect, because it turned out that mistaken information had been given as to what the nature of the foundation was. There was a very analogous case as regarded seeking for too much cheapness in the Wellington Post-office. The Government had fixed upon an arbitrary sum for that building, and, when the plans could not be carried out for the sum, the Architect was called upon to reduce the cost. The result was that, through the removal of the party-walls, which was a portion of the reduction, the building was burnt down: and, indeed, it was almost a providence that it was burnt, or a much more serious accident might have occurred, for the building might have collapsed when all the Post Office clerks were engaged in it. It had also turned out that, for cheapness' sake, the upper part of the tower was made of wood; and the result, very probably, would have been that, in a heavy wind, with the elasticity of the wood, and its enormous leverage-power, the tower would have tumbled in, and carried a great portion of the building with it. He did not believe in “tinkering” with these buildings. The design for the Auckland building was an excellent one, and if any reduction were made in the cost which would affect the strength of the building he would object. As for the accommodation, the officers of the department were called upon to say what accommodation they wanted, not for the present time, but for the near future, and the design was made accordingly. It was utterly absurd, for the sake of £4,000 or £5,000, either to throw on the future the necessity of putting up another building, or to put up an unsatisfactory building now. Therefore he could not support the amendment.

Mr. J. McKENZIE said the arguments of the honourable member for Christchurch North showed that the architects employed by the colony were not competent to do their work. The honourable gentleman said that it was a good thing that the Wellington Post-office was burned down, or a worse accident would have happened; and that showed that the architects had not done their work properly.

Sir J. VOGEL would like to explain that he was very much misinformed if it was not the Minister who went through every item of the reductions in that building.

Mr. J. McKENZIE thought, notwithstanding all this, that £12,000 ought to be sufficient to erect the Auckland building, and he would press his motion to a division.

Mr. MARCHANT dissented altogether from the principle that they ought to put up buildings much larger than were required at the present time. What would be thought of a farmer who, when he was poor and struggling, put up a residence suitable to the condition in which he would be in ten or twelve years' time? He would simply be called a madman; and yet that was what they were supposed to do in the case of these public buildings. He would vote for the reduction.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN would like the Committee to understand that, if they did not cut this vote down, there was not the smallest chance of their cutting down any vote on the estimates, as this was a most suitable one to reduce.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the item be reduced by £1,000."

Amendment negatived, and vote, £19,300, agreed to.

Judicial, £10,950.

Mr. O'CONOR said he had previously drawn the attention of successive Governments to the need there was for a Courthouse at Westport, the present building letting in the rain, and in every respect being dilapidated and totally unfit for the purpose for which it was used; it was almost untenable.

Mr. GUINNESS did not know upon what principle the Government acted in these matters. He had applied for a sum for the erection of a Courthouse at Brunnerton, which he considered quite as important a place as Port Chalmers, and he was told that there was no money available, the reason being that there was a Courthouse at Greymouth, which was only eight miles distant, and was connected by rail. Exactly the same reasoning would apply to Port Chalmers, the distance to Dunedin being precisely the same; yet there was a vote for £300 on the estimates for Port Chalmers.

Sir J. VOGEL thought there was here a glorious opportunity for the arch-priest of the Young New Zealand party to show that he was prepared to carry out the principles which he preached. This vote was evidently not required this year, and there was no liability incurred. He believed that there was some engagement with the municipal body that they and the Government should share the expense of putting up a building; but the municipal body was wealthy, and the community had lately come unexpectedly into a large sum of money, and probably would not ask the Government to share the expense; so that the colony might hope to escape this expenditure. But, however that might be, he thought this was a good opportunity for the honourable member for Port Chalmers to show that he could be as great a man as the old Roman father, and show his willingness to sacrifice his district to his principles by moving that this vote be struck out.

Mr. MILLS was sorry he could not accept the invitation of the honourable member for Christchurch North. This item had appeared on the estimates before. Indeed, it was on the estimates the honourable gentleman himself prepared last year, and was the result of an engagement made by the Government with the late Mr. Macandrew. The Municipal Corporation were erecting buildings of an extensive character to provide for their requirements, and also for a Courthouse, Police Department, and sergeant's residence, as well as for a Town-hall and Municipal Chambers. As a matter of course, the arrangement which had been come to would be carried out, and the Government would get the accommodation it required on very reasonable terms.

Mr. FISH said this vote differed very materially from the last. First of all, it did not attempt to exceed the appropriation made by the last Parliament; and, secondly, there was this fact: that the business of the country, so far as the police business was concerned, in Port Chalmers was carried on in an utterly unsuitable building. And it was now proposed to give ample accommodation for several departments at the very small expenditure of £700.

Mr. FITZHERBERT considered the sum an absurd one. In his district, with seven or eight times the population of Port Chalmers, they had a building which had cost £100 and provided ample accommodation for their requirements. He felt sure that £100 would be ample to provide the Courthouse. If the people at Port Chalmers wanted a Town-hall they should provide it at their own cost. It was because this Town-hall was wanted that this sum of £700 was asked for.

Mr. BARRON said the accommodation was required at Port Chalmers, and this arrangement was one that had been come to by the previous Government, and would provide the required accommodation at a small cost. If the item were struck out of the estimates it would be, practically, a breach of faith, as the engagement had been entered into.

Sir J. VOGEL thought the honourable member for Port Chalmers was not doing justice to his constituents. A community that could raise £100,000 without any security really, one might say, could not require the paltry sum of £300 in the way of assistance towards the erection of municipal buildings. It was by small economies of this kind that savings would be effected. He would ask the honourable gentleman in charge of the estimates if any inconvenience would follow if this vote were not passed. He felt certain it would not be required till next year; and, if that were so, why should they have the estimates loaded with unnecessary votes?

Major ATKINSON said the difficulty they were in was that the Government of the honourable member for Christchurch North had committed them to a work which he apparently considered not very necessary; and, to save their credit, the Government were obliged to carry out an arrangement the honourable gentleman had made and did not think very much of now.

Mr. PERCEVAL would come to the rescue of the Government, and, as they had admitted that the vote was unnecessary, would favour its being struck out at once. It seemed to him that, if they were going to carry out retrenchment, one of the easiest forms of retrenchment in the Department of Justice would be to dispense with some of these Resident Magistrates' Courts altogether. Port Chalmers was close to Dunedin, the places were connected by rail, and he thought the Port Chalmers' Resident Magistrate's Court might be abolished. This £300 was a new item, and might very well be struck out. If they were going to reduce at all they had better begin at once. It seemed to him the Committee was not in the humour to reduce at all; but the spirit that was now evinced was quite foreign to that of their election speeches. He did not altogether agree with the remarks that had fallen from the honourable member for Christchurch North with regard to assisting the Government to carry their estimates, and should resist the granting of any sum which he felt was not required by the country. If honourable members adopted that course he thought they would save the colony from a very great deal of extravagant expenditure.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN moved, That the item

Mr. Fitzherbert

"Courthouse, Port Chalmers, £300," be struck out. He should like to know whether the Government had accepted all the votes promised by the late Government; because, if they accepted this one, they should also accept a promise made by the late Government to carry out works of vast importance to a large number of settlers who had suffered from heavy floods. If the Government refused to carry out a promise in one case, they ought also to refuse in the other.

Dr. FITCHETT maintained that this building was required at Port Chalmers, and he hoped the Committee would pass the vote.

Mr. FISH considered it as a matter of absolute fairness that this vote should be passed, although he thought that the business could be done much better at Dunedin.

Mr. MILLS said this building was not only to serve as a Courthouse, but was to contain quarters for the police sergeant and his family, police office, cells, and Customhouse, and, altogether, would give a very large amount of accommodation for the amount of money involved. Port Chalmers was still a large rendezvous for shipping, and the dépôt of the English ships and steamers; and it was well known that where there was considerable shipping there was also a good deal of Court-work.

Mr. ROSS hoped that before the money was expended the Government would make inquiry into the circumstances under which the site of this Courthouse was obtained. Only one member of the late Ministry was acquainted with the facts as to how the Port Chalmers people got that property. Many years ago, when the Otago Harbour Board was constituted, the Provincial Government conveyed to the Board, among other things, a building which stands on this site at Port Chalmers, and the Board had used it as an office ever since. About eighteen months ago the officers of the Board were very much surprised one day to find workmen coming on the premises and boring for foundations—they said, the foundations of a Courthouse. On inquiry it was found that the site had been conveyed in a surreptitious manner to the Port Chalmers Corporation by a Bill called the Port Chalmers Fire-Brigade Site Bill. That Bill had been advertised in only one of the local papers, which at the time had a limited circulation, the fact that the land was to be taken from the Board not being mentioned, and the number of the section being incorrectly shown on the plan submitted to the Government for approval: "406" was the number given, whereas the correct number was "408." He thought the Government should make inquiry into the circumstances.

Mr. MACARTHUR hoped these items would be passed without more discussion. The votes had evidently been prepared with great care, and the Committee should get on with the business.

Mr. FULTON said if the Government intended to continue the Court sittings at Port Chalmers another building was most certainly wanted. The present one would hardly hold a score of people, and when a lot of sailors crowded into it, as they sometimes did, the want of ventilation and room was very much felt. He thought, however, the Court business might be done at Dunedin.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN had no doubt whatever that, though it was said this building would only cost the colony £700, it would really be £1,500 before they had done with it, as it was stated that it was to be used for three purposes, and was, in fact, to be a sort of general public building for Port Chalmers.

Mr. FISH said the building was the joint property of the Corporation and the Government, and there was an arrangement to build in conjunction, for the purposes of both the Government and the Corporation.

Mr. FERGUS said the late Government had entered into negotiations with the Corporation on the matter, and had agreed that the colony should give £700 towards the building. The Public Works Department had objected to the first plans submitted by the Corporation, and fresh plans had now been prepared. The Government would use their portion of the building for a Courthouse, policemen's quarters, and Customhouse. It was quite true the Government had no Courthouse site of their own there—it had been given away. The Court sat there twice a week, he believed, and most of the work was done by the local Justices.

Mr. ROSS asked if, in addition to paying £700 down, the Government would have to make any further payment in the shape of rent.

Mr. FERGUS was not aware that the Government would have to do so. In Lyttelton the Government paid £100 a year rent for these purposes.

Mr. FITZHERBERT said this was really giving a local body £700 of the colony's money to put up a local public building. If it was absolutely necessary to have a new Courthouse there, one quite suitable for the place could be put up for £100, and with policemen's quarters as well for £200. It was quite evident that the money was not being given so much for the erection of a Courthouse as to help the local Corporation to get a public building.

Dr. FITCHETT thought, as a capital cost of £700 represented £35 a year, it was a most economical arrangement to get buildings for Courthouse, Customhouse, and police-station for that sum.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it was absurd to talk about getting a building for those three purposes for £200. Why, a simple shepherd's cottage in a country district cost £100.

Mr. W. P. REEVES asked if it was absolutely certain the Government would not have to pay rent as well.

Mr. MITCHELSON thought the Government certainly should not have to pay rent.

Mr. W. P. REEVES asked the honourable gentleman to give a pledge that no rent would be paid.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the item, 'Courthouse, Port Chalmers, £200,' be omitted."

Sir J. VOGEL called attention to the Mount Cook Prison, Wellington. It seemed to him a terrible thing that a large central prison should be erected in a city like Wellington, and especially on its present site, which was about the finest in New Zealand. Wellington was a fortified city, and, although it was not probable than an enemy's cruiser would enter the harbour, still it was possible, and if she were to bombard the town this prison would be the most conspicuous object, and it would be absolute cruelty to use the building as a prison with a number of people confined in it unless it were fortified, and that at enormous expense. Again, it was against all modern practice to put a large prison in the centre of a city, and they were now universally placed somewhere away in the country. The effect of continuing to use this building as a prison would be to collect a convict population in town, for the families of convicts would naturally come and settle down near the prison, and the result would be most undesirable. He was informed that not a single prisoner had been drafted to the new wing at Lyttelton Gaol during the five or six years it had been in existence; and, if it was desirable to draft prisoners from one prison to another, why should not that prison be used? He would say, give this site to the City of Wellington as an endowment for the University; do anything with it, but do not let it continue to be used as a prison. It might be asked why he had not put a stop to it when in office. He candidly confessed that he had been overruled in the matter, and he felt that it would be a lasting error to continue to use the building as a prison. He would recommend the Minister for Public Works to take only such a vote as would cover existing liabilities.

Mr. LEVESTAM would like an explanation as to the item, "Buildings not specified, £150." The hovel in which the Supreme Court sat in Nelson was in a very bad state, and many applications had been made to have it repaired; and something ought to be done. Was this £150 for repairs all over the colony?

Mr. MITCHELSON said the repairs were done out of consolidated revenue. This sum was required to put up small lock-ups.

Mr. PEARSON moved, That the item, "Wellington (new prison, Mount Cook), £4,000," be reduced by £5. He moved this as an indication that the work should be stopped.

Mr. ALLEN said he would be only too glad if they could strike the whole item out. The late Government authorised the construction of this prison.—(No.)—During the time those honourable gentlemen were in office the work was going on. It had now gone so far that it was impossible to stop the work, or turn the building to any other use.

Mr. LEVESTAM said the previous Government were in exactly the same position as the present Government with reference to this work. This prison was commenced, he believed, in 1880 or 1881.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN asked what had been the total expenditure hitherto on this building.

Major ATKINSON.—£27,000.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN.—That is, including the liabilities here?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; I think so.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said that that meant that somewhere about £50,000 would be spent on this building. He thought it would be a very wise thing if the Government could even now put a stop to any further expenditure on the work. It was a great mistake to have started the building.

Sir J. VOGEL said he had had no part in the commencement of this building. It was going on when the late Government took office. He felt so strongly the injury which would be done to the community by allowing this building to proceed that he thought it would be better to lose the money which had been expended and allow the site to be used for some other purpose, rather than that the work should be continued.

Major ATKINSON said another £2,000 or £3,000 would be required to complete the work, in addition to what was put down in the estimates. He felt as strongly as anybody that it was a great mistake for a prison to be there, and, if possible, he would like to see a stop put to the work. The Government would consider the question during the recess. However, £27,000 had already been spent, and it was questionable whether they would be justified in stopping the building.

Dr. NEWMAN asked what Government began this work.

Major ATKINSON said it was approved in 1880-81. Sir John Hall was then Premier, and he (Major Atkinson) was Treasurer. The work was started in 1882-83.

Sir J. Vogel

Amendment to reduce item by £5 agreed to.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN asked what would be the total cost of the building.

Major ATKINSON said it would be £34,000. He understood that was the cost, if it were let by contract.

Mr. GUINNESS thought the Government should explain the effect of the amendment which had been carried.

Major ATKINSON understood that they would go on with the small sum voted, and next year they would ask the House to consider the matter and say what steps ought to be taken. He did not think it would do to hastily abandon the work without due consideration.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN asked the Government whether they took the decision of the Committee in regard to this item as indicating their desire that the works should cease.

Major ATKINSON said the Committee could not decide that question without having further information before it, and the matter would be brought before Parliament next year.

Vote, £10,950, as reduced by £5, £10,945, agreed to.

Vote, Postal and Telegraph, £3,640.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN moved, That the item, "Marlborough, £100," be struck out.

Item retained.

Vote, Customs, £20.

Mr. MOSS said his opinion was that the real question was not whether these works were necessary or not, but whether they ought not to be on the other estimates, as they had no right to be on the estimates which disposed of borrowed money.

Vote agreed to.

Vote, Lunatic Asylums, £29,000.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON asked what was going to be done in regard to the Wellington Asylum, for which £2,000 was proposed. It would appear that it was intended to put up a building at Porirua; but, in the opinion of the department, subsequently, it was thought better to make a rearrangement of the present building in Wellington, and have a series of detached cottages.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the item was placed on the estimates as it was necessary, but he had come to the conclusion not to spend the money even if it was voted. No contract would be let or engagement entered into until the House had had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject.

Mr. TURNBULL asked if it was intended to remove the asylum at Porirua.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON said he had been going to ask that question himself.

Mr. LEVESTAM inquired whether any provision was to be made at Porirua or elsewhere for the detention of inebriates. At present inebriates were placed in the ordinary lunatic asylums, which was not only contrary to law, but a great hardship upon them. He had seen such persons confined in the Nelson Lunatic Asylum, and they were almost heartbroken at their position. He had brought the matter under the notice of the late Government, and they had admitted that it was illegal and quite wrong, and had promised to consider the matter.

Mr. MITCHELSON said he was not in a position to answer the question.

Mr. ALLEN moved, That the item, "Porirua, £2,000," be reduced by £500. There was to credit of the vote now, free of liabilities, £793; and, if the vote were reduced as proposed, that would leave the Government a balance of £293. There was already one large asylum in Wellington, and also a building of considerable size at Porirua; and he could see no reason why the vote should not be reduced.

Mr. PERCEVAL understood the Minister to say that he would not spend the vote until the House had had an opportunity of reconsidering the question. If so, why should the vote be put on the estimates? or why should the House retain it?

Mr. BUCHANAN would like to know how it came about that the Government bought this site and had proceeded to erect buildings on it. The whole thing seemed new to the House. How came it that Wellington had two asylums?

Mr. FITZHERBERT took it that the reason was this: that the asylum in town was pretty full, and there was little or no land connected with it, and that the idea was to have at Porirua a farm, upon which the milder patients might work, to the advantage of themselves mentally and to the advantage of the asylum economically.

Dr. NEWMAN said that when Dr. Grabham was Inspector of Lunatic Asylums he recommended this purchase, and there was no doubt that, from the lunacy point of view, he was quite right. The land in connection with the Wellington Asylum was not sufficiently large for the purpose, and was cold and unsuitable in every respect. Hence the suggestion of Dr. Grabham. It was the more necessary to carry out the suggestion because, unfortunately, lunacy was on the increase, and all the asylums were getting more and more full. The purchase was made by the late Government, under the express sanction of the honourable member for Kaiapoi.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—No.

Dr. NEWMAN said the honourable gentleman authorised payment of the purchase-money, and year by year authorised payment of money on the building; and he did not for a moment dispute that the honourable gentleman was perfectly justified in doing so, in view of the fact that the Wellington Asylum was already chock-a-block.

Dr. FITCHETT asked that the Government should give some indication of what their views were. It seemed rather absurd that honourable members should be expected to evolve out of their own inner consciousness reasons for retaining or striking out the vote.

Mr. TURNBULL asked if it was intended to build in brick or wood at Porirua.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the proposal before the department was to build in brick; but, in answer to the honourable member for Dunedin Central, he must say that the Government had not had time to consider the matter.

Mr. PEACOCK suggested that it was not necessary to go into the affair now, seeing that the Minister had assured the House that no contract should be let before the House met again.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON said the honourable member for Thorndon contradicted him so positively that he began to think that he was wrong in denying the responsibility sought to be put upon him; but he had just seen the officials of the department, and their statements fortified him in the opinion that the land was bought long before the late Government took office.

Dr. NEWMAN would like to know if the honourable member would deny that his late colleague, Mr. Buckley, and Mr. Kennedy Macdonald conducted the purchase from Mr. Earp. If so, he (Dr. Newman) would be prepared to give the price, and particulars, for he had a full knowledge of the whole transaction.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON had given his recollection and that of the officials. However, it was not a matter of consequence. He believed it was a good purchase.

Mr. ALLEN said he had not moved his amendment in total ignorance of the facts. He had visited the place, had been over the asylum, and knew that they were now erecting there buildings capable of holding thirty patients. There was, besides, a very large lunatic asylum in Wellington.

Dr. FITCHETT said it was full.

Mr. ALLEN did not care whether it was full or not. At a time like this, when they were trying to save every halfpenny, they should not spend so much money on what was really a luxury. He asked honourable gentlemen to take this vote as a test. If they could reduce any vote in the estimates this was one that could be reduced, and he would invite them to go into the lobby with him as a test of their sincerity in reducing expenditure. The asylum at Porirua was not full; and he might say that, to his certain knowledge, there were persons in lunatic asylums who were not lunatics in the proper sense of the word, and who ought to be removed—people who were inebriates, and so on, who had no right to be maintained at such institutions. He was quite certain that the present was not a desirable time for the expenditure of £30,000 on these buildings.

Mr. HISLOP thought it was only wasting time to discuss this matter, after the assurance that had been given; and it was a matter of no consequence whether they knocked the vote off or not. There was a tendency on the part of the department to run into extravagance, and they ought to watch it well; but he had the greatest sympathy with the sentiment that people who were in these asylums should receive everything that was necessary. Of course it was a matter of difficulty to find out the line which divided what should be regarded as luxuries and what were absolute necessities. He did not think there would be any inconvenience if £400 were knocked off, and he would not object to that being done.

Mr. ALLEN was willing to accept a reduction of the vote by £400.

Mr. TURNBULL was of opinion that all the money asked for would be required to put the place in order, and to erect the necessary boundary-fences.

Mr. BRUCE thought they were dealing with this matter in a very haphazard manner. The item in question was bracketed with that referring to the Wellington Asylum, and they did not know how much of the cost was dissociated from the cost of the Wellington Asylum. The question of the purchase of this land was quite irrelevant at the present time. The department, in view of the fact that the Wellington Asylum was full to overflowing, recommended the expenditure of £2,000 to enlarge the Porirua Asylum, and neither the Minister nor any member was in a position to say that they ought to reduce the vote.

Mr. FISHER was not anxious, as a Wellington member, about this vote; but would point out that the Wellington Asylum took all the lunatics from Hawke's Bay on the one coast to Wanganui on the other.

Mr. VALENTINE hoped the Minister would not agree to this reduction, as it was the amount the department estimated was required. It seemed to him that it was not extravagant to have a brick building, but that all over the colony these buildings should be constructed of the least inflammable material possible.

Mr. ALLEN said that, as the Minister assured him that £30,000 should be struck off the third column, he was perfectly prepared to let the vote go.

Dr. NEWMAN remarked that they were not yet at the third column, and that he regretted exceedingly that the Minister had accepted this reduction; for he believed it would have been a good thing to have had this little extra money.

Mr. TAYLOR thought the question was a very important one, and that the item should not be reduced. The people in these institutions were entitled to the sympathy of every one, and every care should be taken to provide for their comfort and safety.

Mr. KELLY was sorry to notice that the Minister was met with such opposition from members of his own party, who should surely have enough confidence in him to allow him to carry out his estimates, especially when honourable members on the opposite side of the House were supporting him. It seemed to him that the item ought not to be reduced.

Mr. IZARD hoped that all opposition to the vote would be withdrawn. He believed the money was required to be expended. It was necessary to fence and drain the land, and there were other small matters which should be attended to; and, so far as he could see, these would demand all the money asked for.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the item be reduced by £100."

Item retained.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE moved, That the item, "Seacliff Asylum, £2,000," be reduced by £1,500.

Mr. FISH asked the Minister for Public Works to explain what this vote was for.

Mr. MITCHELSON explained that it was for the purpose of providing the institution with gas, and for the erection of a doctor's residence.

Mr. BRUCE understood that the site was absolutely unsafe; and he should like some information on the subject. If the ground could not be made safe, it should be a direction of the Committee not to spend a penny more upon it than was absolutely necessary.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said the Minister for Public Works had a number of reports about this building, and a report had been sent in to the effect that it was unsafe for the patients to be there. There should be no gasworks or other new buildings erected until it was ascertained whether the building was sound.

Mr. FISH said the reason of the slips arose from the Government officers neglecting to carry out what was recommended by the architect, Mr. Lawson. Mr. Lawson, who was a very-much-abused man, had caused several drains to be cut down to the bed-rock in connection with the temporary buildings to take away the water running down. When these drains were constructed the buildings ceased slipping. Since 1879 the buildings had never slipped one bit. He would read a letter sent by Mr. Lawson to Mr. Blair, Engineer in Charge for the Middle Island, as follows:—

"Dunedin, 28rd October, 1879.

"W. N. Blair, Esq.,

"Engineer in Charge, Middle Island.

"SIR,—My attention having been called to the moving of foundations at the temporary Lunatic Asylum Buildings, Seacliff, lately erected, I have to state that it is urgently necessary, in order to prevent, if possible, further damage to the building, that drainage-trenches be sunk behind the same so as to intercept the undercurrent of ground-drainage which is causing the movement referred to.

"At the site of the permanent building I would also advise that similar but more extensive drainage-trenches be formed, so as to isolate the site, and prevent any similar movement, which would be most disastrous to the proposed new buildings. I think this of such importance that no delay should take place in the prosecution of the work.

"While on the ground I pointed out the nature of the required work, and that it would be better to keep the trenches referred to open, and to sink them as deep as possible, so as to obtain the result required.

"I hope steps will be taken to secure that this work is gone on with and completed as soon as possible.—Yours truly,

"R. A. LAWSON, Architect."

On the 16th January, 1880, he wrote again to Mr. Blair,—

"Dunedin, 16th January, 1880.

"W. N. Blair, Esq.,

"Engineer in Charge, Middle Island.

"SIR,—I have again to draw attention to the urgent necessity for more speedy action being taken as to the preliminary work at the site on the new permanent buildings.

"You are aware that, through a slip of ground which has taken place where the new temporary building is erected, much injury has resulted and may yet result; and, in order to prevent the possibility of such a serious matter occurring at the new permanent building, the site should be much more widely cleared of timber, and all the excavations made, as well as drains inserted to prevent undercurrents, which might cause such slips as those referred to.

"It was intended that the excavations and levelling of site, as well as the clearing of same, was to be done by patients from the Asylum, but it will now be seen by the ample trial of this system that sufficiently rapid progress cannot be made—in other words, that should it be continued it will be to the hindrance of the works, and probably much more serious results afterwards.

"I therefore now request you to be good enough to bring this matter before the Minister for Works, that it may be remedied by making arrangements with the contractor, under due restrictions, to proceed with these preliminary works with that necessary speed which their urgency calls for.—I have, &c.,

"R. A. LAWSON, Architect."

Now, the first work for the permanent building was commenced in September, 1879, by the clearing of the ground only, and the actual work of building was not begun until May, 1880. That was the central portion of the building. The second portion, including the north and south wings, was begun in December, 1881, and it was the north wing alone that had been injured by the slipping. These letters were sent in preliminarily to any work being done on the permanent building; and yet, in the face of the strong recommendations made, these letters and others remained unanswered, and the very thing which Mr. Lawson predicted would occur had occurred through the fault of some one,—whether it was on the part of Mr. Blair—and he thought it was—or the Government of the day he did not know. But there was the fact on record: the very thing which was predicted had occurred, and the consequent serious loss; and no means were taken by the Engineer or by the Government to prevent the mischief which had been predicted. As to the effect of what Mr. Lawson proposed, there was not the smallest doubt that even now, if his recommendations were carried out, the building would cease to slip. How much it would cost to improve the building and put it in the position it was in before the slip took place he did not know; but, from the success which had attended the action taken to prevent the temporary building from slipping, there was no reason to doubt that the same remedial measures would even now be suitable for the permanent building. The wretched engineering work displayed in the building was most lamentable, and he had no hesitation in saying that either the Engineer in Charge was most culpable and blamable for neglecting the advice given in the letters he had read, or the Government were blamable; and in the meantime this unfortunate gentleman, Mr. Lawson, a well-known citizen of Dunedin, had lain under the opprobrium of absolutely receiving some emolument from the contractor in order to shirk his liability on the erection of the building. It was only right that the earliest opportunity should be taken by some one of putting that gentleman right. It was evident from these letters that the remedy was in the hands of the Government, although, of course, it would be very much more costly than if the work had been done when it was recommended. He thought that the vote should be passed, because it was absolutely necessary that the Government should render the building secure, and the longer it was left in the present condition the greater would be the damage done; and it was quite within the range of possibility that, unless immediate steps were taken in this direction, there might be an absolute falling-down of a portion of the building. It would therefore be exceedingly unwise to reduce the vote, although he was not sure as to the necessity of a doctor's residence being built. Of course, if the Government had to pay rent for a doctor's residence, possibly it would be the cheapest course to erect one; but, if not, that amount might be saved. As to erecting gasworks or an electric-lighting apparatus, that should be done; it was a large building, and one of those modes of lighting should be immediately provided.

Mr. HISLOP thought it was a pity the honourable member for Dunedin South had raised the question as to who ought to be blamed with respect to the foundations of the building. He thought it would be very much more convenient that any inquiry with regard to it should be made at a time when all the parties blamed might have an opportunity of advancing their particular cases. There were two statements about it: one by the architect that blame was attachable to the Public Works Department because of their not carrying out the recommendations he made; while the Public Works Department thought blame was attachable to the inspection of the building, inasmuch as they say that the foundations were not put in by the contractor in the way it was indicated in the contract they should be. He did not intend to enter into that question himself, and he thought the honourable member should not ask the Committee to form any judgment until due time had been given for the inquiry which it was intended to hold into the matter. The Committee might have the assurance of the Government, with regard to the lighting, that, until the whole question as to the foundations was inquired into, and it was found what was the best course to pursue, no expense for permanent work should be incurred. The same assurance applied to the matter of the doctor's residence. There was no absolute necessity for a residence; but the asylum was very much crowded, and the part now used for a doctor's residence would be available for patients if a residence were erected. But the Government had not, so far, had time to fully inquire into the matter; and what they proposed was that, in the meantime, they should carry out the recommendations of the head of the department only to the extent of putting the money on the estimates. He thought the department was absolutely convinced that the money should be expended; but it would not be expended unless immediate remedial measures were carried out as to foundations, which, he believed, would require about £800.

Dr. FITCHETT was very glad to hear the statement of the Colonial Secretary; but, speaking with some knowledge of the building, he thought £800 would be totally inadequate to repair the building efficiently. He hoped the vote would not be reduced, though he hoped the Government would not go in for a scheme of electric lighting.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said it seemed to him, from what had been said, that the Government had already made inquiry, or they would not be able to make these recommendations. There must have been very careful inquiry and estimates made as to these foundations. Whatever money was wanted to make the foundations secure should be granted; but the House should distinctly say that no more money should be spent on fresh additions, such as gas-works or a doctor's residence, until the whole question of whether the building would stand or not was settled. If the Ministry would give that assurance he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HISLOP said that was the understanding of the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR said there must have been had construction at the start, and probably if there had been better supervision the slips would not have happened.

Mr. FISH said the supervision had been as perfect as for any work that had ever been done in the colony, one of the best possible clerks of works being engaged. The subsidence did not result from the faulty construction of the foundations, but through the drainage being allowed to percolate on the bed-rock.

Mr. MITCHELSON said an engineer had been sent down to examine the building, and he was clearly of opinion that the foundations were not constructed in a proper manner.

Mr. ROSS had read all the letters of Mr. Lawson, and that gentleman did not blame Mr. Blair. He thought the blame lay in another quarter. He might say that it was scarcely courteous that a gentleman in Mr. Lawson's position should not have received any reply to his letters.

Mr. J. McKenzie's amendment withdrawn.

Dr. NEWMAN suggested that if the Government were to board out any of these lunatics it would be a great saving. There were many of them who might very well obtain employment among small settlers up-country. This was no new idea of his, as the plan had been tried in other places with great success.

Mr. KELLY did not think the small settlers would find these lunatics of any use to them.

Mr. TURNBULL had seen at Porirua Asylum a man who was as strong and healthy as himself, and, on asking him why he did not seek work outside, he said he did not like it. And yet they called this man a madman! There were many of these people who could very well be employed usefully outside.

Vote, £29,000, agreed to.

Hospitals and other charitable institutions, £8,000, agreed to.

Quarantine stations, £100, agreed to.

School-buildings, £40,000.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE wished to know whether any of this sum was to be spent on the Waitaki Girls' High School. The buildings at that place already were quite sufficient for years to come. The late Government made an arrangement to hand over a building which was erected for a Customhouse, and the Board exchanged that for another building which they turned into a girls' high school, so that there was no necessity for putting up any building there.

Mr. MITCHELSON was understood to say that it was not intended to devote any of this money to the purpose referred to.

Dr. FITCHETT asked whether this £40,000 involved any reduction.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it involved a considerable reduction.

Dr. FITCHETT understood that the Premier had said that he would give the House an opportunity of considering the whole question of the education expenditure; and if there was a large reduction in this vote it might affect the whole question. He thought the Minister should allow the matter to stand over till the whole question was raised.

Major ATKINSON said the amount set down for school-buildings did not affect the general question, and had never been so treated by the House. There was no fixed amount for school-buildings: some years it was £50,000, some £60,000, and so on, as was considered necessary.

Mr. TURNBULL would strongly recommend the Premier to come down with a proposition to take another £500,000 and hand it over to Commissioners, to be invested by them for school-buildings. That would give an annual income for all time of £25,000 for that purpose. As the matter stood at present, when the money taken out of this loan was exhausted they would either have to tax the districts for any school-buildings they might require, or the buildings needed would have to be paid for out of consolidated revenue.

Dr. NEWMAN would like to ask the Minister in charge whether it was the intention to bring down any more votes under this head. He felt certain that the amount here put down would not be sufficient. In the Wellington District they were behindhand with their school accommodation. The amount which had been voted for this district for some years had been insufficient.

Mr. BUCHANAN indorsed the statement made by the honourable member for Thorndon. A large number of children in the Wellington District were not attending school, owing to the want of building-accommodation.

Major ATKINSON said that it meant that, after this loan, they were not going to borrow any more money for school-buildings. They must get the money in some other way.

Vote, School-buildings, £40,000, agreed to.

CLASS IX.—LIGHTHOUSES, HARBOUR-WORKS, AND HARBOUR DEFENCES.

Lighthouses, £4,300.

Mr. TURNBULL asked what was the charge for light-dues at the present time. They had spent £150,000 in building lighthouses, and there was a large annual expenditure in maintaining the lighthouses. His opinion was that the lighthouse dues were so low that the colony was losing a considerable amount of money in consequence.

Major ATKINSON said the charge was 4d. a ton for steamers, 6d. a ton for foreign sailing vessels every time they arrived in port, and 4d. for coastal vessels.

Mr. TURNBULL asked if the Union Company's steamers came under the heading of coasting vessels.

Major ATKINSON said they were treated as coasters, but on coming from the other colonies they were treated as foreign vessels.

Mr. TURNBULL said the present low rate for these steamers was unjust to the colony. The colony should raise sufficient revenue from these dues to pay the interest on the expenditure on lighthouses.

Vote, £4,800, agreed to.

Harbour-works, £500, agreed to.

The House adjourned at half-past two o'clock a.m.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Saturday, 17th December, 1887.

Special Powers and Contracts Bill—Government Railways Bill—Land Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SPECIAL POWERS AND CONTRACTS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—Sir, honourable members are aware that legislation of the nature of the Special Powers and Contracts Act is peculiar to New Zealand. Legislation of such a character is not tolerated in any other part of the world—certainly not in any other part of the British dominions, where, I believe, legislation of such a character would not be tolerated for a moment. The system originated with us ten years ago in the passing of a Bill to authorise Crown grants being issued under certain circumstances; and the practice since then has gradually developed from that until it has attained its present proportions. Last year the Hon. the Attorney-General took up the matter, and made a most valuable and exhaustive speech on the subject, which will amply repay honourable members for the time and trouble spent in reading it in Hansard; so that it is perfectly unnecessary for me to go over the same ground. I will only remark, Sir, that, although last year he and the Council generally put themselves to a great extent in opposition to the system, and excised a large number of the provisions of the Act, still it contained a number of provisions which go to exemplify the objectionable character of this kind of legislation. In looking through the Special Powers and Contracts Act of last year it is apparent that it is a local Act. It is placed among local measures, so that any person wishing to make himself acquainted with the provisions of legislation generally would be apt to overlook Acts of this description. Probably it would never occur to him that it was possible that in a Bill of this kind provisions should be introduced overriding general Acts of the Legislature. The extent to which this operates is shown by that very useful publication which is published periodically, and which we have laid on the table, called "Curnin's Index," in which are introduced all amendments in the law that have been adopted by the Legislature. But, in looking through it, I observe that one of the amendments of the law which have been passed in the Special Powers and Contracts Act, and which would have the effect of altering the legislation of the country, has been entirely overlooked by Mr. Curnin. Proficient as he is in the art of dealing with our legislation, he himself has fallen into the inadvertency of not examining local Acts to see whether they contained provisions which affected the general legislation of the country. Last year there was introduced into the Special Powers and Contracts Act a provision relating to the Land Transfer Act—a measure that was applicable to the colony and not to a particular district. There were also in it provisions affecting the Rating Act, provisions introducing amendments in the Corporations Act, in the Public Trustee Act, and a number of other Acts; so that it is impossible for any person who is not acquainted with local legislation as well as general legislation to know the law of the land on each subject. Not only so, but these Bills often contain a variety of provisions of an exclusively local nature which, owing to their being introduced into a Bill of this sort, do not pass through the ordeal that other local Bills would pass through, and therefore are not so keenly criticized. And not only that, Sir, but, as honourable members are aware, these provisions, of the very important nature that they are, are brought in at the last moment of the session. To my knowledge, frequently these Bills have come up from the other branch of the Legislature having clauses in them that were still in manuscript and which we have had to consider in this Council while still in manuscript. This is so well known to honourable members that I need not further refer to it. Every member in this Council must arrive at the conclusion that this mode of legislation is objectionable; and the sooner we do away with it and arrive at a correct class of legislation the better. There is reason to believe, I hear, that no measure of this sort will be introduced during the present session of Parliament; but, nevertheless, I think it desirable to proceed with the present motion, because it gives ample notice to succeeding Governments of what is the intention of the Council. They cannot hereafter say that they are taken by surprise, and I trust the effect will be that this objectionable mode of legislation will be done away with altogether. Where legislation is required for a particular object, that particular object should be the subject of a particular Bill. I have introduced into the motion words taken from the Instructions to the Governor. These Instructions have not, apparently, been always carried out; they state what is the wholesome system of legislation, and what is the system adopted in other parts of the British dominions, and indicate the course which should be followed in all our Bills. It is, "That, in the passing of all laws, each different matter should be provided for by a different law, without intermixing in one and the same law such things as have no proper relation to each other." Honourable members are aware that this principle is violated, and has been violated in every Special Powers and Contracts Act that we have passed. I trust we shall insert this principle on our records, and that this objectionable mode of legislation will not be recurred to in succeeding sessions. I beg to move the motion standing in my name.

Hon. Mr. Waterhouse

Motion made, and question proposed, "That this Council, considering it of the highest importance that, in the passing of all laws, each different matter should be provided for by a different law, without intermixing in one and the same law such things as have no proper relation to each other, will refuse to sanction any proposed legislation of the nature of the Special Powers and Contracts Act."—(Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.)

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND.—I do not see that there is anything very dangerous or objectionable in our Special Powers and Contracts Bills. It seems to me that any Special Powers and Contracts Bill is intended to meet a large number of hard cases—there are such things—and to legalise rights which cannot very well be upheld in any Court of law or equity, or by any other means whatever. It is quite right, therefore, that there should be some means of meeting such cases, and doing justice where it is demanded; and, as for a number of cases being put together in one Bill, well, if there are fifty cases, I do not see any harm in putting them in one measure instead of having an Act for each special case.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—The Council, I am sure, is aware of the fact that nobody has opposed Bills of this character more than I have, and especially during the session of 1886, when there was a great cry about this class of Bills. No doubt there are a great many things introduced into these Bills which ought not to be in them; and I think that things affecting local matters, altering public statutes, should not be introduced in such a form. But, on the other hand, there are things which may properly be introduced into a Bill of this kind. In the Bill of 1886 there were about one hundred cases. I am speaking now from recollection, but I think the Council struck out about sixty or seventy of the items; but many were passed owing to certain promises having been made from time to time. And these Bills have been assented to by the Assembly from time to time; and it was thought by the majority of the Council that it was not desirable to strike out every one of these objectionable cases. But I do not think we need pass a motion of this kind this session. I think it would be unwise. The motion refers to the intermixing in one and the same law of such things as have no proper relation to each other. It would be very awkward, no doubt, to pass a separate Act—which would require to go through all the necessary forms before and after its introduction—for each of these cases. I may say that I am not aware that there is a Special Powers and Contracts Bill coming down this session. So far as I know, there is no intention on the part of the Government to introduce such a Bill this session; but, if such a Bill came through my hands, I would take care that it did not contain such objectionable provisions as are contained in the Act of 1886. If I had been the honourable gentleman who moved this motion I would have waited, and then, if a Bill of this character were introduced, I would raise the question on the principle that has been alluded to—introducing several cases into the Act of a totally different character. But I think it is better to let the matter stand over as it is at present, and that we should wait until we have something to deal with, some case of the kind he complains of, and then lay down some rules for the future. I think the Council could very well prescribe a rule. The Council were unanimous on the subject when the question was previously raised, and I think the report of the Committee which was appointed for the purpose of considering the subject was generally acceded to. If my honourable friend would withdraw the motion, the Council would in future have an opportunity of dealing with any Bill which contains any principle of the objectionable nature to which he referred.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—It seems to me very strange that the Hon. the Attorney-General cannot inform the Council whether such a Bill as the Special Powers and Contracts Bill is to come down or not this session. The present notice has been on the Order Paper for some time, and surely the honourable gentleman has had an opportunity of consulting with his colleagues, and of saying whether such a Bill is to come down or not.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I have not heard of any Bill of that kind coming down.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—The honourable gentleman says he has not heard of any Bill of that kind coming down; but I think that there have been so many transactions—very shady transactions—carried through by these Bills that it is necessary, if introduced, that they should be brought down early in the session, so that the Council may have an opportunity of saying whether they shall be passed or not. It is all very well to propose that the motion should be postponed till next week, because honourable members will be going away, and Ministers will be carrying on with a handful of members. I think the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse deserves the thanks of the Council for taking up the matter as he has done, and I know that the Council will carry this resolution, because the Government have had ample opportunity of knowing whether there was such a Bill or not coming down. And, seeing that the Hon. the Attorney-General cannot say for certain that such a Bill is not coming down, the only way is to carry the resolution which has been moved.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—I have much pleasure in supporting the motion of my honourable friend Mr. Waterhouse. I think it very necessary indeed that some such resolution should be come to as that which is proposed. In times gone by the dissatisfaction and ill-feeling that have been evoked in the Council in consequence of many bad propositions contained in these Bills were such that they ought not to be permitted to recur. I cannot say whether a Bill should not be brought in to meet any special claim that may properly arise; but I think that those cases should not be massed in a conglomeration which very few honourable members would give attention to at the end of the session. I think the sooner we put a stop to this sort of thing the better, and I shall be glad to support such a motion as this.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—I hope my honourable friend will go on with his resolution. The Hon. the Attorney-General has laid great stress on the Special Powers and Contracts Act of 1886. I think we did, on that occasion, strike out one-half of the local Bills “dodges”—I think they were called “swindles”—that were proposed in that Bill. I think we struck them out at the instance of the Hon. Dr. Pollen, who is not now here, and it was at his instance that a great deal of pruning was effected in the measure. No one could have objected more to the passing of that Bill than did my honourable friend. I looked over and referred to the measure which formed the subject of discussion in the Council yesterday. If I had looked in the schedule I should have found it there, no doubt; but I had some trouble in finding it, though I found it at last in the Special Powers and Contracts Bill, which had no reference whatever to the Bill under discussion. I think that there should be some means to indicate the nature of the provisions in measures of this sort, and the statutes they affect. I think it is not right to put these Bills through at the end of the session; and, although I have endeavoured to put two or three through myself, I must say I always object to that, and I still object to it. I hope the Council will pass this resolution, and that we shall never allow any more of these Bills to be brought forward and passed.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—With reference to the request of the Hon. the Attorney-General that I should withdraw the motion, I should have pleasure in doing so if I felt that the course was desirable in itself. But I do not agree with the argument upon which the honourable gentleman has recommended me to adopt that course. He said that there is no such Bill now before the Legislature, and that it is time enough to lay down such a rule when one is before us. When a Bill of that kind is before us, it would then be said it is too late to do this—that I should have taken steps before, in order to prevent the Bill being brought in. I feel that it would be making a great mistake to delay the tabling of a resolution of this character. If the resolution is adopted, I hope the result will be that this objectionable mode of legislation will be stopped, and that every different measure will be introduced as a separate Bill.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I think the Council will agree as to the necessity of a Bill of this character being brought forward. There is, no doubt, a great deal of dissatisfaction with the present state of the law on the subject. We find it in every direction. We find it in the House of Representatives, where petitions are being constantly presented, resolutions moved, and questions asked in reference to railways. And pressure is being brought to bear from time to time by one party or another in reference to the subject. The newspapers express general dissatisfaction with the management of the railways, and to a certain extent they represent the public feeling on the matter. There is no doubt that a great deal of pressure of an objectionable kind is brought to bear on Ministers, and especially on the Minister for Public Works. There are a great number who desire to serve their friends or those agreeing with them in politics; and we find that it constantly is the case that pressure of that kind is brought to bear to a great and very objectionable extent. Difficulties of a similar kind have been experienced in the other colonies, and in Victoria more especially. The result has been that in Victoria an Act has been passed of a similar character to this measure. In fact, this Bill is to a certain extent founded upon that Act. They passed that Act, no doubt, for the purpose of getting rid of the difficulties which surrounded the question as it stood before. The Act in Victoria has been in operation for the last four years, and, so far as I can ascertain,—and a good deal of trouble was taken to ascertain the views of the people of Victoria before this Bill was framed,—it was found that the new system has generally worked very satisfactorily. The result of that has been that New South Wales is following the example of Victoria. Whether the Bill which has been before the New South Wales Parliament has passed at the present time I do not know. At all events, the New South Wales Bill was framed on the model of the Victorian measure, and I think it is better in some respects than the Victorian Act. We had these measures before us in framing the Bill now before the Council. I think it will be found that the changes we have made will be very much for the better. No doubt our circumstances are not precisely the same as those of New South Wales and Victoria. I do not think that in this colony the difficulties we have met with so far have been so great as those met with in Victoria and New South Wales. I may quote a few lines on this subject from a speech by Mr. Richardson, late Minister for Public Works, who has probably had more experience with regard to railways in this part of the world than any other man in the colony: at all events, I do not know any one who has had more. He says,—

“Now, I think there has been a great deal of misapprehension in this House and in the country generally as to the reason why the railways of Victoria were handed over to a Board. It was not owing to any such system of management as the honourable member referred to, but it was because of the enormous political influence that was brought to bear for securing employment on the railways for the friends of members of Parliament, supporters of the Government for the time being. Abuse in that direction had grown to such an extent in connection with the Victorian railways that it was absolutely necessary that something should be done. It was a notorious fact that the skilled officers in the department, those who really understood their work, were actually being impeded by the enormous number of persons forced upon the department owing to that political influence of which I have spoken. That was really the reason of the Government of Victoria adopting this different system of management. And, if my information is correct—and I am sure it is, because it comes from one of the highest authorities in New South Wales—that sort of thing has also gone on in New South Wales, although not to the same extent as in Victoria; and that is regarded as a cause for alarm. It seems to them that the only way out of the difficulty is to completely alter the system of management.”

I do not need, however, to appeal to this authority, for it is perfectly obvious that the necessary result of our present system will be that which has been experienced in Victoria and New South Wales. I need not very much longer pursue this subject, because I think there is a general feeling throughout the Legislature, and amongst the public—in fact, it is the feeling of everybody who knows anything of the subject—that some alteration should take place. When the present Government came into office this was one of the subjects which very early cropped up. The only mode of dealing with it, we thought, was to follow the lead of Victoria and New South Wales, and frame an Act for ourselves. We had the Victorian Act and the New South Wales Bill before us in framing this measure; therefore, in the course we are recommending, we are not taking a leap in the dark. We know what the result has been in Victoria, and we hope that the result will be equally satisfactory here. Looking, then, at the fact that we are on a bad road which will lead us into difficulties if we continue in it, I think it will be generally acknowledged that some alteration of the present system must be made. I shall assume, therefore, that the Council, to a certain extent, agrees with the Government in this: that something evidently requires to be done. I do not know whether any honourable gentleman is so much in love with the present system that he will get up and defend it. It appears to me that a large majority of the present Assembly have testified in the other House that they are in favour of the Bill, and the feeling generally is that some alteration should take place. The question, therefore, is, What should that alteration be? The Government have given the matter a great deal of consideration, and have taken a great deal of pains with this Bill. It has been more or less thought of since the present Government came into office. Information has been collected from Victoria and other sources, and, collating all these things, the result is the Bill which is now before the Council. I think that this Bill will be found to be a very great improvement on the present system. No doubt blame, to a certain extent, is thrown upon the railway officers; but, so far as I can gather, very much of the blame ought not to be put upon them. It is the system that is wrong in itself. It is upon a wrong principle, and, that being so, the sooner we set about making an alteration the better. I will call attention to the provisions which the Bill now before the Council contains for starting an entirely new system so far as we are concerned. But, as I say, we have got the benefit of the experience of Victoria, where an Act of a similar kind has been in operation for the last four years. What is done, therefore, is this: The management of the railways is to be put in the hands of Commissioners. The Commissioners are to be three in number, and they are to be beyond all political influence whatever, and placed entirely upon a footing which is to give them an independent position. They are appointed for a certain number of years—five years is the number fixed—and they are to have specified salaries. They are to have the entire control of the railways. The management of the railways will thus be left free from any political influence whatever, and this management will be handed over to the control of these Commissioners, who are independent of any political influence. Then comes the question of the salary to be paid to the Chief Commissioner. This point has been considered by the Government during the last two months, and the amount of salary was not filled in when the Bill was introduced in the other branch of the Legislature. But the House, to a certain extent, I think, on the lead of the Government, filled in the salary of the Chief Commissioner at £1,500 a year. It seems, however, now to be considered that £1,500 a year would not be sufficient to procure a first-rate man from England. Therefore it has been proposed to increase the salary, and if that is to be done it will be by Governor's message to both Houses. The powers of the Commissioners are defined in the Second Part of the Bill. They are to have entire control of the constructed railways, and they will have the entire management, working, and maintenance of them. But they will have nothing to do with railways only partially constructed. That would be the position when the new system comes into operation. Provision is made subsequently to that with regard to the lines that are under construction now. The difficulty of handing these lines over to the Commissioners is this: The Public Works Office has not only charge of railways, but it has charge of roads, harbours, and various other things, which could not be very well handed over to the Commissioners. But the object is that, so far as we can, this shall be brought to a termination as soon as possible, and that the railways shall be brought to a termination within the next three years; and if not, and it should be the will of the Legislature that any further railways should be constructed, the proper persons to construct them will be these Commissioners. Provision is made in the Bill that, if it is found convenient, the construction of such works shall be handed over to the Commissioners. If at present we handed over the lines in course of construction we should then have to keep three distinct staffs. As the Bill was originally drawn it was intended to hand everything over; but when it came to be considered carefully it was seen that harbours, roads, bridges, and a number of other works which are in hand could not very well be handed over to the Commissioners. Power is given to the Governor to hand over railways or other works to the Commissioners, as may be deemed desirable; and, if in the future it is deemed wise to make further railways, the Commissioners will be available for that purpose. At present I do not see that we shall be in a position to make any more railways for some time. I do not think it is justifiable to go on as we have been going on for the last seventeen years, and making lines in the way we have done by borrowed money. As far as the policy of the present Government is concerned, that system is to come to an end. We do not propose at once to stop everything. That is impossible, inasmuch as we should throw away all the money we have expended on incomplete works; but we propose that at the earliest possible time we shall cease to expend any more money on works of this character out of loan. If we have any money to spare out of consolidated revenue, it may be a question how that could be spent. That, however, does not seem to be a question likely to trouble us now. I would now call attention to clause 27, which is an important section. That section says,—

"Nothing in Part VII. of 'The Public Works Act, 1882,' contained shall be deemed or taken to authorise or entitle the Governor or the Minister, or any person acting on behalf of the said Governor or Minister, to inspect or examine, or to exercise in any manner supervision, superintendence, or control over, any of the railways vested in, or that may be vested in, the Commissioners under this Act; and it shall not in any case be necessary to appoint any General Manager for any such railway."

The object of that is, as I have said, to take the matter entirely out of political influence. If we hand over this power to the Commissioners I think we should hand it over unfettered. The moment we begin to fetter the Commissioners is the moment we shall get into difficulties. I have seen notices of motion in another place professing to instruct the Commissioners to consider the state of the country, and giving a variety of other instructions to them. I object to any such instructions being given whatever. We shall hand the railways over to them, and tell them that we want to make these railways pay, that we want to open the country, and we want the railways to pay interest on the money borrowed, and we desire, so far as that can be brought about, that every facility should be given to people to bring their produce to market, and open the country. If we only consider the opening-up of the country, it means taxation on the community at large, and very unfairly, to a certain extent. It appears to me that we should leave it to the Commissioners, without any instructions from the Government, to do the best they can for the country at large, taking in view that it is desirable that the country should be opened up, and every privilege be afforded of communication between different parts of the colony; but that, at the same time, it is also necessary that the railways should at all events be able to contribute a very large amount of interest on the money which has been borrowed for the construction of the lines. I would now refer to a few words in section 31. That provides that Commissioners are to decide as to the sites for stations, etcetera. At present pressure is brought to bear on the Minister in regard to where stations should be placed. Although I do not say that there is any case in which the station has been placed in any other situation than that which is best for the public generally, still pressure is continually brought on Ministers to put stations in particular places to suit particular individuals. I do not know any case in which such pressure has been given way to, but honourable members are well aware that pressure of that kind is constantly being made. Therefore it is provided in this Bill that "The Commissioners shall be the authority to decide on the position, character, and suitability of all stations." The object of that is to take away from the exercise of political influence the fixing of sites for stations, and to relieve the Ministers of all these applications which have been so very troublesome, and, I have no doubt, difficult to deal with. There are a few words in clause 84 which I entirely disapprove of. When the Bill was under consideration a discussion took place on the subject of this clause between myself and the permanent officers of the railway and my colleagues, and especially the Minister for Public Works. I consider that, under any circumstances, the interference of Licensing Committees with the Government railways would be exceedingly objectionable, and should not be entertained. The Bill, as originally drawn, left out the words, "with the approval of the Licensing Committees." At present the Licensing Committees grant licenses for the sale of liquors at our railway-stations, and the consequence is, some of these places are allowed to remain open till twelve o'clock at night. The result is that probably there is no train after nine or ten o'clock, and yet the railway authorities are obliged to keep a number of people about the railway while these establishments are open. If the railway authorities had the power when the last train had gone of shutting up these liquor-houses it would save a great deal of expense and trouble; and not only that, but it would, to a certain extent, make the facilities for people getting drink less than they are at the present time. I am sure that would be considered very advisable. When we come to that in Committee I will suggest that these words be struck out. I feel strongly about it, because I am sure their retention would lead to difficulties. I say that it is out of the question that these Licensing Committees throughout the country should have the opportunity of interference with the Government railway-stations. There are different systems in different parts of the country, and the moment a train passes over a certain line the passengers are in a district where a different system prevails, so that the public do not know what rules they have to follow. On a long line of railway there may be half a dozen different systems met with. I feel satisfied that the Council will agree with the Bill as it originally stood, and that honourable members will agree with the observations which I now make in regard to this point. Of course the Commissioners have power to make by-laws. I proceed now to notice clause 89. As honourable members are aware, the Government have telegraph lines apart altogether from the railways, but, for the purpose of working the railways with safety and with advantage, it is necessary that there should be telegraph lines peculiarly suited to the Railway Department; that they should be free from any other interference whatever. In subsection (2) of this section it is provided that these lines may be used, "so far as is consistent with the free and efficient working of the railways, for the transmission of messages by the public." That convenience is to be afforded to the public, but the first consideration, of course, is that these lines must be used for the railway; but, so far as is practicable, facilities are to be given to the public in this respect. I do not know whether I need go further into this matter. All that I can do now is to call the attention of the Council to what appear to be the most important and prominent features of the Bill. Mere details I pass over. We know that the Government departments often do not take precisely the same view. Clause 41 provides that—

"In case any difference shall arise between the Commissioners and the Postmaster-General with regard to the terms and conditions on which any contract or agreement shall be made, or otherwise in relation thereto, the same shall be determined by the Governor in Council."

That appears to be the most easy way of reconciling any difference there may be. The Governor in Council will, of course, be above any consideration as to favouritism between one department and another, and would put matters as they ought to be put. The clause next requiring observation from me refers to the contracts. The Commissioners have power to make contracts, and to bind themselves as to a variety of matters, and it is essential that they should have these powers. Clauses are inserted indicating the mode in which contracts are to be executed. Now we come to a very important part of the Bill, and that is the expenditure and control of money. Clause 46 provides,—

"All moneys appropriated by Parliament for the maintenance, working, or management of the railways by this Act vested in the Commissioners, or for any reconstruction or partial reconstruction thereof, or duplication or other addition to or extension of such railways, or any of them, or any part thereof, or for any purpose in connection therewith, shall be expended under the control and management of the Commissioners. The provisions of this section shall extend to any case in which the Governor in Council exercises the powers conferred by section twenty-five of this Act."

By these means the accounts are placed under the ordinary audit of the country, which is all that is necessary for performing the work. It is necessary, of course, that they should be audited. I think that in Victoria they have created a special audit, but this appears to be wholly unnecessary; and so I say the audit establishment is fully sufficient for the purpose of auditing the accounts of these Commissioners. In clause 56 provision is made that employes taking fees shall lose their office, and shall be subject to penalties. All these are necessary provisions, and require no special notice on my part. A very important part of the Bill is Part III., commencing at clause 62. This provides that the Commissioners may appoint and remove employes, and pay such salaries and wages as shall be determined by them out of money provided by Parliament. All patronage is thus taken away from the Government; the patronage, whatever it may be, is entirely in the hands of the Commissioners, and it is dealt with in a way that I shall come to presently. Then, it is also provided how persons in the employment of the Government in the railway service shall be passed over from one department to the other, and that each of those who have been in the Civil Service shall cease to be in such service, and shall be deemed to have been appointed by the Commissioners. Clause 64 provides that all appointments shall be to the lowest grade in each of the various branches of the railway service, and that they shall be on probation only; and, after a report from the Commissioners that the probationer has conducted himself to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, the appointments may be confirmed by the Commissioners. I would lay stress on the fact that no appointments are to be made except to the lowest grade; except that the Commissioners will have the power to appoint to any position, if they think fit, any person of known ability, or possessing special qualifications, not engaged in the railway service, but no such appointment is to be made unless the Commissioners certify that there is no person in the railway service fit to be promoted to such position. Proper provisions are also made as to the examination of a probationer. A regular promotion is thus provided. The object of this system is to enable a young man who may be entering the service to have a future before him, and, if qualified, to rise to higher situations in the service, so that favouritism cannot be exercised by the promotion of other persons over his head. I think this is a very useful provision, and will be found to work advantageously. It looks so fair on the face of it, that it is a wise provision to have; it destroys all favouritism on the part of the Government. The Commissioners are to obtain the sanction of the Governor for any departure from the rules here laid down. In clause 76 is provided a saving of the existing rights of Civil servants.

It provides that the rights of all persons who at the time of the coming into operation of this Act are in the Civil Service of the colony, or who are in the service of the Government, shall, as regards compensation for loss of office or superannuation allowance, be preserved up to the time when they enter into the service of the Commissioners. The compensation for loss of office or retiring-allowance to be paid to any such person is to be paid on his leaving the service of the Commissioners, but is to be calculated only on the basis of his employment in the Civil Service of the colony prior to his entering the service of the Commissioners. It is further provided that all payments of compensation or retiring-allowance shall be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and on the same terms and conditions as if the person affected had remained in the Civil Service of the colony. This means that they would get their allowance, but they would not get any for the time they had been in the railway service; and it is competent for the officers to take compensation or retiring-allowance at once, or to continue in the railway service; so that in the railway service there would be no pensions at all. But there is an arrangement by which the different persons in the Railway Department can create a fund for those whom it may be required to aid. The only other provision to which I wish to call the attention of the Council is a provision relating to the investigation of accidents. Now, this may be a very serious matter; it is a matter which often requires sifting to the bottom. Provision is made in Victoria by which, in the first instance, the Commissioners are to investigate; when they have investigated, they report on the matter; if that is unsatisfactory, or if there is anything which appears to require further consideration, a Court is constituted consisting of a Resident Magistrate and assessors; a Coroner is also authorised to make further inquiry: and we have adopted somewhat similar provisions. Now, this last is a provision which perhaps some honourable members may not like. I believe some do not, as a rule, like Coroners' juries; and if ever we have a change as to Coroners' juries—I think a Coroner is a very useful person myself—we should have to make a change here. Thus every possible means are taken for the purpose of securing the fullest investigation. Within the last few hours, I may say, it was suggested whether or not some limitations should not be put to the amount which may be recovered, where an accident happens from the negligence of the Board of Commissioners or its officers. The law, in this respect, as it affects ships, provides that in the case of accident only a certain percentage shall be allowed, according to the value of the ship—I think it is limited to £12 or £15 per ton. Perhaps it would be as well to take into consideration whether or not, before the Bill passes, it would not be desirable to put in a limitation to the amount of compensation that could be claimed for a railway accident. I shall carefully look up the law relating to shipping in this respect, and consider whether it is desirable to embody this principle in the present measure. I have no doubt the honourable member who suggested this was struck by the experience of the recent accidents in Australia, when actions were brought to recover thirty or forty thousand pounds. This is a very serious matter; but whether it will be necessary to make an alteration or not will be a matter for consideration. As far as the investigation goes, and ascertaining the cause of the accidents, and the possibility in the future of preventing such accidents, the provisions of the Bill are complete. And now, having made these remarks, which I am afraid are very inadequate, considering the very great importance of this measure, and though in dealing with the Bill I have not entered into details but have taken out the salient points only, I must hand it over to the consideration of the Council, and hope honourable members will give their especial attention to the clauses which I have named. With these few observations, I beg to move, That the Bill be read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—It is with a very great deal of pleasure that I rise to echo the concluding words which fell from my honourable friend on the opposite side of the Council. I have seldom read a Bill of such length and of such importance with so much satisfaction as I have read this. I compliment the Minister in charge of the Bill, and the draftsmen who have been engaged in its construction, on the manner in which they have performed their work. I sat down to read this measure, pencil in hand, expecting that in so important a measure I should find many points with which I could not agree. However, I found that I had to make very little use of my pencil, and I believe that, if the Council will pass the Bill as it stands, no harm, but a great benefit, will accrue to the country. And I may say I am only a recent convert to the policy of non-political Railway Boards, and of intrusting our railways to these independent Boards. The measure of failure which has attended the working of our railways is, in my opinion, attributable to the interference of the Legislature with those duties which are simply executive. To the complaints which are frequently made of the management of our railways I think we attach far too much importance. I believe our railways are managed very much better than the outcry which we sometimes hear, and which we read of in the public newspapers, would seem to imply. I believe that the complaints which are made about bad management do not proceed from those who have had the most to do with the railways or the use of them, but from a few discontented small customers. In regard to the General Manager, Mr. Maxwell, I am responsible for his appointment; and I was in charge of this department for a considerable time after his appointment; and at this time I think it becomes me to say what I know and what I think of him. There is no doubt that his inflexible character, and his determination not to sacrifice the interests of his department to any unfounded demand, are answerable for the unpopularity of his management; and I only hope that the Government will be so happy as to find men of his acquirements and strength of will for the appointments of Commissioners. In fact, I think the country could not do better than make Mr. Maxwell one of the Commissioners. Whether the post of Chief Commissioner might well be conferred upon him may possibly be doubted somewhat, because in all these matters the popular will has to some extent to be respected, and it is useless to try to make water flow up-hill; but I am quite sure that if any expert from any of the neighbouring colonies, or from England, were to make an examination of the way in which our railways have been worked under his management, their report would be a testimonial to the skill and experience of Mr. Maxwell's management. Parliament, however, can never manage a system of railways with any success while parties and organizations last, and while Ministers are therefore subject to the interference of members of Parliament they never can hope properly to administer a complicated system such as our railways; and that is why I have become a convert to the placing of our railways under other management. There is another advantage which the country will get. There is no doubt that the desire of Governments for the economical management of our railways, and the steps which have been taken in this direction, have earned for the Government frequently the enmity of persons engaged in the Railway Department; and the interference of those persons in elections has, I believe, led to the defeat of some of the most honest and capable Ministries. I believe that when this country engaged in a great system such as this railway one—a system which necessitates the employment of so many hundreds and thousands of hands—it would have been a matter of good policy if all these employes had been deprived of their votes. However, the placing of the system in the hands of non-political Commissioners will take away the necessity for that course, because the persons employed on the railways will know perfectly well that, as the Commissioners have absolute rule over them, whatever Parliament may do or honourable members advocate will not make much difference in their position. I quite agree with the Hon. the Attorney-General in what he said as to the inadequacy of the salaries which were proposed to be given to the Commissioners. I am perfectly convinced myself that the stamp of man the country demands in the gentleman who is to be appointed as Chief Commissioner will not be obtained for £1,500, especially as the appointment is only for five years. If the appointment had been one for life, or while his conduct was good, and if he had been removable only by a vote of both Houses, then £1,500 might perhaps suffice. But such a salary as this will not be likely to tempt the kind of men to whom the railways might be intrusted. I agree with the remarks which fell from the Attorney-General on the licensing of railway-stations; and, generally, it seems to me that the Bill is wonderfully perfect as it comes to us. I do not think, therefore, that it will be necessary now to discuss the clauses or the provisions of the Bill in detail. If anything needs amendment in the opinion of honourable members, their opinions on these supposed defective clauses can be given when in Committee. I would only finish by complimenting the Government on the excellence of the measure we have before us.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—I cannot say that I take the same line as the honourable member who has just spoken. I look upon it that there is a necessity for a change in the present system, and I think that a Bill such as this will pretty well answer all purposes; but I think it has been rushed through Parliament in a way which is most unjustifiable. In another branch of the Legislature there was no opportunity given to move any amendment whatever. The eighty-six clauses of the Bill were rushed through when there were only between thirty and thirty-six members present. The Hon. the Attorney-General said the change was called for by the general public. I believe that in that he is perfectly correct. I believe the general public look to Parliament making some change in this direction. He also said it was advocated by the newspapers.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—The honourable member must be mistaken. I said the papers had demanded this.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—Sometimes the honourable gentleman speaks so low—and I am not very good at hearing—that I must have made a mistake as to what he said. However, I was going to say that, as far as I can ascertain the public pulse, I believe that the general public are in favour of a change, but they do not think there is time enough being given for the consideration of such an important measure as this, and they think the matter could well stand over for three months. I think that is a pretty general view of the subject. Then, there is another point which may be referred to—that one Board will not answer for this colony. In Australia, where they have one Board, the colonies are differently situated. I say it is advocated by all classes that there should be two Boards—one for the North Island and the other for the South Island. My own impression is that this measure will give very great dissatisfaction if it is passed with the provision that there shall be only one Board for the two Islands.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—We have tried the system of two Commissioners already.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS.—It never was tried properly. The Minister in charge of the railways at the time the Commissioners were appointed did not understand what he was about. But those Commissioners had not the power that the present Commissioners will have. I know perfectly well that the Hon. Mr. Peacock, who has had charge of the railways in Canterbury, if he should speak would express my own opinion—that one Board will not do for the two Islands. I have not spoken to him on the subject, but I think I am correct in guessing his views. I think there has been a good deal of delay in bringing this Bill forward, but I do not blame the Government for that, because there has been a great deal of obstruction to getting on with the work of the session. But had this Bill had about a fortnight's consideration it would have been far more satisfactory than it is at present. I like the principle of the Bill; but I think there has not been sufficient consideration given to it, and the subject is one of very great importance. I am not going to move that the Bill be read this day three months; but, at the same time, I think it is a question whether the Attorney-General should not withdraw the Bill this session, and in three months he will be able to take it up with a full knowledge of what the public views are upon the question. There will be some time required to ascertain whether there should be two Boards or one.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND.—Sir, this Bill is quite uncalled-for—that is to say, uncalled-for by every sensible person in the colony. It is called for, certainly. It is the outcome of a public clamour and the blathering of an ignorant population, as represented by a miserable lot of rags of penny papers. The Hon. Mr. Reynolds says there is an outcry for this Bill. Yes, just as there is an outcry for reform of the Legislative Council. When the newspaper writer has got nothing else to do, and no other subject to write on, he takes a pull at his whiskey-bottle to begin with, and then he sits down to write an article against the Council or against railway-mismanagement, of which he knows nothing whatever. The general public the Hon. Mr. Reynolds talks about—what is the general public? What did Carlyle say of the general public? "Mostly fools!" Every two-legged jackass in this colony, who has just got brains enough to spell out an article in a trashy rag of a newspaper, thinks he is qualified to talk about railway reform, the government of the colony, or anything else. The Hon. the Attorney-General painted such a rosy picture of the future management of our railways that I am sorry the Bill does not go further and propose to put the whole government of the colony into Commission. What wonderful reform there would be if that were done, even to the doing-away with the Hon. the Attorney-General himself! If this putting of the railways in the hands of Commissioners should succeed, I think that, before long, we should have a Bill brought down to put the whole government of the country in the hands of Commissioners.

An Hon. MEMBER.—And appoint you Chief Commissioner?

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND.—No, not myself; but send for some third-rate genius from England at £2,000 a year. I thought we had enough of these geniuses from England. It was said that every one we brought out here at a thousand a year was a first-rate man, and all our imported geese were nothing less than swans. I thought that in connection with our defence-works we had had enough of that kind of thing. The colony has been put to an enormous expense, and all sorts of wild schemes have been proposed; and we have been ready to adopt the schemes, and have imported men from the Old Country to carry them out. Railways have been reduced to their present miserable state in New Zealand through the clamours of the people. They are continually calling out for reductions in the fares, and are continually meddling and muddling with what they do not understand; and the consequence is that the railways will not pay. Not long ago I took up a paper, and I saw some correspondence relating to a demand made by some people of Taranaki that white-pine should be carried on the railways at lower rates. It was shown that already the lines carry white-pine on the footing of firewood, but it was demanded that it should be carried for almost nothing to please these particular people. It was not a question of whether it paid to carry it or not—that was a matter of no importance. Supposing these three geniuses are imported, and they find that the old system is the right one, and perhaps raise the fares and traffic charges: they will then become the three most hated men in the colony. What will the Press say to them then? The Press will say, "What else could we have expected from this irresponsible body?"—just as they talk of us, and ask, "What could be expected from this irresponsible body—a nominee Council?" I do not know whether Mr. Vaile is to be one of the three Commissioners. There was an instance of popular ignorance! I venture to say that Mr. Vaile knows no more about the management of railways than I do. But he is a man who can make a long speech, and put the matter in a plausible light. If there were a population here of three or four millions his scheme might be a reasonable one, but it is totally unsuited to a colony with a small population like ours. He is able to put his scheme in a plausible light, and people cry out, "Oh, Vaile is the man; hand our railways over to him;" and the Press re-echoes the ignorant outcry of the people. I really do not see the use of going to England for these third-rate geniuses. If they were men of such mark as is thought by some I do not suppose that England could spare them. If changes are required there are plenty of men—plain, sensible men—already in New Zealand who would do for the position. I contend that no case has been made out against the present management. If you only let the present men who manage the Government railways alone—

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—The people will not let them alone.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND.—The Hon. Mr. Miller is right—the people will not let them alone. And, whatever persons you put in charge of the railways, you may depend upon it they will be subjected to the same interference, and with the same result. Therefore, I say, let things remain as they are. I do not fancy that by bringing out these third-rate gentlemen from England you are going to make matters a bit better.

Hon. Mr. Scotland

The Hon. Mr. SHEPARD.—If I had any doubt as to the necessity of making a change in the present system of railway management that doubt would have been put an end to by the graphic description given by the Hon. Mr. Scotland of the present miseries endured, the loss to the colony, and the disorganized state into which the railways have got on account of public pressure. His speech would have convinced me certainly, if I had any doubt, that the present system should not continue. I would not say that in my opinion the system of management by Commissioners is the best that can be adopted. I am rather disposed to think that it would be a great deal better to go further, and endeavour to get out of the railways, as we ought to get out of all other business which can be conducted better by private enterprise and by private judgment than they can be by judgment subjected to the popular pressure described by the Attorney-General. It should not be inferred from that that I think we ought to sell our railways. Certainly not. As population increases, unquestionably our railways will become a property of very great value, and we have no right to part with what, we may say, is, in this case, the unearned increment. We should keep that for ourselves; and the future of the colony will, no doubt, be very largely benefited by the increased value of the railways as population increases. But I have often thought, long before this Bill was brought in, that it might be well to consider whether we should not lease our railways for a term of years—say, five or ten years—and so entirely get rid of any political influence whatever. But perhaps we are not ripe for that. It is quite clear that this plan cannot, at present, be carried out; and therefore we are compelled to fall back on some other improvement. As we cannot reach what I conceive would be the best position for us to attain to, we must endeavour to make the next best thing out of this proposal of the Government to hand over the management of the railways to Commissioners. We are not bound to go to England for these Commissioners. I do not know that the Government have pledged themselves to go to England for them. I think probably two of them—those at a thousand a year—could be selected in this colony, and that they would perform their duties satisfactorily to all concerned, except to those who are continually seeking to diminish the income derived from the railways, and who seek to cut down the charges for particular classes of produce in which they happen to be interested. The Commissioners would be free; they would not be subject to the pressure to which Ministers undoubtedly are at present subjected when deputations of members of the House wait upon them. I think we may go through every article produced in the colony and show that one time or another a deputation of members of the House have gone to the Minister and endeavoured, indirectly, to coerce him into reducing the charges on particular articles in which their constituents were specially interested. It is clear that the surplus income has been gradually going down, down, down, for the last eight or ten years, and unless we alter matters it will vanish altogether. We have got down to something like 2½ per cent. now. Not a long time ago we were told, on the very best authority, that a concession had been made in one part of the country to the extent of £75,000 a year; and the effect is that the taxpayers over the whole of the colony have to pay £75,000 a year more than they ought to do, and did previous to this concession being made. There are large districts in New Zealand which really have no very direct benefit from the railways at all, and are so situated that their produce, whatever it may be, never goes by railway; and if we were to carry the matter out to an extremity I think we could find some districts which are actually injured by the railway bringing produce from other districts into competition with the produce of the districts I refer to, thus lowering the prices. I do not say that we should stay our progress in opening up the country for that, but I do say that we ought not to carry on our operations at a loss to the community at large for the sake of benefiting some particular districts; and that is what we have been doing from the day the first piece of Government railway was opened. Although I cannot go fully with the Hon. the Attorney-General in his approval of this Bill, yet I say it goes as far, perhaps, as we can advance at the present time in the direction of getting rid of political pressure. Our railways and public works, I believe, have cost us as large a sum as fifteen millions, and continual pressure has been brought upon the Government, with the result that the income from these lines has been gradually reduced. People talk nonsense about not making our railways taxing-machines. Why, they are that now. It is these taxing-machines which have brought us into our present state of difficulty, and reduced us to cutting down other establishments of every kind, inflicting a large amount of hardship, and, to a large extent, damaging the credit of the colony. I say, let these lines bear their own weight. Whether it be by leasing the lines, or reducing the pressure by the appointment of these Commissioners, I say it is our duty to go as far as we reasonably can in the direction of making our railway system bear its own weight of interest. After that I do not say that we should make them mere taxing-machines. I do not say that it would be wise to make large profits out of them in abatement of taxation; but, certainly, those who get the direct benefit of the railways, either as passengers or as senders of produce and merchandise, ought to be content to pay a reasonable amount, and not use their influence with members of this House to force Ministers to bring down the charges to a point which will not yield a fair return for the services rendered. Taking the Bill into consideration on broad, general principles, it appears to me that we cannot do better than pass it as soon as we can.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—I think the Bill

the Hon. the Attorney-General has presented to us is a Bill which, if honourable members approve the principle of, they may safely pass without altering. The Hon. Mr. Reynolds says this Bill was hurried through the other House without consideration. Probably that accounts for the perfectness of the measure, because the tinkering which a Bill goes through in passing through Committees, and the want of proper supervision after, to put it into order, is the cause of so many stupid measures appearing on our Statute Book—measures which give work for members of the legal fraternity. With regard to this Bill, I may say that I have not seen a measure so clear and so distinct all through presented to the Council this session. It is evidence of care such as very rarely appears on the face of Bills which come into this House, and whoever is the author of it is to be highly complimented on the result of his work. With regard to the management of our railways in the past, so far as the officers are concerned, I venture to say that there has been as able and good administration in the Railway Department as you will find pretty well anywhere. There are able men among those officers, but probably they do not always get a chance of showing what is in them; they do not get a chance of coming to the surface. The Government may have great difficulty in selecting the Commissioners, because a great deal will depend on judicious management to begin with, as to how far this departure will be a success. In selecting the men the Government will have to face this difficulty: They will have to put themselves into the hands of certain people, men, no doubt, well able and willing to do the best they can, but who have themselves to depend on the recommendation of others; and, though that recommendation may come from men of high standing, the result is not always satisfactory. These men sometimes allow their feelings to come into play, so that their recommendations are not always made with that sense of responsibility which ought to be felt by men in their position. No matter how good the gentlemen may be who have to select these officers, the result is sometimes a disappointment. In Victoria they have hit upon a gentleman who is not only a good administrator, but apparently a man of great ability. We have seen him come into contact with difficulties in connection with the railways there, and we see what a judicious man he is in getting over those difficulties. Many men can carry reforms into operation, and they do so in such a manner that nobody takes much notice of the change—in fact, the people quite agree with the reforms. Another man, however, may try to effect the same reforms, but he goes the wrong way about it, and sets everybody by the ears. It is purely a matter of the judiciousness of the man you have to administer the thing whether it will be a success or not. The Government have to face that difficulty, and no doubt they will take the greatest care in selecting the men, knowing that the success of the departure entirely depends on the men who may be selected. It is said that the proposed salary of the Chief Commissioner, £1,500, is not sufficient. Probably it would have been better to have put a rather larger sum in the Bill; but the effect is patent that, whatever amount is put into the Bill, it will have to be paid. It is not always a large salary which commands the best men; and, besides, the best men do not always look upon money as the great end at which they aim. A man has got a liking for his profession, and he is more interested in the success of his management than he is in seeking for a large salary, although, no doubt, it is always advisable to give a man a good salary, in order to keep up his position. Sometimes a man saves more when he is receiving only £150 a year than he does when he is in a position where he gets £1,000 a year. I have had experience of that myself. When I was a young fellow I saved more money than I did when my income was £1,000 a year; so I speak from personal experience. You may not be extravagant, but you have to increase your expenditure in consequence of your higher position. It is sought to contrast our railways with the success of the Victorian and New South Wales lines. I would wish to put on record, for the sake of those who may come after, that I do not believe the same success can be got as to our New Zealand railways as has been got with the Victorian railways; and when the Commissioners come here they may be blamed for not making that amount of interest out of the railways which has been made in Victoria. The railways here have to compete against water-carriage, which is a very severe competition. The railways in Victoria run into the interior, and have no competition of this sort; so it is impossible, no matter how well our railways may be managed, to get the same results from our lines as they get from the Victorian lines. There are too many centres of population in this colony, and there is too much local jealousy. An instance of this may be seen in the fact of one honourable member wanting two Railway Boards. This local jealousy is the curse of the whole government of New Zealand, and it is that which makes it so difficult to conduct our affairs satisfactorily. If Christchurch gets a thing, Dunedin, Wellington, and Auckland must have the same thing, whether they require it or not. We ought to look to the prosperity of New Zealand as a whole, and recognise that the prosperity of one place means, before long, the prosperity of other places. The Hon. Mr. Shephard hit a very good point. The people in this colony think that they should get the use of the railways for nothing; especially so do my friends in Canterbury. They have always held that without any disguise, and they ask for differential rates on account of the easy work of their railways and the even country over which their lines run. There are parts of the country too which derive no benefit from the railways, as has been pointed out by the Hon. Mr. Shephard; and those people who never get any use of the railways at all are being taxed to give cheap railway-carriage to those who do enjoy the railways. That is the more reason, I think, why the Commissioners should be appointed to see that the railways stand on their own bottom. We have seen instances of political pressure brought to bear on the Government, such, for instance, as allowing school-children to travel free. Perhaps the Minister acquiesces in the representations made to him, and this notwithstanding the advice of the railway officers; and probably the result may be a loss of £5,000 or £6,000 or £7,000 to the revenue. There have been cases where railway-rates have been reduced, resulting in large amounts being knocked off the railway revenue, and this has been owing to political pressure. I believe that this falling-off of revenue has been consequent on political pressure brought to bear on Ministers in connection with the management of the railways. Then, Sir, there is the question of liability for accident, brought forward by the Hon. the Attorney-General. This is, no doubt, the result of these demands for large compensation which have recently been made in another colony against the Railway Boards. But I think some limit should be placed on the amount of compensation, as in the case of ships, which the honourable gentleman referred to, where the compensation is limited to £15 per ton. I think some way should be thought out in which a limit should be put to these claims for damages sustained by accident on the railways. And some attention should be given to this before the Bill is summarily put through Committee. I admit it is difficult to propound any scheme in connection with it, because, if you take the law as it applies to ships and apply it to the railway-carriages, these would not afford a great deal of profit for compensation. I think the principle of the Bill will be accepted now, because the country has been brought round to the idea that it is a right thing to do. I believe the parties to be appointed will have many difficulties before them, and they will require to be judicious men, and capable of working up the scheme prudently. If we intend to adopt the principle of the Bill, the Bill itself, so far as I can see, is about as perfect as, in my humble opinion, it could be made.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK.—I wish to say that I approve of the principle of this Bill. I could have wished that the Government had brought it forward in the earlier part of the session, so that it might have been more fully considered. My opinion is that, if we do not pass the Bill now, there will be much difficulty in passing it afterwards, and we should not be able then to have a proper arrangement of the railways. I think the sooner we get it passed the better. The Government has done well to pass so many important Bills at the beginning of Parliament. In reference to what the Hon. Mr. Reynolds has said about my opinion with regard to the appointment of two Boards, I say that his belief that I should vote in favour of establishing two Boards is a mistaken one. I should not agree with two Boards. I think the same conditions should exist in the management of the whole of the railways in the colony, and two systems obtaining in the two Islands should not be permitted. I am in favour of passing the Bill as a whole without any alteration. There is one portion, though, with which I do not agree, and that is clause 70. I do not agree with the principle that the employes should have power to appeal provided by law, as I believe it would cause a great deal of trouble. I have had something to do with the management of railways—perhaps have had more power than any Minister—and I believe this appeal should not be established by law; but it should be left open to the Commissioners to hear an appeal if they like, which they certainly would do, as an ordinary employer of labour would. If the appeal is established by law we shall be no better off than we are now.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—Sir, the necessity for this Bill may be seen in the difference which exists between the wages ordinarily paid to railway employes and to ordinary labourers. I say you can easily get in the colony a class of labour such as you are now employing at a reduction of 1s. a day; and that, all over the colony, would amount to a saving which I should not like to name.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN.—£25,000.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE.—I think it would be vastly more than £25,000. Most of these labourers are housed. It is well known that no Government has dared to reduce the rate of wages of the railway labourers. At the present time the colony is ruled by schoolmasters and railway labourers; and, if anything, the latter are the more meritorious class, because they contribute to production, which helps to pay our debt. We are labouring from morning till night to pay schoolmasters and railway labourers. We hear of the difficulty of getting a competent man to take the position of Chief Commissioner at £1,500 a year. But that is the sum we pay for a Judge of the Supreme Court, in whose hands lies the judgment of important questions—questions of property, of life and death. One thousand five hundred is a magnificent sum, and I trust the Government will take care not to demoralise the Railway Department by neglecting to pick from it, in the colony, a man to perform the work. There would be no difficulty in obtaining such a man. The only wonder is that under the old system the Government were able to get a man fit for anything at all. I say the position of men like Mr. Maxwell is intolerable; and had it not been for his integrity—and that is the basis of the whole thing, for no man except he is honest will act wilfully to his own disadvantage by provoking the wrath of the Press in the interest of the colony—he would not have become a mark for censure. Mr. Maxwell's integrity of character brought him into prominence. There is no doubt about it, he has immense backbone; and I say this: that I am quite certain Mr. Maxwell could manage the railway business of this colony most efficiently if allowed. And he is not the only one—there are several; and I do sincerely hope that the Government will not neglect these and send to Great Britain to pick out a well-dressed engineer, and bring him, a mere stranger, to a new country, and expect him to deal with difficulties the character of which he has no conception of. He may be an excellent man in Great Britain, where all business works smoothly. No man in the colony exhibits greater capacity for detail, greater staying-power, than this Mr. Maxwell. I do hope the Government will not fail to recognise the merit of those we have among us. I should like to know what a Commission of this kind would have said to the purchase of the district railways. The Commission would have insisted that the companies should have put down decent sleepers and renewed the rails before foisting such wrecks upon us. I hold that railways, whilst encouraging the production of the country, should not necessarily be called upon to pay the whole interest on their construction. There ought to be differential rates, but they ought to exist in the direction of fostering production for the ultimate benefit of the country, and not of fostering districts whose prosperity needs no culture. There are many districts in this colony which, assisted by differential rates, might do a great deal towards production; but nothing is more patent than the fact that we have grossly mismanaged our railways in the interest of political faction, and nothing can be plainer than the fact that we cannot go on in the way we are going on now. I am thoroughly in favour of this measure. I think it is the most useful measure ever introduced into the Legislature during the last seventeen years.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—I wish to express my views with reference to this Bill which has been brought forward by the Government. I believe that the change of management will add to the profits of the department at least 50 per cent. It has done a great deal more than that in Victoria. When the railways there were managed in a similar manner to those in New Zealand, the dividend was £2 5s. per cent.: now it is £4 5s. per cent., which is nearly double; and I believe a similar result would be the outcome of this change. I was standing at a station some time ago, and a merchant came up and said, "Just look at that! there are double the number of men at work who should be there." One of our politicians was present, and he shook his head at him, as much as to say, "Keep it dark." I say there are a great many men employed in the department more than are necessary. I am convinced that that is the case; and, if fewer were employed, the railways would pay better. I believe it would be well if the Hon. the Attorney-General would take this matter into his consideration. With regard to compensation for accidents, I think no person should be allowed to claim more than according to his salary. If a man had £300 a year he ought not to be allowed to claim more than five years' salary. I think I saw one claim in another colony for £29,000. It was the case of a bank manager. We should limit these claims to a reasonable extent. The idea of withdrawing from the hands of the Licensing Committees the licensing of refreshment-rooms at the stations is a good one. I think the licensing ought all to be in the hands of the Commissioners. However, as this is a late period of the session, I will offer no further observations on the measure, except to express my thanks to the Hon. the Attorney-General for having brought in this measure, and for the manner in which it has been brought in.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON.—This is a Bill which I would like to say a few words about. I have been a Railway Commissioner myself once, in the Auckland District, and the abuses we discovered in the management, if they had not been very serious, would have been very comical. However, we managed to put that right. The line was run by means of one of these imported men, who was then got rid of. And, in regard to this point, I agree with what has been said—that we should be able to find in the country a man for this appointment. If we imported a man he would know nothing of the railway servants of this colony, being a stranger. We have heard something of the disfranchising of railway employés; but I think we should take care how we act in regard to this proposal, and see that these Commissioners do not interfere in politics. With regard to the appointment of Commissioners, I think that a fair salary should be offered to them; that some inducement should be given to them to make the railways pay—the salary should be increased more and more in proportion as they make profits. There are one or two clauses in the Bill which I do not agree with. Allusion has been made to the licensing of refreshment-rooms at stations. I think the railway authorities ought to have nothing to do with grog-selling at all; their hands should be clean, and that money should not go into the Treasury, but into the hands of the local Committees. Power is given in the Bill to the Commissioners to pay the employés for overtime; but the singular part of this is that it is proposed to pay overtime only to those who are constantly in the service. I hope this will be altered. In conclusion, I may say, on the whole, I like the Bill, and shall vote for it; but in respect to the matters which I have mentioned, I should like to see it altered.

PRAYERS.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

Major STEWARD asked the Government, Whether they will give directions that the recommendations contained in the report of the Printing Committee presented on the 13th instant be carried into effect?

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the Government had taken the recommendations in this report, together with the recommendations in reports received in the past, into consideration.

TAWHIAO.

Mr. TAIPUA asked the Government, What is the position of the lands formerly proposed to be given by the Crown to Tawhiao and other Natives who had taken part in the late war; and is the land still available for the above purpose? He wished to know what was the position of certain lands set apart by previous Governments in the Waikato. He had heard that it was proposed to set apart certain Crown lands for Tawhiao and other Natives in the Waikato. He should be very glad if the Government would explain the position in which these lands were, so that all doubt might be removed. It should be remembered that Tawhiao was not now in opposition to the Government, but was living under the law like all other Natives; and that the late war was not created by Tawhiao himself: he was not responsible for it; it was the action of the people. If this war had been his own individual act, then the Government should be suspicious of him, but as it was the act of the people generally there was no reason for apprehension; and, if the Government could see their way to treat his people with consideration, so much the better. Now, Te Kooti did a great deal more harm and caused much more suffering throughout the land; yet the Government had shown him some consideration, and had given him some land. Seeing that he caused and brought great evils upon the country, and that the Government in spite of that had given him some land, he thought Tawhiao was much more entitled to consideration. This House had passed an Act called an Amnesty Act, pardoning all political offences that had been committed by the rebel Natives, and he hoped the Government would show some kindness to Tawhiao.

Mr. MITCHELSON said some area of land had been set apart for the Natives who had taken part in the rebellion in the Waikato war; but the Waikato Confiscated Lands Act, under which these lands were granted to the Natives, had long since expired, and the lands were now being otherwise dealt with. If Tawhiao and the Natives who were connected with him would make special application to the Government their claims would be favourably considered.

Sir G. GREY wished to say it was with satisfaction he heard this statement made, and he trusted that no delay would be allowed to take place in carrying it out. The matter had been so long delayed that if the honourable gentleman could at once do it he would confer a very great boon upon the Natives and upon the whole country.

COLONIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. JOYCE asked the Government, If they have received a report from Sir William Fitzherbert, K.C.M.G., of his attendance, as a representative of this colony, at the Colonial Conference held in London in May last, or any recommendations from him, as the result of such visit to Europe, in the direction of postal reforms and reciprocal-tariff treaties with foreign nations?

Mr. FISHER replied that the Government had not received any such report.

Mr. JOYCE thought that this question was of such importance to the colonists that he would move the adjournment of the House, in order to place on record some reliable information relating to the efforts of the representatives of New Zealand at the Colonial Conference to further the best interests of this colony. A noticeable instance of an English statesman's opinion of and esteem for Sir William Fitzherbert might be found in a letter in the London Times of the 28th July last. Three extracts therefrom, which he would read, indicated that great benefits would flow sooner or later to this and the sister colonies as the outcome of the Colonial Conference:—

“But some things were said which I hope the public will take note of. Sir William Fitzherbert, the representative of New Zealand, whose name will never be mentioned without drawing forth a tribute of respect, supported the contention that, at all events, an ocean penny post, entirely by sea, is practically applicable to the British Empire. Here is a passage from what he said:—

“The sixpenny per half-ounce charge at the present time amounts to about £1,800 per ton, about 40 cubic feet. Compare that with the ordinary rate of freight—say, £2 to £3 per ton measurement freight. Now, according to my calculations the demand upon a ship's cargo space to carry five or six times the present number of colonial letters would be scarcely appreciable; and, if so, even an extra freight per ton of letters would give an ample margin for a reasonable return in respect of ship's freight. If this be correct, the question of subsidies falls to the ground—that is, as a charge upon postal revenue and postal service.”

“Sir William Fitzherbert went on to point out that, so far as regularity and speed are concerned, the steamers which would carry these all-sea mails leave nothing to be desired. Even after this, an attempt to burke the discussion was made by certain enemies of reform. One of them, the Agent-General for New South Wales, fell, however, into a very remarkable misreading of a fact bearing greatly upon the question. He said that the total number of letters posted in New South Wales for delivery within the colony in 1885 was 84,000,000, and for the Australian Colonies and New Zealand 1,750,000, making altogether about 86,000,000; while the foreign despatch of letters, including those to England, was only 793,000. Yet half the white population of Australia were born in England. That showed, he said, that the correspondence with England was very small indeed—leaving the impression that the connection is growing weaker, and that therefore the cheapening of postal communication between the Mother-country and the colonies is of no importance whatever. The topsy-turvy character of the Agent-General's argument was at once exposed by Sir William Fitzherbert. 'I was very much struck,' he said, 'with the observation that there were thirty millions of local letters and colonial letters as against something under a million letters to and from the Mother-country per annum. Instead of looking at that with satisfaction, added to the remark that there was growing up a population that did not know the Mother-country, I am influenced by that as one of the weightiest arguments that could be adduced in favour of quick and speedy and cheap communication between the Mother-country and the colonies, so that they may not be forgotten; and, in addition to that great advantage, I am quite sure that there would also be a very considerable stimulus given to the development of trade.'"

In one of about forty despatches sent by the Agent-General, Sir F. Dillon Bell, with the assent or approval of his colleague, Sir William Fitzherbert, to the Premier of New Zealand upon questions arising out of or that had been discussed at the Colonial Conference, would be found the following:—

"The discussions at the Conference relating to trade have been very animated, and the tendency of them all has been in the direction of a Protectionist policy.

"As regards the condition of the West Indies, Mauritius, Queensland, and the sugar-producing colonies generally, the bounty-system now in existence in France and Germany was naturally condemned in strong terms, opinions being freely expressed in favour of meeting foreign bounties by countervailing duties. Even Mr. Service, though speaking as a Free-trader, gave a general approval of this method, and, no other delegate having openly opposed it, the Secretary of State assumed, as he had a right to do, that the Conference was nearly unanimous in recommending Her Majesty's Government to adopt it. In point of fact, however, this unanimity did not actually exist, more than one delegate thinking that no scheme fundamentally opposed to the existing fiscal system of the United Kingdom could be discussed without bringing in the whole subject of Imperial Federation, which subject had been excluded from the deliberations of the Conference. Mr. Hofmeyer's proposal to create a general fund for Imperial defence by means of a 2-per-cent. duty levied upon the whole foreign trade of the Empire was certainly brought forward by him in a remarkably able speech, which elicited so much assent that the New Zealand delegates almost stood alone in deprecating interference by the Conference with the fiscal system of this country. We urged that the delegates had no instructions from their Governments to take such a course, that it must bring in the whole question of Imperial federation, and that, just as no colony would for a moment allow the Imperial Government to dictate its fiscal policy, so the House of Commons would equally resent any attempt at dictation on the part of the colonies for the reversal of a commercial system which has been so long in operation in the United Kingdom.

"We all advocated, instead, the expediency of extending to all colonies alike the privilege, enjoyed by Canada, of negotiating with foreign Powers in matters of trade."

He would ask the Government to endeavour to lay the despatches on the table as soon as possible.

Motion for adjournment of the House negatived.

SEACLIFF ASYLUM.

Mr. FISH asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether his attention has been drawn to a pamphlet issued by Mr. R. A. Lawson, architect, of Dunedin, containing copies of letters written by him to Mr. Blair, Engineer in Charge, Middle Island, under dates 23rd October, 1879, 18th January, 1880, 29th June, 1880, and 2nd February, 1886, relative to the foundations of the asylum at Seacliff; and, if so, will he explain why those letters were not answered, and why the advice given therein was not given effect to? He had placed this question on the Order Paper because it was well known down south, at any rate, that very serious complaints had recently been made with regard to the defective character of the building at Seacliff. It had been freely believed down there that, to a large extent, the slips had been caused through faulty architecture. The other day he was surprised to see published by the architect a series of letters which he addressed to the Engineer in Charge for the Middle Island, Mr. Blair, as far back as 1879, and before the building was commenced at all, pointing out that unless certain drainage-work was performed serious damage would be caused to the edifice. The architect based his statement on the fact that, in the case of the temporary building previously erected, slips had occurred, and that certain drainage-works had saved that temporary building from further injury. Yet, in the face of these letters, which were never answered, the building was allowed to go up, and now they found that the slips which the architect predicted had taken place. He might say that the object of this question was to show the public at large that, so far as the architect was concerned, no blame was to be attached to him, and it would remove the opprobrium cast upon an innocent person. He thought that the Minister for Public Works should explain why those letters were not answered, and why the suggestion made by the architect had not been carried out. He (Mr.

Mr. Joyce

Fish) understood it was the intention of the Minister to institute inquiry into this matter; and, although the result might prove that the foundations were defective and not in accordance with the specifications—and, if so, he hoped the contractor would be punished—still it would be shown that the slips were caused through the drainage-works which the architect recommended not having been carried out.

Mr. MITCHELSON said his attention had been called to the pamphlet issued by the architect. He could not explain why the letters contained in that pamphlet had not been answered; but he understood from the department that all letters written by the architect to the department that required answering were replied to, and the whole of the drainage-work suggested by the architect was carried out: in fact, a good deal more work was done than Mr. Lawson recommended. The erection of the building was altogether under his supervision, and the drawings of the engineer sent down to report on the building showed very clearly that the specifications had not been carried out. He had the plans in front of him, and any honourable member might see that there was a very large discrepancy throughout the whole of the foundations. It was his intention to cause an inquiry to be made, and, if it was found that the contractor was legally liable to make the work good, the Government would take action. The stability of the building was endangered by the foundations having been laid so badly. An inquiry would be made at once, in order to see who was to blame for what had happened to the building.

Mr. FISH said, if the department had answered the letters referred to from Mr. Lawson, there must be a record in the books of the department to show it.

SEALING.

Mr. PARATA asked the Minister of Marine, Whether the Government will alter the sealing regulations, and allow next season to be opened? Telegrams had been received from Invercargill stating that two vessels had started away seal-fishing. Now, that was clearly illegal, and he thought it was wrong that it should be allowed. The sealing industry was one in which the Natives were deeply interested, but owing to the present law they were not allowed to pursue that industry. He had always objected to the Natives being precluded from sealing, because that was their hereditary right. In former times the Natives never sealed out of season; they always waited a fixed time. Since the Europeans passed laws regulating the sealing, they had seen that the people who made these laws were the first to break them. It was evident that something further should be done in the matter, and he asked the Government to take it into consideration, and bring in the necessary legislation on the subject. He hoped the Government would take the necessary steps before the season opened.

Mr. FISHER said the Government were aware, as the honourable member stated, that two vessels had started, presumably, for poaching purposes, and the Government would take whatever steps might be necessary to prevent poaching. They regarded the sealing industry as of the highest value to New Zealand, and whatever steps were necessary to prevent poaching would be adopted. The "Stella" was leaving that day, and instructions would be given to keep a look-out for the vessels in question. The honourable gentleman might rely upon it that every precaution would be taken by the Government in the matter.

NORTH AUCKLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. R. THOMPSON asked the Minister for Public Works, If the Government will have any objection to bring down a Bill next session authorising the construction of the North Auckland Railway on the land-grant principle? His reason for putting this question was owing to the very small amount which was placed on the public-works estimates for the extension of this railway. The amount was altogether out of proportion to the necessity for pushing on this work, and it was a matter of the utmost importance to that part of the colony that the line should be pushed on as quickly as possible. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would bring down a Bill authorising the construction of the line on the land-grant principle.

Major ATKINSON said he could not give the honourable gentleman any distinct pledge on the subject, because the matter had not yet been considered by the Government. It would be very carefully considered during the recess.

WAKAPUAKA LARRIKINISM.

Mr. SEYMOUR asked the Minister of Justice, If he will cause a further investigation to be made into a case of larrikinism which occurred about June last in the Wakapuaka District, when it is alleged that wires were stretched across a public road and a bridge damaged, and that the case, when brought before the Resident Magistrate, Nelson, was dismissed without inquiry? Upon a complaint being lodged, the police took up the case. When the case came on for hearing in the Resident Magistrate's Court the Chairman of the Road Board declined to press it if the damage done to the bridge were paid for. That was done, and the police withdrew the information, and the Resident Magistrate dismissed the case. Thereupon twenty-seven inhabitants of the district petitioned the Minister of Justice to have an inquiry made into it. That petition was forwarded to the Police Department, and the following answer was received by the petitioners:—

"Police Department, Wellington,
"1st September, 1887.

"GENTLEMEN,—In reply to your petition of the 24th June last, addressed to the Hon. the Minister of Justice, and praying that an inquiry should be held on a gross case of lawlessness, I am directed by the Hon. the Minister of Defence to reply on behalf of the Police Department.

"Inquiries have been made in the case reported by you, and a copy of the information forwarded to me. I can find no fault with it. It is laid generally for injury done to a bridge, but does not specify any particular Act or section as having been contravened. This, however, is not necessary, and so far the police have done their duty. The question then remains, Ought they to have allowed the prosecution to be withdrawn? On this point Inspector Atcheson reports that, after proceedings were instituted by him, and before summonses were served, Mr. Pitt, solicitor for the accused, waited on Mr. Curtis, R.M., and produced a letter from the Chairman of the Suburban North Road Board, which stated that the Board had no desire to prosecute provided the damages were paid for. Hereupon the Resident Magistrate allowed the information to be withdrawn, and indorsed his decision on the back. The question whether it was right or advisable on the part of the Resident Magistrate to do this has nothing to do with me, for he belongs to another department; but the police, after the action of the Resident Magistrate, and letter from the Road Board, had obviously no grounds for further proceedings in the matter, and are not responsible for any failure of justice which may or may not have occurred.—I have, &c.,

"W. C. GUDGEON,
"Commissioner of Police."

The petitioners were dissatisfied with the answer, because it did not take up the question of why the Magistrate dismissed the case; so they wrote a letter to the honourable member for Motueka, stating all the particulars of the case. That honourable gentleman passed it on to him as member for the district, and he, on application, was permitted to go to the office and examine the papers. He had arranged with the Under-Secretary that the case should be looked into, and a letter sent to the petitioners, which was to this effect:—

"Department of Justice,
Wellington, 21st November, 1887.

"SIR,—Referring to previous correspondence on the subject of the damage done to a bridge on the Wakapuaka Road, I am directed by the Minister of Justice to inform you that, as the result of inquiries made, he has ascertained that the Resident Magistrate acted in accordance with his usual practice, which is to allow an information to be withdrawn at the request of the aggrieved parties when the charge is not of a serious nature, and that, under these circumstances, the Government does not propose to interfere in the matter.—I have, &c., "C. J. A. HASelden,

"Under-Secretary."

"C. H. Martin, Esq.,
"Wakapuaka, Nelson."

He need hardly say that that answer was quite as unsatisfactory to the petitioners as the answer from the Police Department had been, especially in the statement that the charge was not of a serious nature, because the petitioners thought it was an exceedingly serious offence to stretch wires across a road, and also to damage a bridge. He hoped the Minister would have the matter further investigated, so that the petitioners might learn what were the real causes of the case being, as they considered, hushed up.

Mr. FERGUS said the department had made inquiries into the matter, and there seemed to be a good deal of conflicting evidence. It seemed that both the police and the Resident Magistrate were quite justified in the action they took, as the Chairman of the Road Board declined to press the charge against the boys, on condition that the damage should be repaired by their parents. But he would cause further inquiries to be made into the matter, and would inform the honourable gentleman of the result later on.

J. VOAKES.

Mr. MOAT asked the Minister of Lands, Whether it is his intention to take any action on the recommendation of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of John Voakes, in the direction of compensating him for the loss of his land, improperly sold by the Crown?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said there was no recommendation from the Committee, the petition being merely referred to the Government for consideration. The correspondence showed that Mr. Voakes had neglected to take the ordinary precaution of having his section defined on the plan. The selection was made in October, 1867, and he was then informed that the land would have to be surveyed at his cost. On the 8th April, 1884, he was again similarly informed, and again on the 7th May in the same year; but all these intimations were ignored by Mr. Voakes. As a matter of fact Mr. Voakes had been informed that he would be allowed to make another selection from the Crown lands in the locality; but he said he did not want land, as he was too old to make any use of it. The Commissioner of Crown Lands reported that there was a large quantity of Crown lands there from which Mr. Voakes could make a selection equally good with the first.

STATE FORESTS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MOAT asked the Government, Whether, as commonly reported, it is their intention to abolish the State Forests Department; and, if so, do they intend to take the same precautionary measures to preserve kauri forests from fire as were so successfully adopted by that department last summer; also whether they intend to take steps to preserve the young forest plantations, or to extend them? There had been a report in circulation that it was the intention of the Government to abolish the Forest Department, and he noticed there was no provision on the estimates for its continuance. He thought the report of the department, and the returns laid on the table a few days ago, showed that its operations during the past year had been very satisfactory. He thought it would be a great pity if the same course were adopted now as was adopted when the Act about Native forests was in force—it would be most regrettable if this department were abolished without anything to provide for forest conservation being put in its place. He hoped the Government would not entirely abolish the department; or, if they did, that they would substitute something else.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON regretted to inform the honourable gentleman that it was the intention of the Government to abolish the State Forests Department altogether. With regard to the conservation of forests, the best possible precautionary measures to prevent danger from fire would be taken; and, as to the young forest-trees planted, the Government would retain one nurseryman to take charge of them. But no further planting would be undertaken at present.

CHATHAM ISLANDS REPRESENTATION.

Mr. MCGREGOR asked the Government, If they will bring under the notice of the Representation Commissioners the fact that the Chatham Islands are at present practically unrepresented, and if steps will be taken to join them to some electorate?

Mr. HISLOP said this matter was under the consideration of the Government, and he would inform the honourable gentleman, at a later period, of any decision come to.

Major ATKINSON suggested that possibly the honourable gentleman might like the district to be added to his own electorate.

PROBATES.

Mr. VALENTINE asked the Colonial Secretary, Whether he will consider the advisability of adapting to the law in New Zealand the provisions of section 33 of 44 Vict., c. 12, relative to probates, so as to lessen the cost to the public? By the Imperial law it was only necessary for any one applying for probate of a will where the personal estate did not exceed £300 to go to an officer of the Court, or to an officer of the Inland Revenue, and deposit 15s., which covered the whole of the Court fees, and £1 10s. for stamp-duty, making, altogether, £2 5s.; whereas in this country it cost about £20, including solicitor's fees. It was necessary here to go to the Supreme Court; and he had heard on very good authority that the cost was seldom under £20. Now, this was a very great hardship on poor people—particularly widows and orphans, whose all was some small sum they had been left; and he hoped the Colonial Secretary would give some assurance that next session he would bring down a Bill to make the law more like what it was in England.

Mr. HISLOP thought the honourable gentleman had rather exaggerated the cost of administration in this country; but he would be very glad to consider whether provision could be made in the Administration Act which it was intended to introduce next year to make the procedure cheaper.

Mr. VALENTINE feared that, instead of exaggerating, he had really greatly understated the usual cost, because he had it on the best authority in the House only the previous day that in one case, very recently, as much as £40 was charged by a solicitor where the estate was under £100. That was an absolute fact. He only wished this amendment to apply to personal estate, and not to real estate.

W. HARPER.

Mr. ORMOND asked the Government, Whether they will consider the case of William Harper, a lineman, who was injured and incapacitated while on Government duty, and continues unable to earn a livelihood for his family? He had fallen from a pole while on duty, and had injured his spine. He had been incapacitated ever since, but for three years he received some small sum from the Government—about £25 a year, he (Mr. Ormond) believed—and then received a letter saying that he had no further claim on the Government. He thought the man had some claim, and he hoped the Government would consider the case, as Harper was in very poor circumstances, and had a family to provide for.

Major ATKINSON said this was one of those unfortunate cases that the Government really hardly knew how to deal with. He understood the man had been only temporarily in the Government employment—not permanently. On meeting with this accident, owing to its being so severe a case the Government had exceeded its authority, and had made some allowance to him. He would consider the case, and see if anything further could be done; but the honourable gentleman knew there was great difficulty in dealing with cases of this sort if the Government once went outside the ordinary regulations. It was one of those unfortunate cases which no one could help feeling compassion for, and he would see if something could be done.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCILLORS.

Mr. SAMUEL asked the Premier, — (1.) Whether the Government intend to continue to do nothing to ascertain whether there are gentlemen sitting as members of the Legislative Council and taking part in legislation in that Chamber whose seats have become vacant through being absent for two successive sessions without permission? (2.) Whether, in accordance with its present retrenchment policy, the Government intend to abstain from nominating the same or other gentlemen to seats in the Council to fill the seats that may have become vacant through the absence of Councillors for two successive sessions of the General Assembly without permission? (3.) Whether the Government will consider the expediency of making some better provision than now exists for the trial of the question whether seats in the Legislative Council have or have not become vacant? It was necessary to make some explanation of the circumstances which led to his putting this question. Nearly every lawyer, to keep himself well up in his business, subscribed to some one or more of the English law-reports, and noted up cases in his text-books. In doing this he (Mr. Samuel) came across the case of The Attorney-General of Queensland versus Gibbon, in which it had been decided by the Privy Council that, under the Queensland Constitution Act, if a Councillor was absent for two successive sessions, although he had permission to be absent for one, his seat was vacated. It had seemed to him that, the New Zealand Constitution Act being similar to that of Queensland, possibly some of the Legislative Councillors in New Zealand might have made the same mistake as had been made in Queensland; and therefore when he came to Wellington this session he began to search the Journals of the Legislative Council to see if it had been so. He quickly found that one honourable gentleman had made that mistake, and he was thinking of speaking to that gentleman personally on the subject, when it occurred to him that by going further back in the records he might find other cases, because, if the seat of the honourable gentleman to whom he had referred had been vacated in this manner, unless a reappointment had been made no subsequent sitting would avert the penalty. He did so, and found that several others were in the same position. Under these circumstances he felt some doubt as to how to act. If there had been only one or two cases and he had been sure as to the number, he would probably have spoken to the gentlemen affected; but, finding that there were several—and possibly there might be some more whose names he had not discovered—he thought it might be putting those gentlemen to whom he would have spoken in a false position if he were to do so. He had therefore spoken to the chief legal member of the Government, the Hon. the Attorney-General, confidentially, mentioning the case and asking his view on it. After consideration of the case, the Hon. the Attorney-General differed from him as to the reading of the decision of the Privy Council; and, under these circumstances, the honourable gentleman thought it would be unnecessary to enter into any examination of the facts which he (Mr. Samuel) laid before him, and respecting which he had some doubt—the doubt being as to the absence of the gentlemen—because, not being able personally to obtain information from the officers of the Council, he thought it possible he might have overlooked entries in the Journals which would prove his information to be incorrect. Under these circumstances, however, seeing that the Hon. the Attorney-General did not agree with him, and did not think it necessary to make any search, he thought, before silencing his own opinion, that it was his duty to make a statement to the House, which was the proper medium of communication of every honourable member, and he therefore made this statement of the facts as far as he could ascertain them. It seemed to him that the question was of very great importance indeed. If these gentlemen, who had been members of the Legislative Council, had ceased to be members, and still, after their attention had been called to the fact, continued to sit in the other branch of the Legislature and to take part in the business as if they were Councillors, then the principle which went to the foundation of our

form of legislation, that Acts were to be passed by the majority, did not apply, because it was quite possible that a minority, an actual minority, of the Legislative Councillors who had a right to sit in that Chamber might pass legislation as against the majority. Therefore it appeared to him to be a question which the House as well as the other branch of the Legislature should entertain and consider. Then, subsequently, he found that he had made a mistake as to the Councillors named; but, in discovering that mistake, he found that another gentleman had, as he believed, vacated his seat—namely, the Hon. the Attorney-General himself; and that fact added greatly to the importance of what he had brought under the notice of the Government, and showed that the matter still more urgently required consideration. As to the first part of the question he had put to the Government, the Premier had already given him an answer, to the effect that the matter was under the consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown. No doubt this question required very careful consideration, and ought to be referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, who would no doubt have all the information placed before them, and give advice upon the facts. So far, he was satisfied with the intimation the Premier had given him, and he had no doubt that the House would likewise be satisfied. As to the second part of his question, that was not put on the Order Paper with any wish to insinuate that it was necessary that none of those gentlemen should be reappointed; but an Act had been passed for the purpose of reducing the number of members of the House of Representatives upon the cry for retrenchment, and that cry was equally strong for retrenchment in another place. Therefore it seemed to him that the Government should carefully consider, if an opportunity occurred, whether it would be consistent with their duty to reappoint the whole of those gentlemen if it turned out that they had vacated their seats. With regard to the last question, the mode of dealing with this question prescribed by the Constitution Act was, to his mind, a very ineffective one. It was this: that a Committee should be appointed by the Legislative Council, to whom should be referred the question in dispute, and who should report to the Legislative Council, and by their report the Legislative Council, whether they adopted it or negatived it, were to be guided to a great extent. If it were the case that the Legislative Council contained a number of experienced lawyers, say, five, who might be supposed to be capable of dealing efficiently with such a point as this, it might be very convenient to follow such a course as that prescribed by the Constitution Act; but it was not the practice here to allow two or more of the Judges of the Supreme Court to hold seats in the Legislative Council; and, ordinarily, that Chamber did not contain a sufficient number of gentlemen possessing a legal training to enable it to satisfactorily deal with the question. If there were provision for such questions being sent to the Court of Appeal it would greatly simplify matters. He might say that so certain did he feel of the soundness of the opinion he had ventured to express of the law in this case that he should be quite willing to be a party to instituting a suit in the Court of Appeal on the terms that, if he proved to be mistaken, he should be called upon to pay the entire costs. He was confident enough of the soundness of his opinion to say that; and he should like to add—

Mr. SPEAKER thought the honourable gentleman was exceeding the limit of speech permitted in the case of asking a question.

Mr. SAMUEL said he only wished to add that he had been actuated, in bringing this matter forward, only by a desire to promote the public interest; and, if he had been ill-advised as to the method of bringing it forward, he could say that he had no desire to give pain to any of the honourable gentlemen who had been referred to. He had acted with the best intentions, and if he had adopted an improper method he could only express regret; for he had no desire to annoy any of the gentlemen he had referred to, nor did he think that he had done so, for he had been in conversation with most of them, and had no reason to believe that their feelings were hurt by anything that he had said.

Major ATKINSON must say that he was surprised, that so accurate a man, so good a lawyer, as the honourable member for New Plymouth, should have propounded such extraordinary questions; and he was still more surprised that the honourable gentleman should have made the statements he had made. The honourable gentleman would not expect him to do more than shortly answer his question. To the first he would answer No; to the second he would reply that he would consider the case if it arose; and, as to the third, that it was under the consideration of the Government.

KAIKORA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. TANNER asked the Postmaster-General, If, when the present contracts expire, the Postal Department will institute a mail service three times a week between Kaikora and Taumumu and Kaikora and Patangata, instead of twice a week as at present?

Major ATKINSON replied that when the present contract expired the Government would call for alternative tenders, and, if the cost of the change asked for were reasonable, it would be made.

MAORI DEEDS OF LAND-PURCHASE.

Sir G. GREY asked the Government, Whether the two volumes of Maori Deeds of Land-purchases in the North Island of New Zealand, published by authority in 1877-78, consist of copies of the deeds by which the Crown holds lands conveyed to Her Majesty by her subjects of the Maori race? What number of copies of this publication have been distributed, and how many remain in store? Will the Government cause copies to be distributed to public institutions and members of the General Assembly?

Major ATKINSON said these books had been printed. Of the first volume thirty-four had been issued, and of the second thirty. There were in store 966 copies of the first volume, and 970 of the second. The Government did not propose to issue them to the public, as it was thought that no good would follow from their distribution.

Sir G. GREY asked whether the Government would allow members of the House to obtain copies on application.

Major ATKINSON said he would consider that question, and reply in the course of a day or two.

WELLINGTON-PITONE LINE.

Mr. FITZHERBERT asked the Government, If they will introduce a Bill next session authorising the straightening of the railway-line between Wellington and Pitone by a syndicate or by private enterprise; all the area between the present road and the straightened railway-line to be reclaimed by and Crown-granted to the promoter or promoters of such works, in payment for the same, free of cost? In answering a question which he had put on the Order Paper the other day the Minister for Public Works had admitted the necessity of this particular work, but he regretted that, as the work would cost £25,000, he did not see his way to propose it. He (Mr. Fitzherbert) might say that there were along this line a number of small bays, which could be easily reclaimed, and would make very good business-sites; and he knew a gentleman who, in all probability, would straighten the line for the privilege of reclaiming and making use of these bays. Probably it would be a good thing for both parties. The gentleman referred to would make something out of his speculation, no doubt, and the Government would get their line straightened. He hoped that, as the Minister for Public Works could not see his way to spending £25,000, he would agree to have the work done in the manner he (Mr. Fitzherbert) had now suggested.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Government had no intention of introducing a Bill on this subject next session. At some future time it might be a matter for consideration.

OTAGO EDUCATION BOARD.

Mr. ROSS asked the Premier, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give effect to the recommendation of the Education Committee contained in the report on the petitions of A. C. Begg and Francis Wilkinson, praying for inquiry into alleged arbitrary proceedings on the part of the Otago Education Board in reference to the removal by the Board of the headmaster of the Kaikorai District School? The report of the Committee was as follows:—

“That the Committee is of opinion that the subject-matter of the petition is one which concerns only the administration of the Education Act under the powers conferred upon Education Boards and School Committees; and that, if the Education Board did not first consult the School Committees before dismissing the teacher as alleged, the provisions of clause 45 of the Act have not been strictly complied with. The Committee recommends—(1) That the Government should take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon the point raised, and transmit such opinion to the petitioners; (2) and, if the Act is not sufficiently clear as to the relative positions of the Boards and Committees, the Government should amend the Act; (3) that, as there seems to be considerable feeling in the locality on the subject of the petitions, special inquiry by the Resident Magistrate of Dunedin should be made into it."

Mr. FISHER said the Government, of its own motion, would not have interfered with any Education Board in regard to such a matter as this; but, acting upon the recommendation of an important Select Committee of the House, they had decided to instruct the Resident Magistrate of Dunedin to make an inquiry into the circumstances of this case.

VICTORIAN EXHIBITION.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Premier,—(1.) Does the Government intend to avail itself of the maximum space allotted New Zealand in the Victorian Exhibition building? (2.) Does the Government intend to ask Parliament to authorise any expenditure of public money in connection with the above Exhibition? (3.) Generally, what steps does the Government intend to take in reference to the said Exhibition; and, seeing the time for securing space expires on the 31st December, 1887, will the Government take the House into its confidence at an early date? As the time was getting limited, he thought the Government should at an early date make up their minds as to what steps they would take with regard to this matter, because would-be exhibitors would be glad to know what the intentions of the Government were. The House had been led generally to understand that the Government intended the colony to be represented; but it would like more detailed information as to what the Government intended to do—whether they intended that the colony should be represented by Commissioners, and so forth. He might say that he thought we should work with our neighbouring colony in this matter.

Mr. HISLOP said the amount of space to be applied for depended upon the results of inquiries which the Government were now making in various parts of the colony as to the accommodation that would be required by exhibitors. As had been intimated by the Premier, it was the intention of the Government to ask for a vote to secure the proper representation of the colony, and they would be prepared to state the amount when the supplementary estimates came down; but they had not yet determined whether the colony should be represented by Commissioners or not. The matter was still under the consideration of the Government, who would take the House into their confidence at as early a date as possible.

Mr. SEDDON asked that the statement should be made on the following Monday or Tuesday, at the latest.

COMPENSATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. GOLDIE asked the Minister of Lands, What action the Government propose to take to satisfy the claims of Thomas Thwaite, W. G. Garrard, J. D. Bentley, P. Hodge, and others for compensation for military service, whose petitions have been reported upon by the various Committees to whom they were committed?

Mr. FERGUS said, from the investigation of these claims, he was convinced that the demands made therein ought not to be complied with. These persons had no claim whatever. There were hundreds of better claims than these. Hodge was discharged as medically unfit, receiving a pension for two years. He was therefore not entitled to land, having served less than two years. Bentley's claim was still worse: he came to New Zealand not as a discharged soldier, but as one of the Waikato military settlers, and received eighty-one acres as such. He now applied for a grant as an old soldier.

EDUCATION.

Mr. BARRON asked the Minister of Education, Whether he will act on the recommendation contained in the report from the Select Committee on Education, so that no material change shall be effected in the present system of education, pending the result of further inquiry next session? He asked this question because the Minister would acknowledge that the subject was one of very great importance, and one in which the people of the colony took a great deal of interest. It was understood that circulars had been issued from the department in reference to the school-age, and he wished to know what changes were in contemplation. The report of the Select Committee, as the Minister would have seen, suggested that, owing to its vast importance, the inquiry could not be exhausted during the present session, and therefore the Committee recommended that no action should be taken till next session. He hoped the Minister would not act hastily in the matter. He thought it would be agreed that, although some persons might think that the education expenditure was somewhat excessive, still if there was any return which the people got for their taxation it was in regard to education.

Mr. FISHER said the question was, without doubt, an exceedingly important one. As his colleague the Premier and he himself had already stated on several occasions, the whole subject would be submitted to the decision of the House, and no changes of any kind would be made until a vote of the House had been taken. He might again explain that it was absolutely necessary to indicate the changes in the manner in which they had been indicated, in order to satisfy the universal demand for information in regard to the points regarding which changes were proposed. It was the desire of the Government to make clear to the numerous body of persons interested what were the intentions of the Government in regard to the subject, and that was why the circulars had been issued. The Government would take no step until the decision of the House had been taken.

HASTINGS RAILWAY-STATION.

Captain RUSSELL asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether he is aware that land has at last been taken for increasing the station-yard accommodation at Hastings, and the price settled by the Compensation Court; and whether he will cause such alterations being at once made as will prevent shunting across the main road?

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the cases in respect to the land required for the proposed extension of the Hastings Station had only been decided by the Court on the previous day. Plans had been drawn out for the work, which would cost some thousands of pounds to carry out completely; but now that the land had been acquired the matter could be gone into with a view to seeing if any immediate alteration was practicable.

EDUCATION RESERVES.

Mr. SMITH asked, without notice, what steps the Minister of Education intended to take in reference to an advertisement which appeared in that day's New Zealand Times, announcing for sale by auction a number of sections of the Alfredtown and Rangitumanu education reserves.

Mr. FISHER had to thank the honourable gentleman for calling his attention to the subject, as he had noticed the advertisement himself, and had intended to take action in the matter, but, owing to the press of business, it had escaped his attention for the time. He had communicated with the department to ascertain the circumstances of the case, and he would give the honourable member the desired information as soon as it was obtained.

FREE PASSES TO CHILDREN ATTENDING SCHOOL.

Mr. PEARSON asked the Minister for Public Works, Why the concession of free passes granted to children attending some schools should not be extended to all?

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the gazetted regulations provided that free school season-tickets should be issued only from stations where there was no primary school to the station in the vicinity of the nearest primary school. The question then arose that the regulation only affected children attending Government schools, and it was desired to make arrangements to meet the case of children who attended the Roman Catholic schools. The case under consideration was that of a girl who wished to have a ticket to travel a further distance, but was refused it, because the regulations did not provide for such a case. Whenever complaints were made of this character the Government always took them into their consideration.

EDUCATION.

Mr. IZARD asked if the Government would lay on the table the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the validity of the Order in Council lately made as to the school-age of children.

Mr. FISHER said the honourable gentleman must be aware that, if there was such an opinion, it would only be laid on the table by the order of Parliament.

POST AND TELEGRAPH OFFICE AT HUNTERVILLE.

Mr. BRUCE asked whether, in view of the very rapid increase in the population in the district surrounding Hunterville, the Government would take into consideration the advisability of erecting a post and telegraph office there.

Major ATKINSON requested the honourable member to write him a letter on the subject, and he would see into it at once. He did not intend to make any promise till then.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES asked the Premier when he would bring down the Midland Railway Bill and the agreement attached to the contract.

Major ATKINSON said the Government were negotiating with the company with regard to certain portions of the draft agreement passed by the House, and as soon as that was complete—which, he hoped, would be in a day or so—he would bring the Bill down. He would have brought the Bill down before if it had been possible.

SUPPLY.

IN COMMITTEE.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—PART I.

CLASS IX.—LIGHTHOUSES, HARBOUR-WORKS, AND HARBOUR DEFENCES.

Harbour defences, £80,000.

Mr. TURNBULL thought this vote should be postponed until after the Naval Defence Bill had been dealt with. If the colony was going to pay the English Government £22,000 a year, they should not spend any more money on harbour defences.

Mr. BRUCE asked if the vote, £80,000, was required for the completion of the works.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that was for this year only.

Mr. FISH said, if in passing this vote they committed the House to an expenditure of £50,000 next year, he would object to the vote.

Major ATKINSON said these works were only estimated to cost £900,000 when they were commenced, but already something like £450,000 had been spent. The Government regretted having to propose this vote, but it did not seem wise to stop these works, leaving them practically unfinished.

Mr. MITCHELSON said there was very little money now available. The reason why the liabilities amounted to so enormous a sum was that the late Government had entered into a large amount of expenditure which had not been authorised by Parliament.

Mr. FITZHERBERT understood from Major Boddam's report, laid on the table last session, that all that was required to complete these works was £25,000. He was surprised to see now that another £50,000 would be required in addition to this £30,000. Some of the guns which had been obtained were almost obsolete already; and even the guns of the newest pattern—he was informed on good authority—would become practically useless after firing a certain number of shots. The expenditure of money in that way was a matter which required grave consideration.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the total amount available for expenditure was £25,500, and that amount was necessary in order to complete works in hand. The present Government were not at all responsible for this expenditure.

Mr. TURNBULL said this expenditure was the result of the late war-scare. The late Government were not responsible. The people had hounded the Government on to the expenditure.

Mr. MOSS said it seemed to be generally argued that the defence-works had been a great blunder; but he did not hold that view. He was not an expert, and could not pretend to judge whether all the money had been wisely spent; but to blame the Government was, he thought, unfair. The Government were to be commended for the action they had taken. The colony was in an utterly helpless position before these works were undertaken. What could have been more humiliating than if a small cruiser had taken away as ransom perhaps more money than the whole cost of the defence-works? Except in case of deliberate invasion, which was very unlikely, the rifles and small cannon of our Volunteers would have been of little value. We were helpless against the attack of even the lightest cruiser. This was no longer the case. We could with our present cannon and torpedoes hope to make a fair show for the defence of our ports, and that was well worth all the cost of which so much was now being made.

Mr. MITCHELSON had no intention whatever of blaming the late Government for this expenditure, for he fully realised the fact that, whatever Government was in power at the time, it must have faced this difficulty. His only object was to show that the present Government were not responsible for the amount on the estimates, seeing that the whole amount was required to meet liabilities incurred by the late Government.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON would remind the House that the guns which were now alluded to as being obsolete were ordered in 1875, and, seeing how much artillery had been improved of late, it was not to be wondered at that they were obsolete. Still, they were very useful.

Dr. HODGKINSON asked whether it was the intention of the Government to spend the whole of the £130,000.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that the liabilities to the 30th November amounted to £104,000, and every penny of the £130,000 would be absolutely required.

Mr. VALENTINE did not agree with the honourable member for Parnell as to the advisability of undertaking all these works; but it was hardly the time now to cavil at the expenditure of a few thousand pounds for the completion of these works, particularly if the colony was going to join in the Australasian defence system. The fortifications would then be all the more necessary to assist the ships of Her Majesty's navy. He was only sorry that, instead of going on with these expensive works, the Government had not made an arrangement with the British Government for a more effectual naval defence. There was no doubt that many of the guns were becoming obsolete, and if an arrangement had been made with the British Government it would have insured a renewal of the guns from year to year.

Mr. MONK thought the amount was far larger than ought to be expended on defence purposes. The opinion outside the House was that the money had been wastefully expended, and that all except that which had been devoted to the torpedo service was absolutely thrown away. The impression left from reading the reports of modern military schools was that the defence of harbours would in the future depend much on the torpedo service. Years ago it might have been thought wise to place guns in such forts as we now had in the colony, where the first explosive sent amongst them would sweep everything away. Nothing was so efficient as earthworks, and it would have been much better to have had them, instead of these cement works, on which so much money had been wasted. If it should happen that the country was driven into actual warfare, he was sure that if an enemy's cruiser managed to get past the torpedoes the forts inside the harbours would be quite inefficient to repel attack. The appliances of warfare were every day improving, and there were now pneumatic guns invented, with missiles so destructive that if one were sent into one of these forts it would destroy everything within a large area. We had been wasting money in putting up guns that day by day were proved to be quite inefficient. Take, for example, rifles. The rifles of to-day were superseded by a new weapon to-morrow, and the Government should be very particular not to introduce weapons that in a few months might be superseded; and yet on such weapons a large unauthorised expenditure had been incurred. Then, again, with regard to cartridges, a great deal had been said about protecting local industries, and was it desirable that the Government should order cartridges from Home when they could get them quite as good manufactured in the colony? He did not altogether blame the late Government for the expenditure, but he thought the gentlemen at the head of affairs ought to have known sufficient of military matters not to have recommended such a waste of money in this system of defence; and the Government should, as quickly as possible, suspend every shilling of expenditure on guns and forts, and concentrate their whole attention on the port torpedo force. New systems of torpedoes and missiles were being introduced daily, and the Government should see whether experiment proved these to be efficient or not. As for the guns placed in these forts, they ought to have been spread about the hills surrounding the town, instead of being concentrated in one position, where one single charge might blow them all to pieces. He might give America as an instance of what ought to be done. In that country, rich as she is, whilst others were spending their money in experimenting on defensive weapons, they waited quietly and let others make experiments, of which they would afterwards take advantage. We, on the other hand, took up all sorts of obsolete methods, and, while the people were groaning under taxation, employed a lot of gentlemen to walk about, drawing large salaries and wearing spotless swords and gaudy uniforms. This expenditure was doing no good, and he would ask the Government not to spend another penny beyond the liabilities in regard to fortresses, but to devote their attention to the torpedo service. He was not casting any reflection upon the late Government; but there were gentlemen in high positions who, from the military experience of the age, should have supplied the colony with inducements to more caution. The late Government were led away simply by the attraction of military display.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON hoped no one would reply to the paltry remarks of the last speaker.

Mr. FERGUS could not allow the remarks of the honourable member for Waitemata to pass without saying he entirely disagreed with the honourable gentleman, and also with those who said that the guns the colony now had were obsolete. He had the highest authority for saying that we were ahead even of Great Britain herself in the matter of our guns. He might quote General Schaw as saying that when he left England, some six or eight months ago, they had no such guns mounted there as we had now. The honourable gentleman said that the money spent on defence had been thrown away. That also was not the case, if they were to take the high authority he had quoted. Some of the money, no doubt, had been badly spent. It had been remarked by the honourable member for Timaru that it was upon the naval defence they must rely for the future. That was true; but then the British Government would not allow its ships to come here unless we had defended ports in which they could refit and repair. Forts were an auxiliary to the naval defence of the colony, and torpedoes were auxiliary to the forts. In the first place forts were necessary to insure naval defence, and in the second place torpedoes were necessary to render effective the defence of the four main ports of the colony.

Mr. LEVESTAM did not consider the honourable member for Waitemata an authority on the question of defence, for if that honourable gentleman had known anything about the subject he would have known that torpedoes and mines were of no use unless they were protected by artillery. But he quite agreed with the honourable gentleman that not another shilling should be spent on harbour defence, because all that was necessary had been done, and perhaps a great deal more. He did not think it was necessary to have more than two fortified ports in the colony, in which ports vessels could refit; and the rest of the colony must rely upon a naval defence. He would be glad to have the assurance of the Minister that no more money should be expended on harbour defences.

Mr. FITZHERBERT had not said that the guns were obsolete, but only that some of them were. He agreed with the Minister of Defence that we had batteries here which were not equalled in England, and guns mounted in the most perfect manner. That was the case in the Ngauranga battery; but he could not say so much for the Kaiwara battery, where the guns, he believed, were of an obsolete character. Then, he considered that the batteries were too elaborate, and that they might be as effective, and the guns might be fought with as much success, if the batteries had not been so elaborate.

Mr. TANNER thought that the money had been unwisely spent—not altogether, but to a large extent—and that they should not throw good money after bad. If the additional amount was granted would the defences be complete?

Mr. FERGUS.—Yes.

Mr. TANNER asked if the Minister for Public Works would guarantee that no cruiser would be able to run the gauntlet of these forts, and then do as much mischief as if this money had not been expended.

Mr. FERGUS.—No; but in all probability it could not.

Mr. TANNER said that was not sufficient. If there was a doubt about it it was of no use completing this defence; and he thought that, to put the ports in a proper state of defence, three or four times the amount asked for would be needed. He would move, as an amendment, That no additional amount be authorised.

Mr. MARCHANT had always objected to this extravagant expenditure. He could see no reason why a young country like this should be required to spend large sums of money in putting up defences against people with whom we had nothing to do. We had no neighbours with whom to quarrel, and no foreign possessions to defend. The only thing which would lead this country into trouble at all was the action of England, which the colony had no possible means of controlling. Such being the case, why should we have to bear the brunt of it? Seeing that we were an English colony, and England had such relations with foreign Powers as involved a danger of invasion to us, he said unhesitatingly that it was the duty of England to protect us, and that we should not be required, overburdened as the people were with taxation, to borrow and to incur further taxation to provide for such a contingency. He would not object to allow a small sum, to taper off, but he intended to move that there be struck off a sum of £24,000. If we had a voice in the administration of Imperial affairs, things, he granted, would be different; but he would never consent to that. He contended that we had enough to do to manage our own affairs, without intermeddling with matters that we could not understand, and that we had no knowledge of.

Mr. IZARD said that, as they had the assurance of the Minister of Defence that, of the £130,000, liabilities were undertaken to the extent of £104,000, it seemed to him to be merely a waste of time to discuss this question.

Sir J. VOGEL thought that the worst and, perhaps, the only mistake made by the late Government was in this matter of defence expenditure, though he did not think they could be much blamed for it, for they had only followed the wishes of the country under the impulse of a craze—of a panic, he might say. This enormous expenditure was not of the slightest use to New Zealand, but, on the contrary, was a danger to the colony, and was simply a convenience to the Imperial Government for a policy which had certainly not been for the good of the Australasian colonies. He was speaking plainly in this matter. If the English Government had followed the recommendation made long years ago to them, and at the time had taken possession of the Pacific islands, there would have been no need for anything of this kind; but they had allowed foreign Powers to get possession of the Pacific islands, and now there might be times when critical situations would arise. He did not mean to say that in the case of a European war these islands would be of much consequence one way or the other; but what he meant was that, with a number of foreign vessels scattered about the islands, not connected by cable with England, each captain doing as he thought best, and almost having the power in his hands of making war between the countries concerned, the danger was a very large one. Now, the Australasian Colonies were asked to take a responsibility which really was caused by the Government of Great Britain in allowing the Pacific islands to pass beyond their reach. That danger was one which the British Government would have to face. Take the case of the New Hebrides. He observed that satisfaction was expressed that an arrangement had been made with France regarding those islands. Well, he, for one, did not share in that satisfaction. What did that arrangement mean? That the islands were to be controlled by the men-of-war of the two nations. Was it likely that England would keep war-vessels at the New Hebrides? Virtually the islands were ceded to France without that condition which France was willing to make a year or two ago—that deportation to New Caledonia should entirely cease. They had got out of that condition. Then, take the case of Samoa. We virtually offered this group to Germany when we proposed that that empire should act as the mandatory of other

Mr. Marchant

Powers. The Germans could take possession and do anything they liked under such an arrangement; their agency would be merely nominal. What was the meaning of taking power for a man-of-war to act at the New Hebrides, when there was no chance of our permanently stationing one there? He had pointed out eighteen months ago that the landing of French troops at the New Hebrides meant that they would never give up their virtual possession of the islands. His contention was that the defence expenditure was the result of panic fostered by officers in the Imperial service, and the colony had been led into an expenditure which, he believed, had been wholly useless, unless they were prepared to go into an enormous expenditure in the future, and into responsibilities the extent of which it was impossible to gauge. He was quite prepared to admit the responsibility that attached to himself as a member of the Government, nor did he wish to evade it in any respect. He might recall to the recollection of honourable members the way in which a deputation treated him in Dunedin because he was not prepared to place in a state of defence the Ocean Beach. That was a sample of—should he call it the warlike spirit, or fear of war, that prevailed at the time from one end of the colony to the other? He was prepared to accept whatever blame might be considered to attach to the Government, although to some extent it was impossible for the Government to resist the panic which necessitated that enormous expenditure. Seventeen years ago, when he visited England, he was asked by the then Defence Minister, the late Sir Donald McLean, to communicate with the authorities with a view of ascertaining what would be the cost of placing the four principal harbours in a state of defence. The gentleman who was now the present Governor of New Zealand, then Colonel Jervois, and then considered to be a very high authority on questions of defence, drew out a plan for the colony the cost of which would have amounted to £20,000 only for the defence of the four harbours of Auckland, Wellington, Lyttelton, and Port Chalmers. It gave an idea of the way in which the expenditure and people's views increased on this subject when it was considered that lately this £20,000 had developed into half a million and over. It was not considered desirable even when the colony had ample means, between 1870 and 1880, to go into a larger defence expenditure than £20,000. In plain terms, the expenditure which had been incurred, instead of conducting to the colony's protection, placed it in a position of inviting attack from outside enemies. Nothing could be more dangerous to a colony such as ours than to place it in an imperfect condition of defence. It was impossible to suppose that any nation would wantonly destroy our towns, unless those towns were placed in a position of resistance. Belligerent vessels might ask for coal, vegetables, and so on, and might enforce their demands; but to suppose that they would wantonly destroy property was opposed to the whole conditions upon which modern wars were fought out. The custom now was to send a bill in at the end of the war, and the defeated nation had to pay. What object could there be in wantonly destroying property? Property was never safer in France than when the German army was in occupation. He contended that the idea that it was necessary to fortify these towns in order to protect them from being burnt down was an utter mistake. The contrary would be the case, unless these towns offered a defence or refused supplies. It was only in such a case as that that the towns would stand a chance of being destroyed. His opinion was that there was very little chance of England entering upon a war in which she would be defeated. He thought most Englishmen agreed with the Earl of Beaconsfield that England could not be beaten—that if she were beaten in one campaign she would be ready to fight another, that if she were beaten in the second she would be ready to fight a third, and, in fact, there was no end to her resources; and no other nation could say the same. Therefore it was quite certain that any attempt at wanton destruction would not be made, because of the punishment that would be certain to follow. But he thought any attempt at wanton destruction was out of the question. Any vessel sailing under letters of marque would carry too little ammunition to waste it in bombarding New Zealand towns. Such a vessel would seek higher game. It appeared to him that, unless there was some hidden motive behind of which they were not conscious, the naval policy of the Empire, as represented by the desire of getting these small towns fortified, had revolutionised the system that would have been pursued by those great admirals who had made the English name formidable, and was enough to make them turn in their graves. What would Nelson have said as to the fear of meeting ships of war outside fortified ports? "Let them come," he would have said, "inside or outside an unfortified port: they shall never get away." Go back to Queen Elizabeth's time. Did she send vessels out when England was threatened with invasion by the Spanish Armada, or wait until the Armada came? What was wanted was a navy powerful enough to take to the sea and protect our merchant-vessels afloat. He was favourable to the proposal to make Auckland a naval station, because he believed it was the most convenient place for the whole of the islands, especially so when the Panama Canal was finished. And if the Imperial Government insisted that Auckland, being the naval station, should be fortified, the colony would have to fortify it; but it was utterly absurd for us to continue to treat Dunedin, Christchurch, or Wellington, or their several ports, as fortified stations. What they should do was to take steps to protect New Zealand from occupation against the whole world; and it could be protected against occupation by any nation or conjunction of nations. They should spend their money in developing to the highest possible extent the Volunteer force. The Volunteer force was put on one side. There was a sort of naval and military oligarchy that looked with contempt on the Volunteers; and, in his opinion, it was sometimes doubtful whether they would not hear of a large number of the Volunteers being disbanded. What he should like to see was the establishment of a reserve force of five or six thousand men, and more if necessary, made up year after year by selecting Volunteers who had shown themselves most apt in acquiring discipline and organization, and who should be rewarded by being placed in the reserve force, with a small pension, and be liable to be called out once or twice a year. There could also be an inner reserve force to fill up the vacancies occurring in the first reserve. By these means a force could be established which would prevent the occupation of the colony by any nation. In the prevention of privateers or solitary cruisers coming to New Zealand recourse could be had, if necessary, to the assistance of the Empire; but he was convinced they would not develop, at a reasonable cost, a force to defend the colony against invasion if they continued to allow a naval and military oligarchy to grow up in connection with their defences. The liabilities which had been incurred were the result of the naval and military entourage which was growing up here, and which considered that New Zealand was bound to support a sort of branch military establishment of the Imperial country. He had noticed what had been going on around him, and had come to this opinion with reluctance, but not without good grounds. If they had allowed other nations to get a footing in the Pacific, it was a misfortune, and they must bear it. A good deal remained to be said on the whole question when the Naval Defences Bill came on for discussion. As to that measure, he was entirely favourable to making New Zealand a naval station, and to paying for the presence of two ships of war upon our coast. An increase of vessels of this kind would be a step in the right direction, instead of these fortifications, which would answer no purpose whatever except to put the colony in danger. He should not vote against this amount, because he did not know what was the position of the Government with respect to liabilities; but he hoped the Government would show a strong front, and bring this expenditure to an end as soon as possible. Even if it was justifiable from any cause, we had to look at our means. We might look at Sydney, where Sir William Denison had spent an enormous sum on defences—on what people now called his "follies." All that had been done during the last three years would, in the course of so short a period as another five years, become antiquated and more or less useless, and would have to be undone or added to at a large cost; besides that, there would have to be an enormous annual cost to keep the works up with the march of improvement in offensive and defensive operations. He hoped the Government would bring this expenditure to an end at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MACARTHUR said the honourable member for Christchurch North had made an excellent speech on the indefensible nature of the Government expenditure on defences; but his speech was entirely inconsistent with the actions of the Ministry of which he was a member. He did not think it was wise to go into the question now of whether this expenditure had been advisable or not, or who had been the first to raise the scare in the country. No doubt, at one time there was a scare, and the then Ministry, as the honourable member for Christchurch North had said, were afraid to ignore that scare, and yielded to it. Of course the Ministry were not obliged to yield to the popular cry if they thought it was wrong; but they did as they always did—they bent to the blast—they went in for this enormous expenditure, and now they could not disclaim the responsibility. However, he was not going into that question; what he wished more particularly to confine his attention to was a much greater question than the question of whether the money had been spent wisely or not. It was of no use to cry over spilt milk: the money was gone, and could not be recovered. He wanted to direct attention again to the unauthorised defence expenditure, in order that in future similar occurrences might be prevented. They sat there night after night, squabbling over votes for a few hundreds, and they went away thinking they had left the finances of the country in a sound condition. But what was the result? The Ministry simply overrode the decision come to by the House, by incurring liabilities and committing the country to future expenditure without at all troubling themselves to obtain the consent of Parliament. This was referred to in the last Public Works Statement of the late Minister for Public Works, in 1886, and the then Ministry provided what they thought would prevent the incurring of liabilities without authority. They tried to provide a remedy; and with what result? On almost all the votes under the control of one of the late Ministers liabilities were incurred to a very much greater extent without the least authority of Parliament. A very large amount of time had been wasted this session over twopenny-halfpenny parish matters; and therefore he wanted no excuse for going over the figures of this business again, for this was a matter involving thousands and thousands, and yet apparently it was not taken the slightest notice of by the House. He hoped the Government would try to devise some provision for preventing such occurrences in the future. In 1886 the House voted £120,000 for direct expenditure on harbour defences, and they gave the Minister permission to incur liabilities to the extent of £10,000 more. What was the result? Why, on the 31st March last the late Government had spent on defences directly £140,000, or £20,000 in excess of the £120,000 voted for the year. This extra £20,000 was no doubt covered by the authority given to spend £100,000 as unauthorised expenditure under "The Public Revenues Act, 1878;" but there was no law to justify the contracts entered into to the extent of £87,000 over the £130,000 authorised. The late Government got an imprest of £53,000 last session, which extended their authority to £183,000, while against this authority they had spent and incurred liabilities on the 30th September last up to £229,000—that was £46,000 over and above the amount allowed them by Parliament. Add to this their liabilities on Native-land purchases and village settlements, and a very serious state of affairs was disclosed. What was the good of their wasting time over these votes, and deliberating to a few pounds how much should be spent, when a Minister could take no notice of what the House has prescribed, but go and spend scores of thousands of pounds utterly without authority? If a member of a local body acted in this way, even to the extent of £10, he would be liable to be punished or charged with it; but a Minister, because he was in the highest position in the country, could afford to wholly disregard the law. Such a state of things should be remedied at once, and it would be advisable even this session to do it. A clause should be put at the end of the Appropriation Act providing that, if any Minister spent more under any of the headings of that Act than was authorised, he should be fined £500, or punished in some other way. That would prevent any repetition in the future of such conduct. But the Ministry could advise the best way to do this, and he hoped they would even yet do it before the end of the session, so that in the future these proceedings should be stopped altogether, and there should be no liabilities incurred by any Minister beyond the amounts actually authorised. He had referred to this matter earlier in the session, and had hoped his remarks would elicit some explanation, or defence, or apology from the late Minister to whom he particularly referred, the honourable member for Wanganui. That honourable gentleman was not now present to hear him, but he would have another opportunity of replying to the charges now being made against him, and he (Mr. Macarthur) hoped that the honourable gentleman would do so. That honourable gentleman was directly responsible for what he had alluded to, but the whole of the Ministry had to share the responsibility. The honourable gentleman would have an opportunity, when speaking to the schedule of the Loan Bill, of replying to the charge he had made. As to what the honourable member for Christchurch North had said about this vote, it was rather peculiar, after that honourable gentleman's Ministry had spent half a million on defences, for him to quibble at an expenditure of £24,000—which was the whole vote in excess of the liabilities—to finish the works begun by the honourable gentleman's late colleague: and it must be remembered that the liabilities this vote was principally to meet were incurred nearly wholly by the honourable gentleman and his late colleagues. Unless this £24,000 was granted to complete the works, what had already been spent would be to a great extent useless. All that was asked was £8,000 a year for the next three years. Now, whether this expenditure was defensible or not, those who had swallowed the camel of half a million should not strain at the gnat of £24,000 as the honourable member for Christchurch North was doing. The whole action of that gentleman in expostulating about this expenditure, in view of what he had himself done, was most absurd and inconsistent. The whole House, he believed, would be in accord with the Government in taking action to prevent this unauthorised spending of money and committing the country to liabilities in the future. To do so would not take much time, and in doing it the Ministers would have the satisfaction of knowing that, however unwilling they might be to be guilty of such actions as he had referred to, they would prevent any of their successors from having the power to do so. He earnestly hoped this would be done during the present session.

Sir J. VOGEL said it was not a question of what the late Government had or had not done, but whether a large expenditure in the future should be incurred or not. If the late Government had expended any money without being authorised, it was because the law allowed them to do it. Besides the amounts actually and specifically authorised, the Government was allowed by law to expend a certain maximum sum without specific authority; but the law recognised the one as as much authorised as the other. He agreed that there was too much unauthorised expenditure allowed, and he challenged the honourable member for Manawatu to move that the power as to unauthorised expenditure be reduced by a half. As long as the Government had power to make unauthorised expenditure they would exercise it to the best of their judgment. If it was unwisely exercised it was the fault of the House in giving such a power; and, if the Ministers displayed bad judgment, it was in the power of the House to punish them in the constitutional manner. The less the limit of unauthorised expenditure allowed the more exact, necessarily, would be the calculations of the Treasurer for the year. As an ex-Colonial Treasurer himself, he would not object to the power as to unauthorised expenditure being reduced. A great deal depended on the time the appropriations were passed. This year, for instance, when there would be only three months of the financial year left after the passing of the appropriations, there could not be much unauthorised expenditure; but, if the appropriations had been passed four or five months ago, the unauthorised expenditure must necessarily have been larger. As it was, all liabilities up to the passing of the appropriations would be provided for, and the unauthorised expenditure this year should be to that of ordinary years only in proportion to the part of the year left unexpired as compared with the period ordinarily to run after the passing of the appropriation. There was little difficulty in estimating pretty exactly what would be required when there was only a fourth of the financial year left, instead of two-thirds as there usually was. If the honourable gentleman thought the amount which the Government had power to spend without specific authority was too large, he (Sir J. Vogel) would support its reduction by half. He put this case to the honourable gentleman: Supposing a man was given the management of a business some thousands of miles from the residence of the owners of that business, and was authorised by his employers or directors to spend a certain amount on specific objects. Suppose that he was also told he might use his own discretion as to spending a further specified sum, if he unwisely exercised that discretion would his employers have any right to blame him for expending money without authority? They would have given him as full authority to spend that discretionary amount as the amount for which the objects were specifically stated. They might blame his judgment, but could not complain of his acting without authority. If the House thought Governments were prone to spend too much money under the shadow of unauthorised expenditure, the proper course was to limit the amount of the unauthorised expenditure; and he should be very glad to assist the honourable gentleman to do that.

Mr. MACARTHUR said the honourable member for Christchurch North was cleverly endeavouring to draw a red-herring across the scent. He was presuming on the inattention which was too general with members on this subject, and was talking about unauthorised expenditure when this was a matter which had nothing to do with unauthorised expenditure. The honourable gentleman knew well enough that what he (Mr. Macarthur) had just now been complaining of was not the administration of the unauthorised expenditure so much as the action of the Government in entering into contracts without any authority. The use of the unauthorised-expenditure vote was to meet payments coming in unexpectedly, or to meet payments coming due, and necessary to be made, where the votes proved to be insufficient. The administration of the unauthorised expenditure had nothing to do with, and formed no justification for, the incurring of liabilities which Parliament had not authorised. He had no desire to curtail the power very wisely first given to Ministers some years ago in the matter of unauthorised expenditure; but what he did wish to curtail was the power which Ministers illegally exercised of entering into contracts altogether in excess of the authority and intention of Parliament, and then walking off into opposition "scot-free," with not a word being said about it—without any notice being taken of their conduct by the Press or the country. That was the system that ought to be stopped. And he was not referring so much to the expenditure of the late Government as to the system; and he did hope that, late in the session as it was, the Government would make some provision in this matter, so that, though they might be above such things, it would not be possible for their successors to do as their predecessors had certainly done to an enormous extent. The honourable member for Christchurch North knew well enough what he was complaining of, and should not attempt to draw a red-herring across the scent, with the view of diverting the attention of Parliament from a matter which needed very strict and careful attention.

Sir J. VOGEL said he only wished to say that the honourable gentleman was entirely misinformed as to the powers possessed by the Government with regard to incurring unauthorised expenditure, and it would take too long to instruct him, and therefore he (Sir J. Vogel) should not attempt it.

Mr. TAYLOR said the speech which they had heard from the late Colonial Treasurer was one which he should not like to have delivered. What was the use of apologizing after the money had been wastefully spent? He hoped to see the day when there would be a Radical Government on those benches, a Government with some backbone,—a Government which would not be led by the nose by public opinion into squandering the people's money, and then come down and apologize for having been so led away. Why should the great bulk of the people—the working-classes—have this tinsel defence business forced upon them? One habit created another; and one gentleman with a little bit of lace round his coat created the necessity for another, and so the thing went on: and he desired to protest against the continuance of this sort of thing. It was creating a class distinction in this colony, to the injury of the masses of the people, not to speak of the expense. He was speaking in the interest of the bulk of the people. The expenditure was exceedingly wasteful, to say the best of it. To-day we obtained a gun with what were called all the latest improvements; but to-morrow the latest improvement would vanish, and we had to buy another gun; and so the thing went on. He should certainly vote for the motion of the honourable member for Taranaki, so as to strike off all expenditure except such as was required to meet liabilities incurred.

Mr. HUTCHISON said this was not merely a politico-domestic matter; it was a national matter: and, speaking from such knowledge as he had acquired on the subject, and from investigations he had made into the preparations which had been made in connection with defence, he felt constrained to say that it seemed to him that the colony was utterly helpless in this matter of constructing defences. The colony had already spent, or was liable for, upwards of half a million of money; besides which which there had been spent during the last three years about £50,000 upon what were called the permanent forces; and the results attained inevitably led to the conclusion that we had better at once cease the endeavour to keep step with the older nations of the world in the march of warlike preparations. War was a game we could not afford to play at. The counters in the game were thousands, and the stakes were millions. Parliament had to consider, too, as had been suggested by the honourable member for Sydenham, that war was a progressive science, which every day was changing, and becoming, if possible, more intricate and expensive than it was before. In one year fortifications and heavy guns were the fashion, in the next year torpedoes were preferred, in the next year submarine electro-contact mines, and next year it would be something else. In connection with these matters he noticed a measure on the Order Paper—the Australasian Naval Defence Bill—which he would not refer to beyond expressing the hope that the Government would not seek to pass it this session. It involved a subject which deserved the consideration of a whole Parliament, and should not be disposed of at the fag-end of an improvised session. It was a question far-reaching in its extent, and he hoped that the Government would be content to relegate it to next session, when it might be considered with some degree of deliberation commensurate with its importance. But, returning to the point raised in connection with this vote, he would say that these defences had been begun in panic, continued with ill-disciplined vigour, and would, if still carried on, end in ruin. He hoped that the House would put down its foot upon any further expenditure, and rule off the account as soon as possible. The first loss would be the least loss.

Major ATKINSON must confess that he was astonished at the speech of the honourable member for Christchurch North, for, if such a speech should have been made at all, it certainly should have been delivered two or three years ago, when the honourable gentleman was sitting on the Government benches, and before the honourable gentleman had committed the colony to an expenditure of half a million of money. However, he did not want to go into that. The honourable gentleman must be the best judge of his own conduct in such matters.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I said I accepted all responsibility.

Major ATKINSON said it was of no use for the honourable gentleman to accept responsibility. The honourable gentleman had been instrumental, on his own showing, in wastefully expending half a million of money, and no doubt he took the proper constitutional position in accepting full responsibility; but the position now taken by the honourable gentleman ought to have been taken two or three years ago, before the colony had been committed to this enormous expenditure. It was useless saying that now. If the honourable gentleman merely sat on the stool of repentance, and the colony could recover the money, there could be no objection to the position he had taken up; but that was not the position at all. It was a most extraordinary departure for the ex-Treasurer to tell the House that he had deliberately sat on the Government benches and seen half a million of money thrown away, and then calmly say that he accepted all responsibility. There should be some responsibility in such instances as that worthy of the name of responsibility. He did not want to rake these matters up, for, unfortunately, the money was gone, and there could be no good purpose served by doing so. But he wanted to point out that he agreed with the policy that was then pursued. What he objected to was that the House was never properly taken into the confidence of the Government, and that the Government proceeded in a most reckless way to give effect to what was undoubtedly the popular wish. The popular wish undoubtedly was that the harbours should be properly defended—scientifically defended—and he did not blame the late Government in any way. He thought their policy was right, and he approved of their action so far as he understood it. But the more the details of their action were looked into—the more the House looked into the way in which that policy was carried out—the more evident did it become that it had been done in an utterly reckless manner. Guns were ordered, and forts were put up and named after Ministers, and the whole of the procedure of the Government seemed to be based on the belief that there was great glory in doing this work; but there was no calculation, no care, no forethought, no consideration as to what might be the cost. He was sorry that the discussion had arisen, because he thought it was a discussion which should have come on the Naval Defences Bill, a Bill which he hoped the House would see fit to carry. If we were to have any advantage at all from the Naval Defence Bill, these fortifications were absolutely necessary, though not for the purpose which the honourable gentleman said. They knew that the fortifications were practically useless for defence against an armed cruiser, but they would be of enormous value in preventing a strange ship from running down and threatening to bombard us unless we paid an indemnity. It was all very well to say that the habit of civilised nations now was to present their bills at the end of the war and demand payment, and that we could send our bill in to the British Government and have it paid. He had lived in a district in this colony where they had had their property destroyed and their houses burned, and had suffered as much as any people could suffer under foreign invasion; and it took years and years before the settlers of that district were able to get any compensation, and many of them had not got it even to the present day. It would be of very small consolation to the colony to wait till the end of a war in the hope of getting compensation for the losses they had suffered. We wanted forts to protect ourselves from a sudden raid; and all honourable gentlemen knew that a colony was exposed to such raids through the fact of many foreign nations having ships of war in these seas, which were practically under no command except of the officers in charge of them. It was quite in accordance with the views entertained by some of those nations as to honourable war to come down and collect all the gold they could in the various colonies; and it was even known that such a scheme had been prepared. On that ground the forts protecting our chief towns, where most of our gold was lodged, were a wise protection as a matter of insurance. There was no waste of money in providing that protection. We were not going to compete with the older nations in real warfare, but we wanted to prevent what might be called piratical expeditions against us; and we knew that we were surrounded by the ships of foreign nations which could carry out such an expedition at any time. He was surprised at that part of the speech of the honourable member for Christchurch North in which he expressed approval of the Naval Defences Bill and yet disapproved of these forts. The honourable gentleman must know that it was absolutely necessary to have safe ports to which ships of war could run for coals, or to refit in case of accidents through engagements or stress of weather, and that they should not, in these ports, be at the mercy of any small ship which might choose to attack them when in a disabled condition. The colony was therefore absolutely bound to provide ports into which English men-of-war could run, and which the men of those ships would help to protect in case of a strange ship coming down. He ventured to think that if the Committee considered the question dispassionately, and irrespective of any idea whether a Ministry had done right or wrong, it would come to the conclusion that the ports were absolutely necessary. If the forts were not there the British Government would not place ships of war on this station; or, if they did so during peace, the instant war broke out they would take them away to act in conjunction with other ships where they could get safe ports to run to in case of accidents. He hoped the House would see its way to complete the works which were undertaken. It was all very well for some honourable members to think that they were all great soldiers and sailors and engineers, and knew a great deal more about these matters than men of world-wide experience; but it appeared to him that, when they had taken the best advice in the world upon the subject, they were wise to act upon it. They had taken the best advice they could get from the ablest officers of our own country, and had acted upon it; and he ventured to think that, if war should break out—which he hoped would not be the case, though he feared that hope would not be fulfilled—and if our scheme of defence had to be tried, we should then feel that we had acted according to the best information obtainable; and that was all we could do. One honourable gentleman said that guns were changing every day, and asked, Why, then, should we expend money on them? To follow out that argument we must not arm ourselves at all; but he ventured to say that, in such case, if an enemy's ship were to come down and levy a contribution on us, take away our coal, destroy our ships, or anything of that description, there would be such an outcry throughout the Empire at our want of care and forethought that we should feel very small indeed, besides losing all hope of assistance in our difficulties. The Government did not propose to do more than complete the works already in hand; and surely it would be very unwise not to complete those works to a point at which they would be useful for the purpose for which we wanted them.

Mr. FITZHERBERT agreed with most that the Premier had said. The honourable gentleman spoke of having obtained the best advice procurable, and he presumed that was the advice of General Schaw. He had asked both the Premier and the Defence Minister to let the House have the report which General Schaw had sent in, but they had not supplied it, and he did not think they were treating the House fairly in keeping it in the dark as they were doing.

Mr. WARD said the Premier had stated that the Government had acted on the advice of Sir William Jervois in regard to these fortifications. But, although that advice had been received by the late Government, it had not been acted upon. Sir William Jervois in his report included the Bluff Harbour as one of the ports to be fortified, and it formed an important part of the scheme of that high military engineer; but no means had ever been taken to act upon that report—to protect that harbour. If an enemy wanted to make an inroad into the colony, what better point could be selected than Bluff Harbour to do so? It was right in the highway of commerce.

Major ATKINSON.—An enemy would have to land there.

Mr. WARD.—Yes. There were forts at all the other large harbours: and he would be very much surprised if the enemy did not land at the Bluff Harbour. It was not at all likely they would run past an undefended port to attack others that were guarded by forts. It was the commencement of the railway and telegraph system of the colony, and nothing could be easier than for an enemy to take charge of the railway track, cut the telegraph wires, and, if they thought proper, send troops up by rail, and attack the forts in the rear; and what a surprise to those in charge of the Dunedin and Lyttelton forts it would be to find them attacked by an enemy from inland instead of from sea! This was not an imaginary picture;—it was quite possible. There was Paterson's Inlet, in Stewart Island, which could hold the British Navy twice told, without any one knowing that the ships were there, and an enemy could easily take his fleet in there overnight, and land his troops at the Bluff in the morning. If there was to be a practical scheme of fortification they ought to follow the advice of Sir William Jervois and General Scratchley and include the Bluff Harbour; otherwise the scheme would be defective. He thought the Committee should agree to this vote.

Mr. LEVESTAM said it appeared to him that many honourable members took a wrong view of this question. The honourable gentleman who had just spoken told the Committee that an enemy would land his troops at the Bluff: but it was well known that nations did not send their ships out to far-distant colonies to invade them, but to stop their trade by destroying their ships at sea. It might be quite true, as the Premier said, that the Government had got the best advice; but he (Mr. Levestam) maintained that it was not necessary to fortify the ports of the colony; what we wanted was to have a cruiser to secure them from attack. No doubt it was necessary to have places in which ships could refit; but one or two places would have been quite sufficient, and we had fortified too many ports. No doubt wherever mines were laid or torpedoes used there must be batteries to protect them, or the enemy would send boats and take them up; but we were doing more than that, for we were trying to put the colony into such a state of defence that it would be impossible for even a large ship of war to enter our ports, and it was not at all likely that such a ship would ever be sent here. He would therefore support the motion for reducing the vote.

Sir J. VOGEL must say a few words in reply to the Premier, who had dragged in the conduct of the late Government. The honourable gentleman always found some cause of complaint against his predecessors. It was not the case that this expenditure of £500,000 could have been stopped three years ago, because he hardly thought it was commenced three years ago; and, as he had explained, it was commenced under the irresistible influence of a panic. Then, the honourable gentleman lost all right to complain of it, because the present Government approved of the work so far that they were going to complete it. The honourable gentleman said they would complete the fortifications of the four towns: that meant also maintaining the fortifications, and would involve a very large expenditure, for every shot cost a considerable sum of money. Then, he noticed in the Auckland papers that, notwithstanding the Minister of Defence said he had not sanctioned the meeting of torpedo operators for a trial in Wellington as part of the holiday rejoicings, yet the department had done so, and they were under orders to come here. That showed how little control even a Minister had over such a department. The honourable gentleman said that if we were to make this a naval station we should require to fortify the towns. He had not lost sight of that, and had said that probably they would require one port to be fortified. The desirability of making the colony a naval station would sufficiently justify them in maintaining the fortifications of one city, and, unquestionably, Auckland should be the naval station, as it commanded the largest range of the Pacific. He had said he was in favour of having fortifications at Auckland, but the English Government could not be so unreasonable as to insist upon the colony maintaining fortifications at four ports. He was surprised that the honourable member for Nelson did not raise the question of the fortification of Nelson, and he had no doubt that if the honourable gentleman who was now Colonial Secretary had not been in the Government he would have wanted Oamaru fortified. He thought there should be one fortified station to which vessels could retreat for repairs and coaling, and he would have been glad if the Government had taken that view. To maintain the four systems of fortifications was, he felt sure, a great mistake.

Captain RUSSELL agreed with many of the remarks of the honourable member for Christchurch North, and with the speech he had made before the adjournment. That speech commended itself very much to his judgment; but he could not help being amused that the honourable member for Christchurch North should have been the gentleman to deliver it. The only reasonable presumption was that that honourable gentleman was the weakest member of the late Cabinet, and was unable to resist the importunities of his colleagues to do what was against his better judgment. He (Captain Russell) thought that to fortify the four cities of New Zealand could lead to nothing but useless expenditure. He believed that if a foreign cruiser came with hostile intentions to New Zealand she would avoid the ports that were fortified, and go to Oamaru or Timaru, or some other place, and there endeavour to punish us, rather than knock her head against the stone walls we had raised for that purpose. But if we were to take a fair share in the defence of the Empire—which he believed we should do—we must not depend upon a land force, but must go more than halfway to meet the enemy upon the high seas. To do that, we must be prepared to pay a considerable amount for naval defence, and have one port where ships could come in in case of injury or accident, or for other purposes. He did not believe that Auckland would be the best situation for the naval station, but thought that Wellington was undoubtedly, as its motto stated, supreme from its situation. There could be no doubt that, from a strategical point of view, no portion of the colony could be better than Wellington. Although Auckland, no doubt, commanded a better position for the Pacific-island trade, yet, when it was considered that from Auckland a vessel had to pass round the North Cape to get into the Pacific, he believed that at Wellington the vessels would be as near their work as in Auckland. It should be borne in mind, as the honourable member for Christchurch North had pointed out, that it was the expense of keeping up armaments that would ruin us in the future. The primary cost of the guns and of erecting fortifications was comparatively little; but the discharge of each gun was a matter of great expense, and so was the maintenance of men to look after the fortifications. He believed that when the pressure came, as it would inevitably come in two or three years, we should be unable to man these forts in the four ports of New Zealand to keep them in good order.

An Hon. MEMBER.—The Volunteers.

Captain RUSSELL said he was a Volunteer himself, and he should be very sorry to say a word against Volunteers; but it was of no use trusting modern armaments to men who were not in perpetual training for the improved ordnance. Advantage must be taken of the improvements of military science as far as possible, and we should get the most improved arms turned out of arsenals; but we could not possibly do that for four ports, and so he thought we should concentrate our energies upon one port, and that that should be the port of Wellington, which should be made invulnerable, and also be provided with a proper dock.

Mr. BRUCE did not presume to speak upon this subject, like many honourable members, with any authority—that was to say, so far as the technical line of defence was concerned; but, as a matter of fact, the question they had first to consider was, To what extent did the circumstances of our position warrant us in spending money for this purpose? The method would come next. Defence expenditure was in reality a means to an end; it was an insurance against risk. He did not think there was any probability of that risk justifying us in the expenditure we had undertaken. We had armed ourselves mainly against the Russians; and could any member of the House for a moment believe that, if we had a single-handed conflict with Russia, one of her hostile cruisers would be seen in the South Pacific? Most certainly not. If Russia was wise in her day and generation, in the event of war she would keep every ship she had under the shadow of her guns, for there only would they be safe. Russia would never send her vessels of war away from coal, which was now, in naval warfare, the base of operations. A good deal had been said about the late Government undertaking these costly and indefensible works; but those who were primarily responsible for it were the inhabitants of the large towns, for they had brought pressure to bear which the Government was unable to resist, and which probably the present Government would have been equally unable to resist. He did not blame the late Government for the expenditure, although he considered the expenditure unjustifiable. He should support the Government in regard to this vote. The money had been spent, and it was for the House to swallow the pill. He hoped they would pass this vote, and that they would then hear no more upon this question of the defence of these principal ports of New Zealand.

Mr. MOSS said one point seemed to be lost sight of—namely, that New Zealand was no longer isolated. We had the French occupying a strong position in the Pacific, and having a powerful navy at their command. They held in the east many valuable islands and strong forts; on the west they were in an equally strong position. And, in addition to that, we had the Germans at Samoa and in the Bismarck Archipelago. Only last year he was told by a German gentleman on one of these islands that they would soon have one of the most powerful ironclads in the Pacific. The Germans had a large fleet, and they looked forward to the time when they would own the islands and colonies in the Pacific now in possession of Holland. Lately they had been allowed to occupy Samoa. A great deal was heard about the New Hebrides, but, to his mind, that was a very small affair compared with the occupation by the Germans of Samoa. He did not see how they could object to the French occupying the New Hebrides, so close to their own colony of New Caledonia, while they allowed the Germans, in the way they had done, to seize an island of the greatest value—Samoa. The Germans were now, practically, in possession of the centre of the Pacific, alongside our own Colony of Fiji; and they were able to exercise from that point a more powerful influence than the French. On the coast of South America great nations were growing up, and New Zealand was no longer isolated. What we wanted to guard against was casual attack. New Zealand could not sit down apathetically and think of nothing but commerce. She had been brought into contact with other nations, and it was only by training her people to rely upon themselves for defence that they could hope to be in a position to hold the country. It seemed to him very unwise to decry the Permanent Force. He spoke as one of the oldest Volunteers in the colony, and hoped the Permanent Force would be carefully preserved, as it would be a nucleus around which the Volunteers could rally, and it must add very much to their efficiency. Even in the Carolines the Spaniards, who had so long been asleep, were now waking up. On all sides New Zealand was being faced by strong Powers, on whose forbearance she could only rely by providing herself with full means to face any force they were likely to be able to send against her.

Mr. ROSS said there was no doubt the vote would have to be passed, and instead of attempting to reduce it he would rather increase it to an amount necessary to pay off the whole of the liabilities, and stop all future expenditure. He had visited the fortifications at Otago Heads, and had heard various opinions expressed by naval and military men respecting them. Some said the works were useless, and some entertained a different opinion; but they were all unanimous in stating that the guns would have to be replaced by others of more modern construction. The honourable member for Egmont had said that the fortifications would be useful in protecting Her Majesty's ships if, becoming disabled, they had to run into our harbours for repairs or for coal; but the authorities in the Old Country on this subject ran in an opposite direction. The Duke of Wellington and Earl Dundonald condemned the construction of fortifications, and the opinions of such great authorities as these could not be disregarded. In his (Mr. Ross's) opinion this expenditure upon fortifications ought not to be continued. With regard to the Permanent Force, he thought it should be disbanded, and only a sufficient number of men kept on to look after the guns. His belief was that the Volunteers could grapple with any enemy that attempted to land on our shores.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the vote be reduced by £24,000."

Amendment negatived.

Dr. HODGKINSON moved, That the vote be reduced by £1,000, to show the opinion of the House that the expenditure should be stopped.

Amendment negatived.

Vote, £80,000, agreed to.

CLASS XI.—RATES ON NATIVE LANDS.

Rates on Native lands for year ending 31st March, 1887, £15,000.

Mr. TURNBULL asked if this could not be paid from the Land Fund. Now that the new Land Bill had been passed there could be no doubt whatever that that Fund would soon be in credit. It was not right to take money from loan for such a purpose if it could be avoided.

Major ATKINSON said there was a very large deficit in the Land Fund now, and to put this vote on the Land Fund would be putting it on nothing. That Fund might be in credit next year, but it could not possibly be in credit before this money would have to be paid to the local bodies.

Mr. TURNBULL said if the money could be charged against what would soon accrue to the Land Fund plenty of other useful purposes could be found for this money—for instance, the Sumner Railway. It was most unfair to take these rates from the Public Works Fund.

Major ATKINSON quite agreed with the honourable gentleman that it was wrong, as a general principle; but this was the law—it was nothing but what had been done for years past. A large part of these rates were supposed to be only advances that would be recouped, but he was afraid that much of it that was supposed to be recouped never would be.

Vote, £15,000, agreed to.

Dr. NEWMAN wished to make a personal explanation. When discussing the vote for asylums on the previous day he had stated, and believed at the time he was fully warranted in doing so, that the site for the asylum at Porirua had been bought by the late Colonial Secretary, and all the expenditure incurred under the late Government. He had felt most positive about the matter, but had since found he had been mistaken. The land was bought by the predecessor of the late Colonial Secretary, Mr. Dick, on the 14th February, 1884, the price being £2,050; and the late Colonial Secretary did not come into office until seven months afterwards, and therefore he had nothing to do with the purchase of the site. He thought the purchase of the site, as well as the subsequent expenditure, very wise, and he regretted that he had made the mistake of attributing the purchase of the site to the late Colonial Secretary instead of to his predecessor.

CLASS XII.—THERMAL SPRINGS.

Vote, Thermal Springs, £3,200, agreed to.

PART II.—Services chargeable to Moneys authorised to be raised under "The North Island Main Trunk Loan Act, 1884."

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS, DEPARTMENTAL.

Head office, salaries and contingencies, to supplement vote to be taken under Part I., £5,000.

Mr. TURNBULL asked why this was separated from the £25,000 they had already passed.

Mr. MITCHELSON would explain that the £25,000 was for departmental expenditure as a whole, of which £6,000 was charged to Part I., £5,000 to Part II., and £14,000 to Part III. of the Public Works Fund.

Dr. NEWMAN thought the amount of £5,000 exorbitant. There would be a good deal of fighting about continuing the line; and, if it was not continued, could not the vote be reduced?

Mr. BUCHANAN said, if any reduction were made in the vote for the line, surely there would not need to be so much spent on the head office.

Mr. MITCHELSON said, No; the money would be saved.

Mr. TURNBULL thought it was high time now that the head office should be reduced.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS II.—RAILWAYS.

New works, £96,000.

Mr. ALLEN proposed that the vote be reduced by the sum of £21,000. He believed that the liabilities now existing up to the end of November amounted to £75,000, and he thought the balance of the vote might be struck off. The reasons which had induced him to move this reduction were these: First, the Ministers themselves, in their Public Works Statement, had invited the Committee to express an opinion as to whether or not this line should be continued. Now, taking into consideration the fact that the cost of completing the line had been largely under-estimated—under-estimated by an amount of over a million and a quarter—and the fact that another large sum in addition to the million which had been authorised would have to be borrowed, he thought the Committee should gravely consider whether they would vote anything beyond what was required to meet existing liabilities. There were other reasons. When the line was originally proposed it was held out, as an inducement to go on with it, that the land through which the route ran would be acquired before the line was proceeded with. This had not been done, except as regarded a small part of the line; and that was a pretty strong reason why there should be no more expended upon the line at present. Other reasons for not proceeding had been brought prominently before the House during the session, one of them being the fact that it was doubtful whether it would not be more advisable to proceed to construct this line by way of Taranaki; and it seemed desirable not to go on with the line beyond the point now reached, or which would be reached when the present liabilities were liquidated, until it was known definitely where the line was to go. For these reasons he moved the amendment.

Mr. PEACOCK failed to see the justice of the conclusions to which the honourable member for Dunedin East had arrived. The honourable gentleman had told them that no more money should be spent until the question of route had been decided, especially considering the large extra amount of money which would be required to complete the line by the way of the Central route; but if the honourable gentleman had looked a little more closely into the matter he would have seen that that question was not in the slightest degree affected by the proposals of the Government at the present time. The position was this: The works had proceeded at the northern end of the line southward as far as the Poratautu tunnel, forty-five miles from Te Awamutu. A contract had been let for the construction of one mile and a half, including the tunnel, the whole to cost a sum of £56,000; but there was an intermediate section between that and another section, Waititi, and that hiatus required to be completed unless the honourable member wished the colony to spend £56,000 on a tunnel without there being any complete communication therewith. He thought that such a sum should be spent, at any rate, as would enable that money to be utilised, rather than that the expenditure should be thrown away. Besides, it had to be taken into account that if any deviation were to take place it would have to take place at a point lower down than the locality of the tunnel. So that the work should be proceeded with quite irrespective of the question of deviating the line. He thought, considering the large amount of the liabilities to be met, the honourable gentleman would see that there could be no reduction on that vote, and that the work should be completed as far as the tunnel. The honourable gentleman might see the advisableness of withdrawing his motion.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped that there would be a majority in favour of the proposal of the honourable member for Dunedin East. He himself felt very strongly about this railway, for he believed that the Parliament had been guilty of greater waste in authorising the construction of this railway than it had been in connection with any other work for the past seventeen years. He had always felt that the expenditure of money on this line was nothing short of disgraceful, in the present circumstances of the colony, and in view of the fact that there was likely to be no return from the expenditure, either direct or indirect, for many years to come. When the question of route was under consideration, in 1884, he had always steadily voted against the work, holding that, although at some future time it would be necessary to construct the line, to go on with it now was to do it at least several years in advance of the time. The honourable member, in moving the reduction of the vote, had stated as one of the reasons for doing so that the land had not yet been acquired from the Natives, which was to recoup the colony for its expenditure on the line. That was so, and it was a very strong reason against voting this large sum of money, because the continuance of the line in the meantime would make the land more valuable, and the Natives would require the colony to pay a much higher sum for the land when it was purchased. Then, it must be remembered that the land was not wanted at the present time. There was plenty of other land available for settlement purposes, and there was therefore no need for the immediate prosecution of this line. The honourable member for Ponsonby had mentioned the Taranaki deviation.

Mr. PEACOCK said it was the honourable member for Dunedin East who mentioned it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the honourable member for Ponsonby had mentioned it too.

Mr. PEACOCK.—Hear, hear.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he did not know that that had anything to do with the matter which the Committee had to consider. The Committee should decide that no further work should be proceeded with on the line at all. They knew the agitation which had been going on in Auckland in reference to this question some little time ago; and he thought that when the honourable member addressed himself to that question he should have shown reasons why the Taranaki deviation should take place.

Mr. PEACOCK said he had not advocated the Taranaki deviation.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not think that the Committee need be under any misapprehension in connection with this matter; and he did not think there was any reason why the deviation should take place. However, there were several reasons why the trunk line should not be gone with at all at present. In the first place, the contracts already in hand at the northern end of the line opened up all the really good country at that end, and the completed sections could be worked very well in connection with existing open lines.

Mr. PEACOCK asked, What about the tunnel?

Mr. BUCHANAN said there would be, as the honourable gentleman had pointed out, a small amount of waste in connection with that; but it seemed to be unavoidable, and he thought it better and cheaper to put up with that waste than to throw away a larger sum by spending more money on the line at present. The southern portion of the line already under contract should be worked in connection with existing lines. He believed the line had now been constructed to the farthest payable point, and that it would be a great advantage to stop. He had indulged in the hope that, the proposed reduction of £500,000 on the Loan Bill having been lost, they would be able to make savings in detail on the estimates; but, if the motion of the honourable member for Dunedin East were rejected, he should expect to see no reductions, and he believed that it would be a matter for great regret throughout the country if the estimates were not reduced. No item could be reduced with more justice than this one.

Mr. PEACOCK asked, What about the liabilities?

Mr. BUCHANAN said the honourable member for Dunedin East had shown that there was £21,000 which could be struck off after providing for liabilities to date; and he earnestly hoped that the Committee would agree to the motion for the reduction.

Mr. KELLY would like to point out that the liabilities were set down at £128,000, and all that was asked for was £96,000. It seemed to him that, instead of taking anything off this vote, they would have to put something more on. But if the honourable members would look at the Public Works Statement they would see that the Minister did not propose to proceed further with the line than to carry out existing liabilities until the House had had an opportunity of reconsidering the question. Nothing would be done until after next session, and it was only wasting time to try and reduce the vote.

Mr. MITCHELSON explained that the liabilities on the 30th September were £141,028, so that the vote could not be reduced to the amount indicated. He was quite prepared to carry out the statement he made to the House the other evening, that the Government were quite willing to stop all further works on this line until the House had had an opportunity of considering it. He thought, personally, and he believed the other members of the Government agreed with him, that it was a great mistake ever to have commenced this line until arrangements had been made for the purchase of the land.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN asked how it was that the honourable gentleman put his liabilities down at £128,000, and only asked for £96,000.

Mr. MITCHELSON explained that that amount would cover all that was actually required to the end of the current year.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said that many of the votes on the estimates appeared to be less than the liabilities, and he thought the House ought to be asked to vote the full amount to cover the liabilities.

Mr. ALLEN acknowledged that the figures he had quoted were wrong. He had taken them from the Minister's paper, where they were written in very small figures, and so had made the mistake. He understood that the liabilities were actually £165,000, so that it would be impracticable to reduce this vote by £21,000 this year. However, the amount of reduction was immaterial, and a motion to reduce the vote by £5 would have answered his purpose just as well, because what he wanted to do was to test the question as to whether any more work should go on on this line. As the Minister gave an assurance that no further contracts would be entered into, he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Buchanan

Amendment withdrawn.

Vote, £96,000, agreed to.

Permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock, £26,100, agreed to.

Surveys, £4,000, agreed to.

CLASS III.—ROADS.

Roads, £20,000.

Mr. BRUCE asked for an explanation as to the £19,500 to give access to the railway-line at the south end.

Mr. MITCHELSON explained that this was for roads which were being made from Marton through the bush. The money had been nearly all expended, and there were only a few pounds left.

Vote, £20,000, agreed to.

CLASS IV.—PURCHASE OF NATIVE LANDS, NORTH ISLAND.

Purchase of Native lands, £29,700.

Dr. NEWMAN asked whether this was the balance of the purchase-money of the Waimarino Block, or whether it was spread over other blocks. About 460,000 acres had already been bought, and about a million acres were under negotiation, tied up in such a way that it could not be got by any outsider. When that was purchased no one could say that there was no land along this line.

Mr. PEACOCK would like the Minister to express an opinion as to whether the balance of the £100,000 appropriated for this purpose for the North Island Trunk Railway would be spent in the vicinity of the part of line already made, or whether the money had been so far engaged that it would have to go for blocks along the Central line, some of those blocks being very far distant.

Mr. MITCHELSON said there was only £10,600 available out of the £100,000, and that would all be required to complete the purchases in the Murimotu district.

Dr. NEWMAN asked whether the whole of the Waimarama Block was paid for.

Mr. MITCHELSON believed that the whole of that block had been paid for; but there was land in the Kaimanawa district not paid for yet.

Mr. KELLY thought that if there was any land available for purchase at the north end of the line the Government should get it, and if they could not do so they should throw it open to others to buy it, for it was a great injury to the North Island to have it shut up.

Major JACKSON hoped the Government would take care to purchase the best of the land, for the system in the past had been to buy only the bad land and leave the good. Before they bought any land they should send some competent person up to examine and classify it; and, besides that, they ought not to buy blocks at a distance from the line, but should confine their operations to land contiguous to it, which would be benefited by the construction of the line.

Mr. BEETHAM said that a great deal of land which had been purchased was simply worthless, and it was necessary to draw the attention of the Government in the strongest way to the necessity for buying only good land. The best of the land along this line was to be found at Pirongia, near the north end; whereas it would be simply waste of money to buy land in the Murimotu district. He trusted the Government would not depend upon the reports of any surveyors in the districts, but would get men who knew what land was to visit the districts before they purchased any land.

Mr. BUCHANAN said it seemed to him an entirely wrong principle on which to conduct these purchases to pay those who were carrying out the negotiations at so much an acre. Under such conditions as these there could be no incentive to act in the interests of the colony, and he desired to protest against such a mode of payment.

Mr. BRUCE could scarcely understand the suggestion of the honourable members for Wairarapa and Masterton that the Commissioner should not rely too much upon reports of commission agents employed by the Crown. As a matter of fact, it was distinctly contrary to law that commission agents should be employed by the Crown to engage in the purchase of Native lands, and he could not for a moment assume that the present Native Minister would do anything contrary to law. Speaking from personal knowledge, he could say that there was a good deal of worthless land on the east side of the Central line, but that particular portion which had just been alluded to was some of the finest land in the colony. He quite admitted that hundreds of thousands of pounds might be wasted on the purchase of land, good, bad, and indifferent; but, at the same time, he did not believe for a moment that the present Native Minister would act in defiance of the law by employing commission agents.

Mr. CARROLL quite agreed with what had fallen from the last speaker, and thought the time had come when they should have a different system for the purchase of Native lands by the Government. The late Government not only had highly-salaried Land-Purchase Commissioners, but officers were allowed to employ other men and pay them a large commission. He believed that, in connection with this Waimarino Block, a commission of £3,000 was paid for assistance to the Land-Purchase Commissioners. The whole thing had been carried out in a most deplorable manner, and he hoped to have the assurance of the Government that for the future more care should be taken in carrying out the land-purchasing operations.

Mr. TAIPUA thought the Government should defer buying any more Native lands for the present, and until there was a good Act passed.

The Government had very little money to spend, and consequently the Natives would get very little for their land. He believed the Waimarino Block had been purchased for 1s. 6d. per acre, and, as there was not much money, even a less price than that might be given. Another thing was that the Native lands round Taupo were in a confused state. Some of the Natives in that district had been treated with injustice, the land having been awarded to Natives to whom it did not belong; and some of the Natives had applied for a rehearing of their cases. He thought the Government should not purchase any more Native lands between this and the next session; and, as he was not clear on the amount that was to be spent, he should vote against the item.

Dr. NEWMAN apprehended that one reason for going on with the Main Trunk line was that it would open up the interior of the country for settlement; and, in spite of what had been said by certain persons, there was a large amount of land there that would be of value hereafter. A large amount of land had been negotiated for, and he hoped that the purchase would be completed, since its purchase was of vital importance to the construction of the line and the progress of settlement.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Government did not intend to ask the House for sums for the purchase of lands other than those under negotiation; but it was desirable that the negotiations entered into should be completed. The Government had not asked for a large sum because it did not consider it advisable to attempt to purchase further blocks of land at present.

Mr. MONK hoped the Government would exercise very careful surveillance over the land-purchases. It was very disagreeable to insinuate that the land-purchases were not satisfactory to the colony; but he had evidence in his possession which justified him in making the statement to the House that such things as this occurred: that most worthless land was bought for the colony, while the good blocks were being reserved in the interests of private speculators. He believed the honourable member for the East Coast would bear him out in this: that the great bulk of the land round Tokano was very poor, and that the only blocks of good land there were being manipulated in the interests of private speculators. It was not necessary that this land should be bought at once to secure it for private speculators; but, as a matter of fact, it was religiously kept out of the portion for which the Government agents were negotiating. He had a letter which would show this, but thought it better not to read it, as it would affect outside persons. Next session there would be a strong opinion expressed on the part of the country that the Government should introduce such a change in the land-purchase system as should not leave an opportunity for those practices to be continued which were being decried all over the country.

Mr. KELLY was not aware that such scandalous transactions as the honourable gentleman had referred to had taken place in the Taupo district, or that there was such valuable land at Tokano. There were certainly a few good patches here and there. He considered that the Government should not pass Acts preventing the Natives from getting what was fair and just for their land, so long as they sold it in small blocks. He quite understood the Government trying to get large tracts of country along the line of railway as cheaply as possible, but, in the case of small areas, the Government had no right to throw obstacles in the way of the Natives obtaining the best price they could get for those small areas. He did not think there had been many complaints from Natives with reference to the purchases on behalf of the Government. There had been only a few applications for rehearing with regard to land in the interior. With regard to this vote, he did not see what the Committee had to discuss, as the whole of the sum was a liability, the money having been spent.

Mr. MOSS was perfectly satisfied that no Government could undertake the purchase—especially the exclusive purchase—of Native land without very great corruption springing up. The agents were paid at so much an acre, and it was quite natural the agents should endeavour to purchase as large an acreage as possible. They were not all of the highest character and standing, and some of them resorted to dubious means to get the Natives to sell. Neither good nor bad agents were interested in the quality of the land they bought. It was well known that the Maoris never sold good land in large quantities while they had bad land they could sell instead. Yet we paid the purchasing agents by the acre, and so offered them a direct inducement to buy for the colony merely quantity without regard to quality or price. He hoped the Government would not continue the practice of endeavouring to monopolize the purchase of Native land; or, if they did, that they would not pay agents by the acre, but make them fixed officers of the department, acting merely as Government officials. If it were made a matter of acreage commission there must be not only great wrong sometimes done to the Natives, but a very great waste of public money in effecting purchases.

Mr. MONK maintained that the system of Native-land purchase was vicious and injurious to the interests of the colony, and to the northern portion of it particularly. Great complaints were also made of the monopoly that was given to a few surveyors by the exclusion of all others from the interior of the country. It was utterly impossible for agents not to be exposed to a great amount of temptation under the present system.

Mr. TAIPŪA hoped this money would not be spent in the Taupo district, because there were some Taupo chiefs in Wellington who had been to the Native Minister, and asked him for a rehearing. The Government should pause before completing the purchases in the Taupo district. And he had heard that women were instructed to sell the best parts of blocks in those lands. They took their stand on clause 21 of the Native Land Administration Act, by which one owner could buy from another. These proceedings had been carried out in the Taupo district, and he asked the Government to pause before completing the transactions, and see whether some relief could not be afforded to those who had suffered.

Mr. HUTCHISON said the use of the terms "good land" and "bad land" was liable to lead to misapprehension in the minds of those not familiar with the actual property. The terms were really relative ones; but, generally, it might be said that good land was that which brought a high price, and bad land that which brought a low price: that was how the terms were generally understood. He would only say that, from his own knowledge of the lands bought by the Government adjacent to the line of the North Island Main Trunk Railway, none of the land the purchase of which had been made by the colony was of such a nature that the House need consider the purchase disadvantageous. There was not an acre of the land that could not be sold now at a high advance on the cost price, and the carrying-on of the works would greatly enhance the value of the land so acquired. Then, there was a very large block called the Murimotu Block, as to which there had been special legislation. That land belonged to the Crown, though it was now under lease to certain gentlemen. That was a most valuable block of about half a million acres, and the line of the railway was projected through it.

Major JACKSON hoped the Government would refrain from purchasing land at Taupo until the rehearing which had been applied for was decided. Whether those applying for the rehearing had a good or a bad case, they had made the application for the rehearing, and he thought the purchase should be delayed until that question was settled.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Government did not intend to purchase any more land at Taupo, nor did they think any should have been purchased there.

Major JACKSON said he had heard a good deal about the land bought by the Government at Taupo, and a good deal of that land was bad, and the rest was worse.

Vote, £29,700, agreed to.

PART III.—Services chargeable to the Moneys raised under "The New Zealand Loan Act, 1886."

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.
Vote, £14,000, agreed to.

CLASS II.—RAILWAYS.

Helensville northwards, £10,000.

Dr. HODGKINSON said this appeared to be a new work, which might be stopped, and a saving made.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the amount spent and the liabilities on the 30th September were £7,832, so there was very little left to spend.

Vote agreed to.

Grahamstown—Te Aroha, £10,000.

Dr. HODGKINSON said he should like some information in this case as to what the liabilities were.

Mr. MITCHELSON said in this case the liabilities were £200 in excess of the vote.

Dr. HODGKINSON said, then it was useless to attempt reduction. Perhaps in all cases the liabilities were in excess of the votes.

Vote agreed to.

Putaruru—Rotorua, £40,000.

Mr. VALENTINE said in this case the liabilities were set down at £50,653. What was the meaning of that?

Mr. MITCHELSON said not more than £40,000 was expected to come in for payment during this year.

Vote agreed to.

Woodville—Palmerston, £40,000.

Mr. ORMOND asked when it was expected to start the tunnel.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it all depended on when the loan was raised. The Government did not intend to let any contracts until it was perfectly certain that the money would be forthcoming to meet them.

Vote agreed to.

Vote, Mangamahoe—Woodville, £37,000, agreed to.

Blenheim—Awatere, £7,000.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON understood it was intended to practically stop the railway with the present contract, to make a dray-road from the end of it to the Awatere, and to build an expensive bridge over the river. The late Government had this matter under consideration all the time they were in office, and they resisted pressure to build this bridge, on the ground that there was very little traffic there, and that it would simply mean making a good roadway to a large tract of very fine land which had been locked up in the hands of a few individuals, and he understood that the building of this bridge would largely enhance the value of that land, while it would be of little use to any one else but the owners of the land until the land was cut up and sold. Therefore he thought the owners of the land should make a contribution towards building the bridge before it was made—the late Government would not make it except on that condition. He did not know if the present Government would take such a course, but he thought it was only fair that those people should be caused to contribute towards the cost of a bridge plainly for their benefit. The same course was taken a few years ago as to the bridge over the Hurunui, where, as the land was almost all held by a few individuals, it was thought right that they should contribute half the cost of the bridge, and it was not put in hand till they did so. It seemed only fair in this case to do the same thing.

Mr. SEDDON said in the Public Works Statement there was this passage:—

"To complete the line to the Awatere would cost about £99,000, which is much more than could be afforded for it out of the loan now proposed. It has therefore been decided to recommend an allocation of £9,000 only, by means of which, in conjunction with existing funds, it will be possible to complete the first five miles at the Blenheim end for traffic, and to connect it with the Awatere by a dray-road, and also to build the railway-bridge over the Awatere for use in the meantime as a road-bridge. This will be a great boon to the locality, as the river is a very dangerous one to cross, and is also the only large river remaining unbridged between Picton and the Bluff."

He believed in fair-play. Here was the Government taking the functions of a County Council, and building a road-bridge for the local bodies. It was called a railway-bridge; but how many years would it be before it was wanted for a railway? The House had determined time after time that that line should not be extended. The bridge should not be made till those owning the land would disgorge something to the State. Here was an express resolution of the House against this line, and yet it was proposed to make what was virtually a part of it. There would be the usual thing in this case—they would spend £9,000 in making the bridge, and then they would be told that the railway must be extended a little further, in order that the State might get some return for the money; and so another political railway would be made, and private estates would be largely enhanced in value. He would draw a comparison between this case and that of the Teremakau. There was no communication between Kumara and Greymouth except by going twenty-five miles over the Marsden Hills, though the direct route would be only fourteen miles if the railway were made. The road was made from Kumara to the beach, within a mile and a half of the bridge, and the road came to within two and a half miles of the bridge on the other side. It would take only £500 to make the railway-bridge serve for a road-bridge. In contrast with the extract he had read from the Public Works Statement he would read the following reply, which the Minister for Public Works had given to the honourable member for Greymouth when asked what he would do in connection with the bridge over the Teremakau. The treatment shown in the two cases was very different, and he thought it his duty to bring the matter under the attention of the honourable gentleman. He would read from Hansard the reply given to the honourable member for Greymouth:—

"Mr. GUINNESS asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether he will take into consideration the advisability of having the railway-bridge over the Teremakau River, on the line of the Greymouth-Hokitika Railway, altered so as to make the bridge suitable for dray traffic?

"Mr. MITCHELSON said the cost of the alteration of this bridge so as to make it a combined one would not be very great, the estimate being £750; but the Government could not recommend this expenditure, as the department had furnished a report stating that a bridge at this place for combined traffic would be exceedingly dangerous, seeing that the approaches were not open to view."

In one case £9,000 could be found for a new bridge; in the other £700 was refused for a work of absolute necessity.

Vote, £7,000, agreed to.

Greymouth-Hokitika, £24,000, agreed to.

Upper Ashburton Branch, £7,000, agreed to.

Livingstone Branch, £6,500, agreed to.

Otago Central, £70,000, agreed to.

Catlin's River Branch, £12,000, agreed to.

Riversdale-Switzers, £3,000, agreed to.

Seaward Bush, £5,000, agreed to.

Wyndham-Fortrose, £9,000, agreed to.

Additions to open lines, £40,000, agreed to.

Permanent-way, sleepers, and rolling-stock, £50,000, agreed to.

Surveys of new lines, £500, agreed to.

CLASS III.

Costs and charges of the loan, £57,500, agreed to.

Public Works, departmental, £6,000.

Mr. TURNBULL asked if it was intended to keep on the Public Works Department at the same expensive rate as during the last two years.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the department would be gradually reduced, so that by the end of the three years and a half it would have assumed very small dimensions. There could not be much reduction this year, as the year was pretty well over; but next year the estimates would show a large reduction.

Mr. SEDDON directed attention to the fact that the Public Works staff on the West Coast was as large as when it had four times the work it now had to do. If no public money was to be spent there, surely there was no necessity for keeping on so large a staff. The number of persons continued to be employed in that office lately was one of the most glaring cases of maladministration to be seen in the whole department.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that as soon as the session was over he would look into these matters. No person would be retained in employment when there was no work for him to do.

Mr. SEDDON said he had been asking all the session for a return showing the cost of supervision and administrative expenditure in connection with public works, but he had been unable to get it. He thought the return had been deliberately kept back so that the House might not have it when this discussion came on.

Major ATKINSON said the Government could have no object in keeping the return back; but the department had been very closely pressed with work lately, and had not had time to prepare it.

Mr. MITCHELSON said he understood the return was now ready, and he would lay it on the table on Monday.

Vote, £6,000, agreed to.

PART III.

CLASS I.

Immigration, £16,820.

Mr. WARD asked the Minister whether the work performed by the Immigration Officer who received a salary of £326 was the same as that performed by the Dépôt-master at Invercargill, who only received £25.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON might say that, owing to the advanced period of the year, the Government were not now able to make any substantial change; but they would deal with the whole question during the recess. As to the general question, the Government had intended to make suggestions in the direction of promoting immigration this session; but the question was so large, and the press of business had been so great, that it had been impossible to do so. The Government had in contemplation the idea of equalising the cost of passage to New Zealand to that from Great Britain to other colonies by reimbursing a portion of the passage-money by land-scrip issuable by the Agent-General; but that could not be dealt with this session. The allowance of £10 made to every nominated immigrant and £10 to each adult who satisfied the Agent-General that he brought £100 in cash with him had worked with highly satisfactory results, the particulars of which were given in the Public Works Statement under the heading "Immigration." During the recess the plan of giving assistance to immigrants of a desirable class by means of land-orders would be fully considered. Practical farmers with capital should be encouraged to come to the colony, and a better guarantee of the suitability of an immigrant could not be asked than the fact of relatives or friends here being willing to advance their proportion of the passage-money.

Mr. MOSS moved, That the whole vote be struck out, on the ground that it would be an indication that next session our loans should be relieved of a burden which was improperly put upon them. What right had we to borrow money to bring immigrants here? If the scheme was a good one, let the cost of it be put on the Land Fund, or on consolidated revenue. The colony had spent nearly forty millions in making the country attractive; and why should we give every person who had £100, and wanted to come out, £10 for doing so? In the present condition of the country the introduction of these immigrants would only have the effect of driving old colonists out of the country; for they could not get employment unless they accepted a rate of wages which was no inducement to them to stay. The only reason why immigration had been adopted in the old days was that it was charged on Land Fund. Public lands were then abundant, and no one objected. Then labouring-men could get a little money, and at once relieve the labour-market by going on the land; but they could not do that now without paying such an amount for the land that it meant ruin. The House had heard a great deal during the last few days of following the example of Victoria; and we had done that in regard to Railway Boards and other matters: why, then, not follow her example in this respect also? Victoria had not found it necessary to borrow one farthing to introduce immigrants, and had not spent as much on that purpose in her whole existence as we had spent upon it out of borrowed money within the last few years. We had spent something like two and a half millions on immigration, and there was no other country in the world which had pursued such an extraordinary course. The House had now before it estimates of money to come out of loan amounting to some £3,150,000, and out of that there was only £1,000,000 for railways. All the rest, £2,150,000, was for purposes not one of which would any other country dream of borrowing money to provide for. This policy could only mean ruin made easy, and he ventured to say that if the House decided to stop paying for immigration out of loan the Treasurer would be more careful what else he put on loan in future. He moved that the vote be struck out, so as to put a stop to a policy so destructive to all hopes of sound finance.

Mr. SEDDON said that if ruin meant keeping up the supply of female immigrants he could tell the honourable gentleman that there were plenty of young fellows on the West Coast who would be very glad to be ruined in that way. If borrowed money was to be spent on roads and bridges, why should it not also be spent in bringing out a very desirable portion of the population? If immigration had not been stopped as far as single women went, there would have been a very much increased population in New Zealand long ago. There were plenty of miners on the West Coast, in good positions, who could not get helpmeets, and even in Wellington and everywhere else there was a demand for female servants which could not be supplied. If immigration were allowed free to single women, the Emigration Officers being careful in their selection, really good girls would come to the colony; on arrival they would get situations, and then send for their relatives, and the most desirable class of population would be obtained.

Mr. ANDERSON thought it was a very injudicious thing on the part of the Government to spend borrowed money on immigration when there were numbers of valuable young men and women drifting from New Zealand to the Australian Colonies. At the present time, when there were so many unemployed, who, unless a paternal Government found them work, would be on the verge of starvation, it was surely unwise to spend money on immigration. He would be in favour of reducing the vote, but not of cutting it out altogether.

Mr. PEACOCK would be glad if the Minister would state that in carrying out immigration steps would be taken so that only those with experience in agricultural and pastoral pursuits would be introduced, and that artisans and mechanics would not be able to take advantage of this vote.

Mr. COWAN hoped the vote would not be reduced. So long as assistance was given to nominated immigrants they could not go wrong, but would get the best class of settlers. He wished to draw attention to the inadequate provision made for the Dépôt-master at Invercargill, the centre of a large agricultural district. In Dunedin £480 was granted, but the Dépôt-master in Invercargill was only to receive 9s. 7d. a day. It seemed to him preposterous.

Mr. KERR said he objected to bringing out pensioners, for they were of no use to this or any other country; and, as to giving lands to people to come here, there were thousands of people here of the best class of settlers who could not get lands. As a rule, farm-labourers who came from Home knew nothing about sheep and very little about agriculture as those pursuits were followed in the colony. He would do all in his power to prevent all immigration but nominated immigration. He did not know how a man with a few hundred pounds was to settle with advantage on land in the country, for in the best times it was all that settlers could do to make a living on the land. He hoped that people with small capital would not come to the country, for they would certainly be ruined, and no good would be done to the country.

Dr. HODGKINSON hoped the vote would be carried, and was surprised to hear any opposition to it. It was not intended to bring out labourers, but to induce men of small means to come, who would be the employers of labour. No better investment for the colony could be made than this, and, if all the public money had been spent as judiciously as it was proposed that this should be, it would have been a very good thing for the country.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE thought it was time that the House very seriously took into consideration the propriety of doing away with this vote altogether. He supposed there was no member who doubted the value of immigration—it was an excellent thing to encourage people to come to the colony; but it was a question of means just now. They could not go on spending loan-money for ever; a new departure must be taken some time, and it seemed to him that this was an appropriate time to take it. The immigration vote had been reduced before. In 1882 it was only £6,000, and in 1883 it was reduced to £3,000, and then it rose again; but during these years the stream came into the country at pretty much the same rate—there was no great variation in it. As to attracting persons of capital to this country, the idea was excellent; but he felt certain that persons fit to become the employers of labour would come out from England without the attraction of a cheap passage. He agreed with the honourable member for Parnell when he said that a vote such as this ought always to come out of the Consolidated Fund; and, if at any time they had a surplus in that fund, it could not be better laid out than in attracting immigrants; but until they could do it out of the Consolidated Fund he maintained it was the most ordinary prudence to do away with the vote. Of all sources of revenue the Land Fund was the one from which money should be taken for attracting immigrants to the country. He hoped this vote would be wiped out.

Mr. W. P. REEVES did not see why this vote should be made a scapegoat when the Committee was passing such enormous sums for useless and unprofitable railways. He certainly did object, however, to that part of the vote which was likely to be spent in introducing nominated immigrants. They could not employ the young men and women who were now in the colony, and it was notorious that they were flocking to the Australian Colonies. There was no career open to them here; and it was perfectly monstrous that they should be paying for importing people while young people, who had the first claim on the colony, were being driven from it for want of employment. It was altogether illogical and wrong; and, if nobody else would attack the vote, he would move, That, in the opinion of this House, nominated immigration should cease altogether. As to pensioners, a more undesirable class of settlers could not be brought into the country, and no money whatever should be spent in their introduction.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said that none of this money was intended to be devoted to that purpose.

Mr. FULTON thought it was time this vote upon the Loan Fund should cease. He should like to know how much of this vote was engaged.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said that all the authority that was asked beyond what was absolutely necessary to meet engagements to the 31st March was £10,000. He thought that was not too much to ask until the Government had time to give the matter full consideration.

Mr. LEVESTAM would like to know what would be done with immigrants when they got here; because it was absurd to talk of bringing people out when there was no work for them. How, too, could a man landing in the colony with a capital of £100 become an employer of labour? If people were brought out at a time when there was no employment for large numbers already in the country, they would only go to swell the ranks of the unemployed.

Mr. FULTON moved, That the vote be reduced by £10,000.

Mr. PEACOCK believed that this contribution of £10 towards their passages would serve as a great inducement to a very desirable class of immigrants.

Dr. NEWMAN said the whole country, from end to end, was flooded with people who were travelling the roads and could not get work, and, if people were brought out who had not sufficient money to enable them to employ labour, they themselves would only swell the ranks of the unemployed. The cities were filled with skilled artisans and others who did not know where to get their next job, and in vain they travelled about from Wellington to Napier, to New Plymouth, and back, in search of employment. The Government would be simply bringing out immigrants to people the Australian Colonies if it continued to bring out those who could not become employers of labour; and in his opinion the amount of £70,000 on the loan-schedule for immigration should be struck out.

Dr. FITCHETT thought it would be right to strike out what was intended for nominated immigration; and, if the vote were reduced by £3,000, the Government should take that as indicating the opinion of the Committee that nominated immigration should cease. If a man, by hard work under the unfavourable conditions of the English labour-market, gave such evidence of thrift and backbone as to be possessed of £100, he thought such a man would be certain to succeed in New Zealand, and that was a very desirable class of settler to introduce.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said the object of the first immigration vote, and the ostensible object of every such vote since, had been to provide labour for the public works. Now we were cutting down the public-works expenditure, and yet it was asked that we should import labour. It was perfectly evident that there was now more than enough labour in the colony for our reduced public works, and therefore to vote money for immigration was simply throwing it away. As to bringing out people with capital at the cost of the colony, would it not be far wiser to give the money to provide with capital people already in the country, to enable them to go on the land—hand it to young farmers who wanted to go on land, but whose means were too small? Here we were actually throwing away money to provide a thing we did not want. More than that, we were actually going into debt to do it, for it was to be done with borrowed money. It was the maddest thing ever done, and he earnestly hoped the vote would not be passed. The vote for this purpose had, after much fighting, been reduced some years ago, and yet it was now proposed to increase it again, when it was less wanted than ever, merely to satisfy the cry of a few people who had fads in their heads.

Mr. W. P. REEVES said, if the amendment of the honourable member for the Taieri were lost he should move to reduce the vote by £3,000.

Mr. MOSS said there had been an attack on this vote for years past, and a small reduction had always been made, which the Minister as constantly said he would accept as an indication of the views of the Committee. But the Committee had never succeeded in getting effect given to its wishes, and it never would until it struck out the vote altogether. They should not allow this vote to appear on the loan estimates at all. Put it, if it must be voted, on the consolidated revenue, and then it would at least be kept within due bounds. They had begun the session with great intentions of reform; yet a more mad appropriation of loan-money than the present estimates displayed was never asked for in the House. Out of over three millions proposed on these so-called public-works estimates, less than one million was for railways. How could any country stand such a policy? It was worse than anything he had yet seen. Only one-third of the money was for railways; yet they were told last session by the then Government that there was to be no more borrowing except for railways. Now we were to spend less than one million for railways, and over two millions for all kinds of other purposes. They should strike out the whole vote, as an indication of the will of the Committee that they did not wish immigration, at all events, to appear again on the estimates; or, if any of the vote was left, it should be just sufficient to meet liabilities already incurred, and not one pound more. He did think it was high time they made a firm stand, so that the vote should never more appear on the estimates.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the vote of £16,720 must be passed, if the Committee did not want the Government to be unable to meet its liabilities. It would be quite open to decide as to what should be done in the future; but the amount now asked for there was no option about.

Mr. CADMAN asked what were the duties of the Immigration Officers. Over £1,300 was set down for their salaries, which seemed a very large sum to administer so small a vote. What could these officers have to do, now that immigration had virtually stopped?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the whole matter would be revised by the Government. At present things were set down just as they had stood in the past.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said it appeared impossible to cut down the vote by £10,000, as proposed; but they ought to obtain an assurance from the Government that no further sum should be spent on immigration. They must vote this £16,720, after the Minister's explanation; but they should express an opinion which would induce the Government to stop spending money on immigration beyond the amount the Committee was now asked to vote. He hoped that would be done.

Mr. MILLS hoped, as there was so much business yet to be done, they would not spend more time in discussing whether they should vote what had already been spent, and therefore what must be voted. They would be fully able to come to a decision and express their views as to further expenditure on immigration when on the schedule of the Loan Bill, which included £70,000 for immigration.

Mr. FULTON said the Committee should come to a decision which would prevent commitments being made in the future. They could do that by reducing the vote by £10,000, as he proposed. The Minister would then have to meet his engagements out of unauthorised expenditure, and no harm would be done, and the honourable gentleman would recognise the wish of the Committee that he should not make any further engagements at all. It would therefore be quite competent for the Committee to cut down the vote by £10,000. It was a matter that deserved the most careful consideration.

Mr. KELLY said this vote was very small, and there were many people in the colony who wanted to nominate their friends at Home. Every person landed in the colony was worth £7 a year to the colony, and so in less than the two years he repaid the colony the £10 it might spend to get him here. He hoped honourable members would not take so narrow a view of this matter as many of them seemed inclined to do. He should support the vote.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said, if the honourable member for the Taieri insisted on pressing his amendment to reduce the item by £10,000 he would lose the votes of many honourable members, because it had been shown that it was impossible to reduce it by so much. He thought the Committee might express its decided opinion by reducing the vote by £20. If the amendment of the honourable member for the Taieri was not carried he should move to reduce the vote by £20, so as to enable the Committee to plainly express its opinion to the Government that there should be no further expenditure at all on immigration.

Mr. TAIWHANGA could not understand why there should be so much objection to this vote on the part of the European members. The introduction of people to the country meant an increase to the revenue, and if the right sort of people were brought out it increased the value of the land, and made things prosperous. If the Natives had control of their own lands they would soon raise a loan on them, and spend it in bringing people out to the country, because they could see, if the Europeans could not see it, that they would greatly add to the value of their lands by so doing.

Mr. BEETHAM congratulated the honourable member for the Northern Maori District on the common-sense tone of his remarks, which offered a very good example to many members who had had great experience in the House. It seemed as if some honourable members thought that New Zealand was going to be saved by a cheeseparing policy; but he had no such notion. He believed that, if the colony was to be put on the right path again, it must be by a systematic method of dealing with the Crown lands, and the introduction of the proper class of people; and money spent in that direction would be well spent. He had been surprised at the remarks which had fallen from some honourable members whom he had always regarded as men of common-sense, in regard to this question. Among these he included the honourable member for the Taieri, and he confessed that he could not understand that honourable gentleman taking up the line of argument he had taken up. It was in remarkable contrast with what had fallen from the honourable member for the Northern Maori District, who had grasped the idea of borrowing money to settle his lands, just as any business-man would do.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH thought that, if this vote were placed on the estimates for the purpose of attracting population to the colony, for the purpose of inducing people with capital to come, it would have just the opposite effect. The English farmer with a little capital, before he decided to emigrate, looked a little into the affairs of the country he was thinking of going to; and if he found that the Government of the colony were taking votes year after year out of loan, in order to introduce population to the country,—if he found that useless railways were being constructed,—if he found that it was hard to get land except at a high price,—if he found that, when he got out here and got a piece of land, the next day in all probability a bursting-up land-tax would be put upon him, or, at any rate, that the imposition of a tax of that sort was a question within the range of practical politics in the colony,—if he found that, should he be absent from the colony for a year, he would be treated as an absentee, and specially taxed, if some people could have their way,—if he found that there was a sort of war being carried on against settlers,—if he found that there were all sorts of proposals to harass a settler who acquired a little money,—if an intending emigrant found out these things, he would naturally eschew the country where such things were done, where such things were seriously talked of. So long as steps were taken to continue bringing out immigrants by borrowing, by heaping up the debt, our action would have the strongest tendency to prevent honest, hardworking, sensible farmers from coming to the colony. With regard to the nominated immigrants he thought that the honourable member for the Northern Maori District and the honourable member for Masterton had this point in common: They both looked upon immigration from the point of view of an increase in the value of landed property which they already possessed. If he had a large estate in the colony he should decidedly try to get the taxpayer to join in paying to introduce population into it, because it would undoubtedly have the effect of enhancing the value of the estate which he possessed; but he would submit to the House and to those who were interested in landed property that in the present circumstances that was a shortsighted policy, a policy which must recoil upon the landowners themselves; for the more people that were introduced into the colony during a time of depression the stronger would become the cry of the landless for a share in those estates which the landowners possessed, and the greater would be the political difficulties which the landowners would make for themselves. To force into the colony more labour than capital could employ would lead to greater political disturbance than we had yet seen; and he was convinced that injudicious action of this kind in the past had led to a great deal of the trouble that had been experienced. If population had been allowed to come to the colony in its natural course, and had settled itself into the natural industries of the colony, there would have been none of this political ebb and flow of the wildest kind that they had at the present time. He was surprised that those honourable gentlemen who were landowners had not by this time learned prudence by experience. He should certainly vote for the amendment.

Mr. Kelly

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE said it appeared to him that many speakers had misconceived the nature of the objections which he and others had raised against this vote. It was not a question of cheeseparing as against extravagance, as the honourable member for Masterton had said; it was not a question of stopping immigration, as he had suggested—many of the members who were opposing this vote were quite in favour of immigration being encouraged: the question was as to the source from which the money was to come. What he objected to was the money coming out of loan. If the revenue would not supply the money necessary for this purpose, no money should be spent in this direction. The time would soon come when there would be no money to spend out of loan; and the colony might as well at once commence with this item in reducing their loan expenditure. This money was put down on the estimates more from habit than from anything else.

Mr. BRUCE could not help thinking that there was a very great deal of misapprehension in reference to the value of immigration to the colony. It had been stated that an immigrant was worth so much to New Zealand—a man at a certain time of life, or of a certain occupation. Some honourable gentlemen thought that such a man was worth £200. At any rate, different estimates were placed before the House from time to time. But, as a matter of fact, those estimates were what he might call jumping at conclusions; because colonising must extend. These men went into the bush and settled the country; but they required roads to be made for them, and required educational expenditure in outlying districts, which in reality was of an expensive character: and therefore he did not believe that immigration, from some points of view, was so beneficial as some people were inclined to believe. However, he quite admitted the value of immigrants of the right class; and what he wished to impress upon the Committee was this: that the House must strive to preserve the equilibrium between labour and capital. It must not introduce more labour into New Zealand than the capital of the colony could absorb, and he thought that at the present time, when the price of produce was so low—so low as compared with what it had been—it would be injudicious to spend money out of loan on the introduction of labourers. As to introducing men of capital, he did not believe that any of these fancy schemes would have much result in that direction. If the colony adopted wise methods of disposing of the land, if the land was sold to people on as favourable terms as they could secure by crossing the Atlantic, if the colony gave them freehold tenure, and did not disturb the political system by fads—if he might use such a term—like perpetual leasing, then the colony would, he doubted not, get its share of the best class of immigrants. He had listened with a little surprise, he must admit, to the argument that immigration would increase the price of land, and must be supported for that reason. He had a little land in the colony, and he would like to see it increase in value; but he would not endeavour to indirectly increase its value by borrowing money on it to spend on immigration. That would be a very bad investment, for the reasons pointed out by the honourable member for the Taieri.

Sir G. GREY thought there was a considerable misunderstanding as to this vote. The honourable gentleman who last spoke pointed very justly to the equilibrium which should be maintained between the supply of labour and the demand for it, and he could not help thinking we should never get that by using borrowed money to import labour. The true measure of equilibrium would be, that our revenue should be so large, and we were paid such a price for our produce, that there was a demand for labour in the colony. Then we might import labour at the public expense. But we should remember that to ask the whole population to tax themselves in order to introduce labour at the present time would be absolute cruelty. Nothing could be more humiliating to human beings, many of whom could not get work for themselves, than to be called upon to contribute out of the small sums they possessed to make it more difficult for them to live and to support their families. The Government had positively refused to adopt a plan proposed to them of encouraging settlement on the land by the young people of our own population; and, if they were going to give bounties to people for settling on the land, those bounties should be given to our own young people. But that had been refused, and at the very same time the Government was going to give bounties to foreigners to come here and increase the distress which already existed. Persons living in the colony could not get land; and what could be more cruel than to say to them that they should be taxed to introduce people with the absolute intention of increasing the price of land, and rendering the wealthy more wealthy than they were? He thought that, having refused to aid our own people to get on the land, and having refused to take off the burden which pressed upon them in the form of too high rents, the House was bound to refuse to pay one single penny in the way of taxation to introduce immigrants. A policy of justice, good-faith, and mercy to their fellow-countrymen called upon them to follow this course, and he would vote for a motion that would take from the Government the power of introducing any immigrants at the public expense.

Mr. BEETHAM had not heard what fell from the honourable member for Mount Ida, but he would like that honourable gentleman to understand that he did not apply his remarks to this vote, but referred to the action of the honourable gentleman, and of the honourable member for the Taieri, as being against the principle of the vote. He alluded to the future, and argued that the cutting-down of the salaries of the Civil servants, and such savings, would not do for New Zealand what would be done by a policy which would introduce a proper class of settlers on the land.

Major ATKINSON said the Government had in no way refused to provide means for the settlement of our own people on the land. They had passed an Act this session which would greatly facilitate that, and he did not wish it to go forth that the action of the House had been adverse to settlement. Nor had they refused to relieve those persons who were suffering from too high rents, for they had also made provision against that, so that no one should suffer between this time and such time as Parliament would meet again. With regard to the vote now before them, there was one thing on which they were all agreed, and that was that they did not want to introduce a large quantity of labour. As far as he had listened to the arguments, he had not heard a single honourable member propose that; but speakers who had opposed the immigration vote seemed to assume that this was the object of it. That was not its object, and that would not be its result. There were two special difficulties in the way of getting suitable immigrants to come here: one was the uncertainty of our land-laws, and the other was the fear of taxation. That deterred a large number of our own young men from going on the land, and induced them to seek other employment, as he could say from personal experience amongst his own neighbours. That was one great difficulty; and another was that we were at the end of the world, and the passage-money here was a serious item as compared with the passage-money to other colonies, which were offering favourable terms and good land. It seemed to him that, if the Government could by any means equalise the passage-money, with the great advantages of climate and soil and other matters which New Zealand had, we could greatly increase our immigration. He hoped that the present Land Act would enable them by next session to have got matters into such a shape that persons coming from England, as well as our own young men, would be able to get land without difficulty, and without having to knock about the towns for month after month without being able to get the land they wanted. He hoped, also, that they would be able to contrive some means by which people with moderate capital could come to this colony at something like the cost at which they could get to other colonies which were competing with us. To do that we must give them some assistance, either in money or in land-grants, which latter he would much prefer if we could afford it. He agreed with those who said that all this should come from surplus Land Fund; but was it wise, in our present position, while greatly reducing borrowing, and endeavouring—and, he hoped, successfully—to bring it to an end, and while we were still using borrowed money for making roads and railways, to cease to give assistance to the introduction of that class of immigrants which the colony wanted—namely, the small farmers? He could not, perhaps, see as far as some honourable members, and was not prepared to take the heroic measures they would. They no doubt believed honestly that by stopping borrowing suddenly the colony would recover more rapidly than under the proposals of the Government; but he contended that it would not; and, believing that, he asked, would they be wise in cutting off all immigration of a proper class until the consolidated revenue was restored? He ventured to say that for two or three years, unless our produce greatly increased in price, it would be absolutely impossible to provide out of revenue any amount of money to devote to this purpose—that was, to equalising the passage-money to this colony to that paid to get to other colonies. Would it not be wise to put aside a moderate amount for that purpose? To his mind it would be, and that was the reason why he wished to see this vote passed. He did not believe in introducing more labour: that would be a fatal mistake, and do a great deal of harm. Nor had he any leaning towards raising the price of land. One of the great difficulties at the present time was that the land was at a fictitious value, and above what it would produce. He hoped the Committee would not be carried away by any sentiment or any idea that the Government were proposing to introduce labour with a view to raise the price of land. He would be no party to such a thing; but he would be a party to equalising the cost of passage to New Zealand to that to other colonies; and, if, under liberal land-laws, people, on their arrival here, could at once get their land, that was what was wanted. The colony could not afford to give very special inducements, as some honourable gentlemen would do, to our young men to go on the land; it could not afford to build houses and stock their land for them; but the Government had proposed and carried measures which would enable the young men of New Zealand to get land at a reasonable rate, and without the difficulty that had hitherto existed. He hoped the Committee would see its way to granting this vote, as it was one on which he considered our prosperity greatly depended.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE said that, notwithstanding what the Premier had stated, he hoped the Committee would not grant this vote. The Premier had said what was no doubt worthy of attention, but nothing to induce them to continue expenditure for this purpose. He had said something about an heroic policy; but it was not heroism that was demanded, for what was proposed was not a reduction in the sum that had for some time back been spent upon immigration, but an increase. Then, as to the attraction of capital here, it was not in the least necessary to spend money upon immigration to attract persons here who would become the employers of labour. He believed that the cessation of borrowing would render the country much more attractive to persons who would become the employers of labour than a paltry vote of this character. The Premier must have forgotten that Victoria attracted a far larger number of persons than New Zealand did, although Victoria spent no money on immigration. There was no doubt at all that, if they were to spend money for this purpose, it should be out of revenue. To ake it from loan was a most pernicious and extravagant policy.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN wished to point out that, though the Premier had said that one of the great difficulties we had to contend with was the high price of land, he proposed to introduce immigrants with capital, who would compete for the land, and thus increase its value. He (Mr. O'Callaghan) wished to know why they should spend borrowed money to import those who would compete for land the price of which was too high already.

Sir G. GREY was satisfied they ought not to allow immigration to go on. The Premier had made no answer whatever to the objection that was a cruel proposal to ask the people of this country to tax themselves to do that which would increase their miseries. Let the Premier open the lands of the country on some wise and fair principle. No such principle was developed in the present Land Bill, which was a mere repetition of old things tried before ad nauseam, and which had been of no good whatever. Let him march with the progress of the times. Other countries were giving land for nothing—land of the finest kind—and requiring only a short residence of three years, and were giving funds to help immigrants. That assistance was given to foreigners, while we were doing nothing. The subject had been grossly neglected during the present session; and it was the duty of the Committee to have recourse to the heroic policy of absolutely refusing to vote any sums at all for immigration during the present session.

Mr. R. THOMPSON thought the time had arrived when they should cease to spend borrowed money on immigration; and he trusted the Committee would carry the amendment as an indication that borrowed money should be no longer spent for this purpose. At the present time the best class of our young men, the sons of country settlers, were leaving the colony by the hundred, because there was no inducement to them to settle on the land. He hoped the Committee would take a decided stand, and support the amendment of the honourable member for the Taieri.

Mr. GRIMMOND said the honourable member for Auckland Central had asked them to adopt the heroic policy of throwing out this vote; but he thought it would be an instance of Spartan heroism if, when we had no money of our own, we borrowed money to bring people out to compete with us. He hoped the House would agree to the amendment of the honourable member for the Taieri. They had heard that it was not intended to bring out labourers, but he thought that immigration was for the purpose of bringing in a supply of labour when it was required. Why should they borrow money to bring out wealthy people? Was it intended that they should bring out tourists to look at the country?

Mr. TANNER said this was not a fresh plan for immigration, but merely a proposal affecting the unexpended balance, which was to be applied so as to induce the very class of persons to come out that everybody had been declaring the country wanted—people who would bring out capital with them and settle upon the lands. It was to him utterly inexplicable that obstacles should be thrown in the way of this vote.

Mr. SAMUEL thought it must be clear that the object of the vote was not to procure cheap labour. He believed that no Government could continue in office that would use an immigration vote for that purpose; and therefore, to put it on the lowest ground, no Government would, for its own sake, use the money for such a purpose. What was to be done was to offer facilities to the right class of immigrants to come here. They might safely vote this sum, and he might say he wished its amount had been larger, and that some of the money they were devoting to public buildings and unproductive works had been applied to this purpose.

Mr. TURNBULL would specially point out to the Colonial Treasurer that he would not need to go to England for people with capital if the lands of the colony were opened up. He knew of numbers of men who had saved up considerable sums, and had left New Zealand for Australia, simply because they could not get land here. But if the land were opened, as was expected under the new Land Bill, these people would return to New Zealand from Australia, and settle permanently in this country. There was no hope of this so long as twelve million acres were held under lease by only 1,924 persons. As soon as the land was thrown open for bonâ fide settlement they would have no need to go to England for settlers, as those who had gone to Australia would return and take up land.

Mr. TAYLOR said they would be simply throwing money away if they used it for the purpose of bringing out people with capital, unless these people were bound to reside in the colony for a certain time. Otherwise they would simply go over to Australia.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the vote, 'Immigration, £16,720,' be reduced by £10,000."

CONSOLIDATED FUND.

CLASS I.—LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

Vote, Legislative Department, £26,000.

Mr. PEACOCK hoped the Premier would state the intentions of the Government about this vote.

Major ATKINSON said it was proposed to take off the amounts in addition to statutory salaries, not to pay Chairmen of Select Committees, and to make reasonable reductions in other officers' salaries.

Mr. PEACOCK asked when the reductions would take effect.

Major ATKINSON said nine months of the financial year had already expired, and the officers had drawn the present rates for that time, and they should of course receive proper notice of the reduction. The House would no doubt wish its officers to receive proper notice before any reduction was made.

Mr. FULTON said there was another question which had engaged the attention of the Committee year after year, and that was as to who was responsible for these estimates. They had always been told that virtually no one was responsible, but that the Government merely submitted the estimates as they were given in by the Speakers. He would like to have an assurance from the Premier as to what would be the course in future.

Dr. NEWMAN thought the reduction mentioned by the Premier in the case of statutory officers would be altogether too sweeping. Some of these officers had been over twenty years in the service, and, considering the circumstances of each case, it would be altogether too sweeping to take off 25 per cent. of their salaries at one swoop. It was far more than the needs of the country required, and, in fact, it was panic legislation.

Mr. PEACOCK said what he wanted to clearly understand was, when the reduction on the present emoluments was to begin to take effect. He had not ascertained that yet.

Major ATKINSON took it that the House would wish to give reasonable notice to its officers before their positions were affected. Practically, no reduction could be made this year; but there might be an intimation to the Government that amounts over the statutory sums were not to appear again on the estimates, nor were the payments to Chairmen of Select Committees to appear. As to the Government taking charge of the Legislative estimates, he had promised the House that he would consult the Speakers on the subject; but he regretted to say that he had not done so, and could not make a definite statement, lest it should appear discourteous to the Speakers. But the Government had come to the conclusion that they ought to be responsible, and therefore he should consult the Speakers and endeavour to make that change. No doubt, constitutionally the Government were responsible.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN thought it advisable the Premier should point out the intended reductions in each item.

Major ATKINSON said he thought that would be unnecessary, and, indeed, a waste of time. The reductions he had indicated would be made, and the salaries of non-statutory officers would be reasonably reduced where it was considered advisable. He took it the House desired that all public servants should have proper notice of any change affecting them. That was the proposal of the Government.

Mr. O'CONOR said the Governor's salary, the salaries of Ministers, and the payments to members had all been reduced, though they had been fixed by statute, and the reason urged was that they should set an example in economy. Was the thing to stop short there, or were they to follow it up with the public officers? He thought, unless that was done, it would be very unfair. The House expected the Government to show a thorough revision of the departmental expenditure, and there was no place where revision was more required than in those Chambers. A Committee, of which he was Chairman, had, in a recent session, inquired fully into and reported on the whole subject, and had shown that they were paying to gentlemen large salaries for three months' work—that those gentlemen were receiving salaries for many months when they were doing no work whatever. He was sure the majority of honourable members expected that the expenditure in this department would be brought within reasonable limits.

Major ATKINSON said that was the proposal of the Government.

Mr. O'CONOR said he should like to see the Premier take the whole of these departmental estimates and recast them, showing the reductions. He thought the Government should lead them in effecting a very considerable reduction in both Houses.

Major ATKINSON said the Government did not propose to reduce the salaries fixed by statute. It might be that, on full consideration, the Government might see fit next session to propose a revision of all statutory salaries; but as to that he could not say. The comparison between the payments to members and Ministers and those to permanent officers would not stand, for the position was not the same in the different cases. Honourable members were not Civil servants at all; they were not earning their living from their public position; they were, so to speak, political officers. The same rule could not apply to honourable members as to permanent officers, whether in the Legislative Department or in the ordinary Civil Service. All public officers should receive fair and reasonable notice before any reduction took place in their salaries. He hoped honourable gentlemen would mark the distinction between permanent officers and political officers.

Mr. PEACOCK asked if it was proposed, in cases where there were statutory salaries and additional sums added to those salaries, to take away those additional sums in respect of the portion of the financial year yet unexpired.

Major ATKINSON said it was proposed to touch no officer's salary without giving reasonable notice to the officer, and Legislative officers would have the same notice of reduction as the rest of the Civil servants. The Government would proceed, after the prorogation, as soon as they had recovered from the fatigues of the session, with the work of reorganization, and proper notice would be given to every one as to what reductions were intended affecting them.

Mr. BARRON asked if it was the intention of the Government to take the Legislative Department under their own control, as suggested by a Committee of the House, instead of leaving it under the control of the two Speakers. The late Premier endeavoured to make the change, but found it was impossible to effect it. If the present Premier was placed in the same difficulty, what step did he propose to take to assert the constitutional right of the Government to assume control of that department?

Major ATKINSON presumed that, if the constitutional right to that control existed—and he had no doubt of it—there would be no difficulty in asserting it. The custom had been for the two Speakers to send in their estimates, and, owing to a feeling of delicacy or to a desire to get out of a difficulty, Ministers had not interfered with those estimates or taken any responsibility for them. But he had no doubt that, constitutionally, Ministers were responsible. He was sorry that it had slipped his memory to see the Speakers. But he had not done so, and, of course, as a habit had grown up in connection with these matters, one did not like to assume an authority which had fallen into disuse, without a little consultation. But he could say this: that when next year's estimates for the Legislative Department came up the Government would be able to distinctly tell the House what items they recommended to Parliament.

Mr. WARD asked whether the Government intended next year to propose an alteration in the amounts fixed by Act for officers such as the Speakers.

Major ATKINSON said that was a matter which the Government would have to take into consideration during the recess.

Mr. WALKER asked if it was the intention of the Government to give notice to officers whose salaries were to be reduced, and, if so, what notice would be given.

Major ATKINSON said that reasonable notice would be given to all officers of the House. They would be all treated alike. As soon as the Government got to business they would give notice all round. He thought the House desired that its officials should be treated with as much tenderness as was possible under the circumstances.

Mr. HUTCHISON took the item, "Legislative Council—Chairman of Committees (also by Act, £300), £120." He understood the Premier did not propose to interfere with the £300; but did he intend to alter or reduce the £120?

Major ATKINSON.—Not this session.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked, why not? This was a political officer. He was on the same footing as the Chairman of Committees of the House of Representatives, he was elected to his office like other honourable members, and, like other honourable members, he should be cut down. He (Mr. Hutchison) did not see why this officer in the Legislative Council should not be reduced; and he would move to strike that item out.

Mr. LEVESTAM did not see why these items should not be all reviewed, whether they were fixed by Act or not. The honorarium was fixed by Act, and honourable members had been elected under the terms of that Act as to payment. Yet the Act had been altered, to set an example, as it had been put. Why, then, should the example not be followed? What difference was there between altering an Act to reduce the honorarium and altering an Act to reduce these salaries? If these salaries were not to be altered the Premier should put a vote on the supplementary estimates to restore to members the lost honorarium.

Mr. SAMUEL agreed that the Government had acted wisely in beginning with the Governor, though the present occupant of the office could not be affected, and then going on to reduce their own salaries and the honorarium of members. As to the mode of these reductions, the Government had a perfect right to determine when they would make the reduction apply to themselves. No one could object to that. Neither could there be any objection to honourable members reducing their own emoluments retrospectively, because the matter rested with themselves, and they could do as they pleased, or as a majority of them pleased. All these reductions were carried out by the parties affected themselves, and it was for themselves to determine when they should take effect. But, when they came to deal with officers of the House, and Civil servants, a different principle came into play. These persons had accepted office on the understanding that they were to be paid a certain amount per annum, a part of which had been fixed by statute, and the other part of which had been voted session after session; so that they had a perfect right to suppose when they accepted office that they would be paid these amounts. That was true in fact, whatever it might be in law. Therefore he thought that, so far as this session was concerned, they should be paid as usual; but next session they would commence their work under the different terms that the Government and the House might decide upon. Then, as to members of the Civil Service, the House should act honourably and straightforwardly with them. Notice should be given that, after a certain date, giving them fair notice, we should not be prepared to pay them so much as we had hitherto been paying them, and during that time it would be for them to consider whether they would take the reduced salary or not. If they chose to take it, of course they would accept the position at the lower salary. If they thought they could do better they would seek other employment, and they would have time during which to seek other employment. The colony should treat its employes just as private employers treated their employes. He hoped honourable members would take a fair view of this matter. They had acted generously to the colony in reducing their own honorarium—for it was a generous act—and he hoped that they would not spoil the effect of their generosity by acting ungenerously and unhandsomely to the employes of the colony.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said the argument of the Premier with regard to gentlemen who were receiving salaries would apply to the Chairmen of Committees, and in their case the reduction was to be retrospective. Therefore it ought to apply to the other cases. The constituencies had expected that these reductions would be made this session, and there could be no doubt that the officers of the Legislature had expected it, and that ought to be sufficient notice to them, without any actual notice being given to them.

Major ATKINSON said the Chairmen of Committees stood in the same class as other members of the House. He thought it would be shabby to knock the additional amounts off; but, of course, it would rest with the Committee to decide, although he must say that, looking at the services these officers rendered, the offices they held, and the losses they were liable to suffer—for he believed that one Chairman lost both his salary and his honorarium—he did not think it fair to strike these sums off.

Mr. FISH demurred to what the honourable member for New Plymouth had said. These estimates should have been passed four or five months ago, therefore it would not be right that reductions should be made for that period; but the officers of the House knew that the House had full power to deal with their salaries, and so did all the Civil servants, and therefore there would be nothing unfair in making reductions for the rest of the year. That was also the intention of the Premier, as was shown by the first page of the estimates; and, as they had reduced Ministers' salaries and the honorarium of honourable members, every one else ought to be put on the same footing. He must, however, point out that there was something misleading in the estimates as put before the House. The Government said they intended to reduce the £26,000, set down this year, to £15,000; but out of that difference had to come £9,000 for extra expenses for last session, so that the real reduction was only about £2,000. He would support any honourable member who would move that the reduction should apply to the remainder of the year.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN would point out that in Table 9 attached to the Financial Statement, which showed the proposed reductions in the estimates, there was no mention at all of any reduction in the Legislative Department. Therefore he thought the House should take the matter in hand itself and say where reductions were to be made.

Mr. O'CONOR said his expectation was that the Government would take in hand the administration of the Civil servants attached to the two Chambers, and that, in doing that, they would make reforms and reductions in the same way as they proposed with regard to the other Civil servants. He saw no indication of that in the proposals which were brought down. He did not want to do injustice to any one, but he would like to see a thorough reorganization of the Legislative Department, which would effect economy. It appeared by the proposals before them that the House was not to have an opportunity of expressing its views and saying what reductions should be made.

Mr. TURNBULL said that in the Financial Statement the Treasurer said that he proposed to make savings to the extent of £71,000 to the end of the current year: he would like to know whether it was the intention of the Premier to carry that out.

Major ATKINSON did not think the Government would be able to do that now, as they had expected that Parliament would be prorogued at least a month sooner.

Mr. GOLDIE thought that the officers whose salaries were fixed by Act should be paid that sum and no more, and, to effect this, he would move, That the vote be reduced by the sum of £720.

Dr. NEWMAN said that had an all-round reduction of 10 per cent. been proposed there would have been a keen discussion upon it, and probably it would not have been carried; but the proposal now made would reduce some of the salaries by 20 per cent. The Assistant Clerk had been twenty-four years in office, and it was proposed to reduce his salary by 20 per cent. He (Dr. Newman) ventured to think that the proposal was grossly unjust.

Mr. W. D. STEWART thought there was a very obvious distinction between what might be termed the political officers of the House and the servants of the House. The Speakers and Chairmen of Committees, he held, should be confined to their statutory salaries; but it would not be fair to interfere with the salaries of the servants of the House except upon proper notice, and until that notice was given they should receive the same salaries as hitherto.

Mr. MILLS agreed with the remark of the last speaker that the salaries of officials should not be reduced without notice. That was a matter that should be left to the Government to adjust. The Speakers and the Chairmen of Committees, being members of the Parliament, should share the same fate as members generally, and have their salaries reduced; but he thought that one-half of the supplementary salaries should be granted to them, to cover the period up to the time of their election. The supplementary salaries should not be drawn by them for the latter part of the year, as reductions were anticipated and were made a prominent feature during the elections. Perhaps these amounts should be reduced by one-half.

Mr. FISH trusted the motion of the honourable member for Auckland West would be assented to. If the House did not do that, then the retrenchment cry was a miserable and utter sham. He would point out that the reduction proposed by the honourable member for Auckland West was about the same percentage as the reduction that had taken place on the honorarium. The Speakers and Chairmen of Committees of the Houses should be reduced the same as other members of the Houses; and he considered that the salaries which had been paid to them hitherto had been much too high.

Mr. PEACOCK thought it was a question whether the extra allowance granted to the Clerk and Clerk-Assistant of the House, and the Clerk of the Council, had not practically become a part of their salaries. He was, of course, speaking of them as altogether distinct from the political officers of the House. The House, he thought, would be quite justified in entirely taking off the extra allowance from its political officers; but it did not necessarily follow that they would be justified in making such large reductions in the salaries of the permanent officers.

Mr. TURNBULL considered it was a pity they had passed the Bills they had passed, because he could see that if they had got into the estimates first there would have been no reductions at all.

Major ATKINSON would like to point out that the Committee was mixing up the salaries of two distinct classes. The money had already been voted by interim supplies, and the salaries paid up to the present time to the permanent officers of the House on the basis of the last estimates; and these officers were practically Civil servants; but that was not the case with the Speaker and Chairman of Committees. He would like also to say that some fifty or sixty members were not reduced at all this year, except to the extent of £5; they would receive within £5 of the amount they would have had for both sessions under the old Act.

Mr. BEETHAM said that honourable members were losing sight of the fact that there were two sessions this year, and the officers of the House received only the same annual pay.

Mr. GOLDIE withdrew his amendment.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN moved, That the vote be reduced by striking out the following items: Chairman of Committees, Legislative Council, £120; Chairman of Public Petitions Committee, Legislative Council, £50; Mr. Speaker, House of Representatives, £200; Chairman of Committees, House of Representatives, £100; Chairman of Public Petitions Committee, House of Representatives, £100; Chairman of Native Affairs Committee, House of Representatives, £100.

Sir G. GREY thought the Colonial Treasurer should give some indication of the reductions which it was intended to effect in the Legislative Department.

Major ATKINSON said the Government had never had charge of these estimates, and they had never been thought out by the Government. It would be their duty during the recess to give the matter full consideration.

Mr. HUTCHISON drew the attention of the Premier to the fact that under the Pensions Act of 1884 a saving could be effected even upon the amount payable under the Act to the Speaker of the Legislative Council, inasmuch as he had recently been appointed to that office. The 6th section of the Act related to the point to which he now drew the Premier's attention.

Major ATKINSON said he would look into the matter, and was obliged to the honourable gentleman for drawing his attention to it.

Mr. O'Callaghan's amendment, reducing the vote by £670, was agreed to.

Mr. TURNBULL moved, That the item, "Serjeant-at-Arms, £250," be reduced by £5. He moved this as an indication that next year they did not require this officer.

Mr. W. D. STEWART said the Serjeant-at-Arms was a very necessary officer. He thought, however, they might do away with one of the Interpreters, seeing that two of the Maori members spoke English.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the vote, £25,330, be further reduced by £5."

LAND BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, disagreeing with the amendments made by the Legislative Council in respect to clauses 33 and 34 of the Land Bill, and transmitting the following reasons for so doing:—

"(1.) That the change in the constitution of the Boards was approved by a large majority of the House of Representatives.

"(2.) That a system of elective Land Boards brings the working of the Lands Department under the review and control of the public, the proceedings of the Board being open to the public and the Press.

"(3.) That a Commissioner would be subject to pressure difficult to withstand except by the assistance and advice of a Board, and that a Minister having extreme views could administer the Land Act partially except for such a check, the Commissioner being his servant, and subject to dismissal by him.

"(4.) That the local knowledge of the members of the Board as to the requirements of settlement and the price of land is invaluable.

"(5.) That a feeling of security is engendered by selectors knowing that in the Board they have a Court of appeal from arbitrary decisions of a Government."

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved, That the Council insist on their amendments in the Land Bill with which the House of Representatives have disagreed; and that the Hon. Mr. Bonar, the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, and the mover be appointed a Committee to prepare reasons for the Council so insisting.

Agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS subsequently brought up the following reasons for insisting on the amendments made by the Council in the Land Bill:—

"(1.) That the amendments disagreed with were carried by a large majority of the Legislative Council.

"(2.) That, as the Commissioner would, by subsection (6) of clause 84, have to exercise his functions in the mode prescribed to the Board, publicity would be the same in the one case as in the other.

"(3.) That the tendency of elective Land Boards is to weaken the responsibility of Government in matters of land-administration.

"(4.) That the Commissioners have in all cases sufficient knowledge to enable them to judge as to the requirements and the prices of land.

"(5.) That the feeling of security in the decision of the Commissioner would be strengthened by the knowledge that he is not controlled by local influences, more especially as there will be a right of appeal direct to the Government against any arbitrary decision of the Commissioners.

"(6.) That in several instances the expenses of the Board are out of proportion to the returns of revenue; and, in the interests of economy, the change made by the Council is desirable."

He moved, That the reasons be agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—Before the Council agrees to those reasons, I wish to state that I disagree with them. However, I will not detain the Council by expressing my own individual opinions and my reasons for disagreeing, because I am aware that the feeling of the Council is against me. But I mention this now, so that hereafter the fact may not be overlooked that I disagreed with those reasons, and agree with the reasons which led the House of Representatives to disagree with the amendments of the Council.

Reasons agreed to.

A message was subsequently received from the House of Representatives asking for a Free Conference on the matter, which was agreed to.

The Hon. Mr. Stevens, the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, and the Hon. Mr. Bonar were appointed Managers of the Conference.

WELLINGTON COLLEGE AND GIRLS' HIGH SCHOOL BILL.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said, in reference to this order of the day, he would respectfully inform the Council that this Bill was now merely in the ordinary position of being down for second reading.

The Hon. Mr. PETER moved "the previous question."

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said it was quite apparent that there was a very considerable misapprehension as regarded the action of those who had been opposing this Bill; and he was not quite sure that honourable members themselves all realised the nature of that action. One would think, from some remarks which had fallen from honourable members, that those who were adverse to the Bill had been animated by a feeling of a nature adverse to the interests of the City of Wellington. But, as a matter of fact, it was just the very reverse. And what was the object of the action they had taken in this matter? It had been that there should be no power given to sell the freehold of one of the most important reserves in the City of Wellington. If the mortgage, with power of sale, were given, it was possible that some day or other Wellington might wake up and find itself with neither a high school nor a site for a high school; and the Hon. Mr. Johnson, who had strongly defended this Bill, must, he thought, see that this was the necessary result of the action he was taking. They were anxious that Wellington should not lose the site for a high school; but, if this Bill were accepted, it was possible that the site for a high school might entirely pass away from the City of Wellington. He agreed with every word that had been uttered by the Hon. Mr. Johnson in reference to the importance of having a high school for Wellington, and he quite admitted that there should be a proper high school in Wellington. The action the honourable gentleman was supporting, he repeated, might lead to Wellington being deprived of a high school and also of a site for a high school. If there were any difficulty in this matter, he thought the proper course would be for the Government to meet it boldly; and it was still in their power, by some additions to the Government Loans to Local Bodies Bill, to provide that assistance should be given to the Board of Governors to extricate them from the difficulty in which they were at the present time placed. But he strongly hoped the Council would not agree to reverse that line of policy which had been laid down for its guidance for many years past, and would not on this occasion establish a precedent for selling those reserves. Generations unborn might repent their hasty action in giving power for the sale of this site, and he sincerely trusted that such power would not be given. They had always acted as the guardians of these sites, and he believed there was not a single case—and he had looked into the matter pretty closely—in which they had authorised a sale of this character. In 1871 a Bill was passed with the view of removing some conditions regarding the reserves that had been made for the benefit of the City of Wellington, and in the Act of 1871 the allocation of these reserves for certain specified purposes was made to the Superintendent of the province. That was, of course, at the time provincial institutions existed. The provincial authorities at the time were anxious to realise on some of these reserves with a view to building a hospital; and a portion of them—Fitzherbert Terrace and Charlotte Street—that had been let with a right of purchase were in course of sale when the Legislature itself interfered, and passed an Act providing for satisfying claims by money payment, and vesting the reserves in the Superintendent. So that the Legislature, when it appeared in this matter, only appeared to prevent the sale of the site of these buildings in accordance with the policy laid down for many years, that it would not grant mortgages with power of sale of sites. At the same time there was an Act passed to enable the Governors of the College to borrow a sum of £5,000 upon the mortgage of the place; but these stipulations were at once put in:—

“4. If at the time appointed by any mortgage for the payment of the principal money secured thereby the Governors are unable to pay off the same, they may, if they shall think fit, borrow such sum of money as may be necessary for the purpose of paying off the whole or any part of such principal money, and may secure the repayment of the same and the interest to be paid thereon in manner herein-before authorised in regard to the moneys originally borrowed under this Act.

“5. Nothing in this Act shall be deemed by implication or otherwise to take from any person his right of claiming compensation from the colony for the deprivation or dispossession of any estate or interest which he may have had, or to which he may claim to have been entitled, in any land which has been granted for the endowment of the College.”

He hoped the Council would regard this matter from the point of view he had indicated—that they would be in favour of the principles they had laid down for their guidance, and that, whatever they did, they would not authorise any persons to sell these very valuable reserves, which were set apart not only for their interests, but also for the interests of those who were to follow. This was a sort of postscript to a lady's letter. The Bill had been brought down entirely with a view to this; the rest was all padding. That being the principle of the Bill, he hoped they would not consent to read it a second time, unless an absolute promise were made to them that there should be inserted a similar proviso in the Wellington College Bill to the one to which he had referred.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON would like to refer to the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse as to his action in regard to this Bill, because he thought the honourable gentleman misapprehended it. He simply supported the second reading of the Bill on the ground that, as had been pointed out, the Bill contained other matters, which affected the College as well as the Girls' High School, and it was to the object of getting these considered that he addressed himself in speaking on the subject. The great object he had was to enforce upon the Council what seemed to him to be the justice of the trustees in bringing forward a Bill of this kind, and endeavouring to obtain the necessary funds to pay for this building. Unfortunately, he had overlooked, at the time he was speaking, a circumstance he had drawn attention to when this question was introduced into the Council by the Hon. Mr. Reynolds on a former occasion. On that occasion the Hon. Mr. Reynolds showed him the contract under which the erection of this building was undertaken, and he then saw what were the conditions of the contract. He now asked the permission of the Council to read an extract therefrom, for he was quite certain that it would place things in a different light from what they had been in previously. He had it on good authority that before this contract was executed by either party it was submitted for approval to the Hon. Sir Robert Stout, then Premier and Minister of Education; and there was a clause at the commencement of the contract against which the Minister wrote, “Approved.”—ROBERT STOUT, Minister of Education.” The clause was this:—

“And whereas the Governors have no moneys available for the purpose of paying for the erection of such buildings, but have entered into such contract on the faith of a promise by the Government of the Colony of New Zealand, through the Minister of Education, to provide them with moneys, by way of loan or otherwise, for the purpose of paying for the erection of such buildings,” &c.

Under these circumstances he thought the trustees were quite justified in expecting the Government would assist them in getting the money that was necessary for putting up this building. That was the argument he used when the Hon. Mr. Reynolds introduced a similar Bill to this last year. At the same time he wished the Council to clearly understand that he never for an instant thought the Council would allow the power of sale contained in the Bill to apply to the school-site, and he believed the trustees themselves contemplated such an amendment of their proposal. Something had been said about the transferring of the Hospital reserve, and he quite agreed that it was an unfortunate thing that it had been transferred from the Hospital Trustees to the College Governors, but he maintained they had nothing to do with it at the present moment. He had been under the impression that other property of equal value would be handed over to the Hospital at the time, but he could not find any record of that at all. On this point he did not think it should be raked up and thrown at the heads of the Board of College Governors, because surely it was their duty to turn the property to the best advantage when it was placed in their hands. It was no doubt an objectionable thing to transfer it to the Governors in the first instance; but, that having been done, he did not think they should now accuse the Governors of doing that which was wrong in making use of the property.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL said he was not present when the question was put on a former occasion, and therefore he wished to say a few words in reference to the course he intended to take up; and he should vote that the Bill be read a second time. He should not support the retention of the clause providing for the power of sale.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS wished to say that in the discussion that had taken place on this subject he did not think it necessary to make any lengthy remarks. He urged strongly in the former discussion that the Bill should not be rejected, because it provided for the constitution of the institution in question. There was one point he must refer to, and it arose out of the personal explanation made by the Hon. Mr. Buckley the other day, when the Hon. the Speaker intimated that he (Mr. Stevens) would not be allowed to speak then, but that he would have another opportunity of doing so. His honourable friend then quoted from the mortgage given in connection with this contract to put up the building; and, in the course of his remarks, it became quite certain that an important recital in that mortgage had escaped his attention. It would be remembered that the honourable gentleman stated that the mortgage had been approved by the Minister of Education, who had noted his approval in the margin. That was perfectly correct; but among the recitals in that mortgage which the Minister of Education approved by his signature there appeared a recital that the Governors entered into a contract with the contractors on the faith of a promise made by the Government to meet this engagement. He believed that was substantially a fair interpretation of this recital. He thought it right to state that in order that the honourable gentleman might treat it as a kind of supplement to his remarks the other day, and be in perfect possession of what was expressed in the document which received the approval of the late Minister of Education. He had further to say, in conclusion, he thought it would be very desirable that those few words should be read out of the mortgage for the information of the Council, so that it might be proved whether or not his words were correct.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY said it was quite true the provision did escape his notice. The more one looked at the recital the more one would find that there was an inclination to provide funds for the erection of this building by vote or other means, but not by mortgage. He could not lay too much stress on the remark of the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, that he would not in any way interfere with the passing of this Bill except for the express purpose of preventing the sale of the reserve. He (Mr. Buckley) had fallen in for a fair share of abuse in connection with the non-passing of the Bill. He was very glad to have been the means of preventing the Bill from passing in its present shape, and he hoped the Council would never pass a Bill to give away such a reserve as was intended by this Bill to be virtually given away.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said the Hon. Mr. Johnson seemed to lay great stress on the fact that Sir Robert Stout approved of the erection of this school, and that he approved of the borrowing of the money upon the terms upon which it had been obtained.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said he had merely referred to the promise made by Sir Robert Stout, and to the fact that it was contained in the contract.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said that Sir Robert Stout had no power to go outside the law, and if he did so he could not in any way bind Parliament to carry out the agreement. Besides that, in the mortgage-deed it was clear enough that the only security was upon the rents and profits of the endowment held by the Board, and without power of sale. The Act of 1878 provided that there should be no power of sale. The 18th section of the Bill was word for word with what was provided in the Act of 1878, with the exception of three words slipped in at the end, and some half-dozen words which had been omitted. The three words slipped in were "the lands or," going before the words "the rents and profits." Then, the words which had been omitted were, "but without power of selling the freehold of such lands." It was quite clear that the Act of 1878 laid it down distinctly that no mortgage should be given over these lands with power of sale of the freehold. The Bill before the Council intended to reverse that portion of the Act, and give to the Board of Governors an opportunity of giving a mortgage over the freehold of the land, as well as over the rents and profits. Supposing the mortgage were to be given, what would be the result? With a revenue of £35 a year and interest amounting to £420 a year, what would be the result? From what sources would the governing body be enabled to pay their interest? If they were not in a position to pay their interest there was no question about it that the mortgagees would step into possession. The result would be that there would be such a hue and cry throughout Wellington, and such pressure brought to bear upon Parliament in order to get Parliament to find the money and take up the mortgage, that that would be done. It was not denied that that would be the result. If it was considered that there was an obligation on the part of the Government to pay this money, why did they not bring down a vote for the purpose of settling the whole matter? He did not say that there was a liability on the part of the colony to make up £4,700, or whatever the amount was—he rather thought there was no such obligation; but, if the Government were satisfied that there was an obligation, let them ask for a vote for the purpose, and not pass a Bill like that. It was merely a public deception, and, he should say, a public fraud, to introduce a Bill like that, knowing that the governing body had not the means of paying the interest on the money borrowed.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE would like to know whether the Government proposed in Committee to strike out the power of foreclosure sought to be given. The reason he was interested in the measure was this: He was sure that the Girls' High School had been placed in the wrong position, and that some day, if £7,000 were borrowed on the reserve with the right of foreclosure, the security would be realised upon and the reserve would be lost. The Girls' High School had been built in a wrong part of the town. Rather less than one-third of the population of Wellington lived on the north side of Manners Street, whilst two-thirds lived on the southern side. The Girls' High School had been built at the extreme end of the town. He felt pretty certain that if the power of foreclosure were given the security would be realised upon, and the citizens of Wellington would lose the reserve. He did not agree with the Hon. Mr. Reynolds that in that case an agitation would be got up and that a vote would be put on the estimates to get over the difficulty. It was simply impossible to get a vote at all for the City of Wellington; therefore he felt bound to protect what Wellington had got. Already Wellington had lost its Hospital reserve, and he was afraid that a similar thing would occur in this case. He was quite willing to take the measure provided the right of foreclosure was excised. What was to be the future of the Girls' High School he did not know, but, if it was fit to live, in the meantime the fees must pay the interest on the mortgage. At the present time the fees were twelve guineas a head per annum, and, if necessary, they would require to be increased. There was an important reserve given by the Provincial Council to the Masonic body. That reserve was situated in the middle of the town. It was, however, mortgaged by the Freemasons for a comparatively small sum of money. The interest was not paid, and one fine day in walked the man who held the mortgage, and realised the security for a trifle, and the Masonic body lost the endowment. Such a thing might happen in this case if the site of the school proved unsuitable. He was not going to sit in his place in the Council and see the reserves of the colony made light of. He wanted to know from the Minister in charge of the Bill whether he proposed to strike out the right of foreclosure.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said he did not propose to strike out the power of sale. He would take the Bill as it stood.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN had not the slightest hesitation in voting against this Bill. He felt that it was necessary to show that the Council meant to stop such dealing with reserves. He hoped the Council would throw out the Bill until the measure was brought down without the right of foreclosure.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said it appeared to him that it might be better if the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill would allow it to remain over for the present, and introduce the subject again at the next meeting of Parliament, which could not be far distant. It appeared to him that honourable members who objected to the Bill would agree to all its provisions with the exception of the power of sale. It seemed to him that that power was very objectionable, and that the Bill ought not to pass containing it. He proposed to vote for the second reading of the Bill, as he did on the former occasion, but he would support the elimination of the power of sale from the clause when that clause came under consideration.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN would vote for the second reading for precisely the same reasons as had been stated by the Hon. Mr. Menzies, and he would follow exactly the same course with regard to the striking-out of the power of sale.

The Hon. Mr. LAHMANN said the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had attached a good deal of blame to those who voted for the second reading of the Bill. He (Mr. Lahmann) was one of those who voted for the second reading, but it was also his intention to alter the clause so as to eliminate the power of sale. He had never been an enemy of Wellington interests. For the last fifteen or sixteen years, since he had been a member of the Council, he had always voted in the interests of Wellington as far as agreed with his duty.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said he was willing to allow the second reading to pass, as he saw that there was a majority of the Council in favour of the excision of the objectionable clause.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read a second time.

WANGANUI HARBOUR BILL.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said the object of this Bill was to enable the Wanganui Harbour Board to levy a rate not exceeding one farthing in the pound on the value of property in the Counties of Wanganui and Waitotara, and three-eighths of a penny in the pound on the value of property in the Borough of Wanganui, as security for £30,000, which they proposed to borrow under the authority of the Harbours Act. They had authority to borrow £100,000, of which £60,000 had been raised and spent in improving the river and harbour. The Bill had been reported on favourably by the Local Bills Committee, and he would state, as briefly as possible, some of the facts and reasons which, he trusted, would induce the Council to agree to the second reading of the Bill. The Bill as introduced into the House of Representatives included the greater part, or, at any rate, a portion, of Rangitikei in the rateable area; but the rateable area now included only the Counties of Wanganui and Waitotara and the Borough of Wanganui. He was quite aware that many objections could be raised to the exclusion of Rangitikei, which apparently benefited as much as the other counties by the works for which they were proposed to be rated; but it had been found impossible to induce the people of Rangitikei and their representatives to allow that part of the country to be included, and therefore the promoters of the Bill had to content themselves with making the rating-area extend over those places he had mentioned. He must confess there was a good deal of reason to be found on the part of the Rangitikei people for wishing their county to be excluded, because the produce of that district now, to a large extent, went direct by rail to Wellington: at any rate, that was their contention. Whether it practically did go to the extent they maintained he could not say; but there was no doubt that that argument could be used by the Rangitikei people; and, if they were allowed to vote on this subject, they would vote almost unanimously against a rate. Under these circumstances a certain amount of rate was lost; but that was a very small proportion of the whole. It amounted to some £60 or £70 out of the £1,800; and a sufficient amount remained to pay the interest on the money proposed to be borrowed. Wanganui Harbour was in a somewhat peculiar position. Whereas it was originally proposed to carry out the improvement of the harbour entirely out of the money raised, without imposing a rate, it was found that it was impossible to carry out the plans of the engineers beyond that portion of the work which really did not improve the harbour to any appreciable extent; for the harbour was now in this position: that, whereas £60,000 had been expended chiefly in improving the river, if a further sum of, at any rate, £15,000 was not spent in making a protecting-wall—a sort of breakwater—the whole £60,000, or a large amount of it, might be considered to be thrown away. It might be argued that this was only proposing to throw good money after bad; but the reports of the engineers were entirely favourable to the continuation of the work. They believed, if the work were continued to the extent of 900ft. or 1,000ft. more, they would be able to obtain a depth of 18ft. on the bar. The original proposal was to carry it out to a very much greater extent than that; but, as the engineers originally stated, they did not expect to obtain any great benefit from the works executed till they had reached a distance of 1,500ft. The distance now reached was about 900ft., and even at that a certain amount of improvement had been effected. There had been no failure in the predictions of the engineers as to what was likely to occur when only a portion of the work was completed. The engineer who was employed up to the time the works were stopped owing to the want of funds said,—

“From time to time a little of the stone that is stored adjacent to the spot for the purpose may be required to trim the southern face. There has been no subsidence whatever in the body of the wall, and none need be anticipated. With regard to the effect of the work done, although at times this is very marked from the upper end of the cliff to the outer end of the wall, still, as I have frequently pointed out, but little direct benefit in ordinary weather is obtained in increased depth on the bar. Mr. Stewart and myself, reporting in April, 1883, said, ‘This section of 900ft., although it would check the tendency of the channel to be carried through the North Spit in times of flood (which result is found to give a shallow bar), yet would not probably have much effect in deepening the bar.’ These opinions have been amply borne out by the results. Owing to the outer end of the wall being still within the adjacent low-water line, large quantities of sand are carried round the point by the incoming flood and deposited on the river-face of the work. In fine weather this will always be the case till the wall is carried out into deep water.”

There were some further details with which he would not trouble the Council. The Harbour-master had written as follows on the 1st December last:—

“The channel over the bar continues in the same position as last month, with a depth of 14ft. at high-water spring tides, and 11ft. at high-water neap tides. The South Spit has made considerably, and extends towards the end of the breakwater, making the channel much narrower, and consequently deeper, than it has been for some time back."

That report, and others to the same effect, which he thought it would be only wearying the Council to go into, tended to show that the work was to a certain extent beneficial now; and when it was completed it would be likely to be more beneficial in the future, because it must not be forgotten that the engineers never expected any great benefit to arise till the work had been carried out to a distance of some 1,800ft. Messrs. Barr and Oliver, the original engineers, said,—

"The lengths between equal depths of water in the river-entrance and the ocean, as measured within the walls proposed, would be as follow:—

Low Water.	High Water.	Distance from Ocean to River.
10ft. ..	18ft. ..	1,800ft.
14ft. ..	22ft. ..	2,410ft.
20ft. ..	28ft. ..	3,450ft.
22ft. ..	30ft. ..	4,420ft.
24ft. ..	32ft. ..	4,800ft.

That is, that, with the formation of a channel 2,600ft. long, the largest class of vessels trading to the colony from Britain could enter the river at high water; or, with one 4,600ft. long, such could enter at any state of the tide."

That was an extract from the first report made by Messrs. Barr and Oliver. It would be seen that, with a sea-wall 1,800ft. in length, a depth of 18ft. at high water would be obtained. He knew it was a very common opinion, and had been expressed in petitions presented to the Council, that the depth of water would not be realised, that the money would be wasted, and that they might just as well stop the work where it was at present. His reply to that was this: that those opinions were simply the opinions of amateurs. There had not been a single engineer who had expressed an opinion contrary to those which he had read, and the whole of the objections were from persons who had no more knowledge of the matter than any member of the Council, further than they might have by going down to the works and looking at them in a cursory way. The persons in favour of the work were engineers competent to give an opinion, and those who were opposed to it did not pretend to have any professional opinion on the matter. They only said, on general grounds, that it was not likely to prove a success. He did not think any competent marine engineer would say that these undertakings must invariably be successful; but in this case he would say there was an extreme probability of this work being successful, and he would be prepared to say that, if the whole matter rested entirely with the Council, they would be justified in saying, "Let the work go on." But the real position was this: that it did not rest entirely with the Council, but with the people in the country who had to pay the rates. His contention was this: that the Council had no right to refuse to allow these people to have their choice of an almost useless harbour or submit to a rate which was not excessive, thus giving a fair opportunity for a good port to be opened for a large extent of country. The people wished to make the harbour sufficient to allow ordinary vessels, such as the Union Company's steamers, and vessels of that class, to enter the Wanganui River. This would enable produce to be taken to Sydney and to different parts of the colony at a cheaper rate than at present. The cattle-trade was greatly injured owing to the small class of steamers which at present carried it on. The question involved in the Bill ought to be left to the ratepayers themselves to decide. Personally he was perfectly willing to pay his share of the rates, and he thought he would be paying something like one-fiftieth part of the whole rates. That showed the sincerity of his conviction that the request made in the Bill was a reasonable one. All that he asked the Council to do was simply to allow the locality concerned to exercise its choice in the matter. If a mistake were made it would fall on the locality, and if the undertaking was a success it would be an exceedingly good investment. He would willingly accept an amendment which was to be proposed with reference to the constitution of the Board. The object of the amendment was to give representation on the Board in proportion to the rating of the different sections of the country. Instead of leaving the counties less represented than Wanganui, it was proposed to place them on an equality. He was perfectly willing to accept that amendment, and he should be willing to accept any other reasonable amendment. He begged to move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN thought it was desirable to carefully consider how far they were going to allow these local bodies to go on borrowing. The Council was considering a little while ago the case of a Board which had borrowed money and expended it. They had then to strike a rate, and the rate had completely changed the opinions of a large section of the community, and now that they had got the money they were afraid to spend it. The district was not able to stand the drain. He thought, if this Bill were allowed to pass, they would have something of that state of things in Wanganui. The circumstances of these people were not such that they could stand the same rating-power now that they thought they could two or three years ago. The Harbour Board rates, the property-tax, and all the other rates were becoming a serious sum to collect. He would ask his honourable friend, who knew Wanganui, whether he could stand on that breakwater and tell the Council that if the Legislature did not authorise further expenditure any harm would occur to the breakwater. He had had the pleasure of spending a holiday at Wanganui, and he went down on to the breakwater; and, without any hesitation, he could say that no harm could take place to the breakwater as it at present stood. The further the breakwater was carried out the greater risk there was. He would be the last one to oppose borrowing for deepening harbours to let ships in. In this and other cases, however, there should be some reconsideration of the borrowing-power before permitting any more Harbour Boards to borrow money. The honourable gentleman had quoted from reports of engineers with reference to large ships entering the river. He wondered, if those engineers were asked to rewrite that report, whether their opinions would not be modified. He thought they would to a very large extent. As for his honourable friend thinking that the expenditure of £40,000 would enable the Sydney steamers to call there, the honourable gentleman would be much disappointed with the result of the expenditure. Knowing the place as he did, he felt that there was not the slightest necessity for spending the money asked for in order to save what work had been done. It was quite the reverse. Like a great many things on which money was being spent, it was purely a matter of speculation. It would be speculation if they were to spend money in continuing the work out further. As to voting-power, he was very glad that his honourable friend had consented to make the alteration he had indicated. It was well known that in a scattered district votes were difficult to get in, whereas in the Borough of Wanganui everybody would vote, and the majority was sure to be in favour of the proposal, because the money would be spent there. It was as fair that Rangitikei should pay as any other place. The Bill now before the Council was not the Bill as published in Wanganui, because Rangitikei had been struck out. He hoped the Council would not pass the Bill. He moved, That the Bill be read the second time that day six months.

The Hon. Mr. HART thought it was only due to the persons interested in the passing of the Bill to state a few facts connected with it. As far as the pier outside the land had gone hitherto, it had had the effect, by the scour of the water, of deepening the water to 14ft.; but, when it got to the end of the pier, as the water spread out the sand caused the depth of water to decrease again. If, however, the pier were carried out 900ft. further, it would carry the scour down to a lower level, and a greater depth would be obtained, and the result would be to enable coasting-vessels of a larger size to enter; and that would be a great benefit to the district by cheapening the freight of produce to Sydney and other places. That was the object of those who sought to get the Bill passed. The Bill provided that there must be an absolute majority of the possible votes that could be given to approve of the loan being raised, before the loan could be raised. Under these circumstances it was apparent that it would be in the hands of the ratepayers to say whether they would have the Bill or not. The work was comparatively useless at present, and it required to be carried out further to insure a benefit to the district.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND trusted the Council would not pass this Bill. It must be obvious that the operations in this harbour were in the highest degree speculative. He was not speaking from his own impressions only about the matter. He had the statement of a settler at Wanganui who had resided in the district for thirty-five years. That gentleman had watched the work with interest, as he had been engaged in work of a similar kind on the east coast of England. He was a man well known in his day, and had had enormous operations to carry on; and his opinion was that the result was exceedingly doubtful, and that the works already done did not justify the very high hopes which had been expressed. It appeared that up to the present day the largest ship that had entered Wanganui was the vessel that brought the first settlers—a boat of 350 tons, which arrived in 1848. He trusted more time would be taken to learn what the prospects of the affair were, before the colony, in its present indebtedness and depression, allowed the local body to expend more money on the work. Before any such works were undertaken the colony ought to have had the best technical advice that England could afford as to whether the works should be proceeded with. He thought enough blunders had been made, and it was time that such things should be stopped.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said one honourable member had referred to the necessity for being careful as to how far they allowed the Board borrowing-powers for this work. They had already passed an Act authorising the Wanganui Harbour Board to borrow £100,000, and the Board had already expended some £70,000, and all that was wanted now was that they should have further taxing-powers so as to enable them to raise sufficient funds to complete the works. So that they were really asking for no further borrowing-powers. With reference to the works, he did not think there was any chance of any mishap happening to the training-wall. The blocks were peculiarly adapted for the work, and were very large. He was speaking from his own experience, having been at Wanganui during the session. When a member of the Government he had a good deal to do in connection with the papers relative to the Wanganui Harbour, and he must say he had not been quite satisfied that the work was a prudent one. That was what induced him to go there this session and examine the work for himself. He went on purpose to see it before the Bill came before the Council. He did not profess to be an engineer, but he thought that any one with eyes in his head could see at once that the work had really been satisfactorily carried out. The Harbour Board of Wanganui had made the same mistake that all other Harbour Boards had made in the colony, by commencing at the wrong end. He saw the training-wall that had been put up there. It was put up for about 90ft., and the Harbourmaster informed him that, so far, there was an extra depth of 4ft. He felt perfectly sure that if that wall were carried out another 90ft. there would be a depth of 18ft. or 20ft. Now, if that could be done it would be well to pass this Bill. He had no doubt of this himself, and he was not one who would advocate any scheme unless he thought it a proper one.

He had no interest in Wanganui at all, and, had it not been that he had had grave doubts of the propriety of going on with the works, he certainly would not have gone to Wanganui this session. So far as he could judge after seeing the Harbourmaster and seeing the work, his impression was that the training-wall ought to go out to somewhere about 270ft. in all. This would give about 23ft. depth at low water. He thought the depth would be 24ft. if the retaining-wall went out 270ft.: and he considered the Council would be doing wrong if they prevented the people of Wanganui from carrying out this work, inasmuch as they had to pay rates, or, rather, interest, on the £70,000 which they had borrowed, and unless they had facilities for borrowing the other £30,000 which they were authorised to borrow they would have reason to find fault with the Parliament and say, "We cannot pay our rates, or, rather, interest, because our works are not completed, and you have thrown obstacles in the way of completing these works by rejecting the Bill." He trusted the Council would think better of it, and that they would carry the second reading of the Bill without taking a division.

The Hon. Mr. HART would like to correct an erroneous impression on the part of the honourable gentleman who last spoke. The people in these counties were under no harbour rate whatever. The original authority to borrow was based on the security of property vested in the Board. This Bill proposed to give additional security, and gave power to impose a rate with the consent of the ratepayers.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said he would not have risen to speak on this Bill had it not been that he wished his action in reference thereto to be understood. He read the Bill when it was first introduced with great attention, and he read likewise the petitions which were sent in in reference to the Bill. It appeared to him that the petitions contained some weighty allegations. He had therefore turned up the report of the Select Committee to see what answer had been given to those allegations, and was astonished when he saw that the Committee had contented themselves with taking evidence in support of the Bill, and had taken no evidence from the other parties who had forwarded petitions. It appeared that the very object they had in view in sending the petitions had miscarried, and that the duty which devolved on the Committee they had certainly failed to perform by failing to record the evidence of some of those parties who were opposed to the measure. He did not profess to be able to give an opinion one way or the other as to the works; but he took his stand on this: that before passing the measure they should see they were doing no injustice to any person whatever. It did appear from the petitions he had alluded to that if they passed the Bill in its present shape they would be inflicting an injury on the parties who were presenting petitions; and, as no evidence had been called on the other side of the question, he should feel it his duty to vote against the Bill. With regard to the exclusion of a portion of the district from the rateable area, it was quite clear that one portion had been taken and the other left without any idea of justice in the matter whatever. One was just as much entitled to be left as the other was, and one was just as much entitled to be taken as the other was. He thought there ought to be some clearing-up of this point; and they would be in a false position till then if they were to support this Bill. They did not give the discontented ratepayers the right of appeal. They were a Court of appeal, and they decided on the districts without giving those affected the opportunity of presenting themselves to a Committee of the Council and of stating what were the reasons why they prayed the Council to exclude them from the operation of the Act. His sense of the injustice to the ratepayers who were not consulted on the subject would necessitate his voting against the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT did not wish to argue this question or hear it argued on legal grounds. He intended to vote for the second reading of this Bill, and so intended not with a desire to impose a rate on the district, but because he wished to put the ratepayers in a position to impose a rate on themselves if they thought it to their own advantage to do so. With reference to country districts, he thought these would not receive so much benefit from the expenditure on the harbour — that the benefit would be chiefly confined to Wanganui itself; but the rates in Wanganui would be double in proportion to the rates from the country districts. As to taking the evidence of the petitioners, had there been any evidence the Committee would have taken it. The petitioners merely complained that the rating district was not large enough, and they wished parts of the country now excluded from the rateable district to be included in it.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON thought the statement which the Hon. Mr. Barnicoat had just made should have considerable weight. The complaint from these petitioners was, as the honourable member had mentioned, that the district which it was proposed to rate was too small. He thought it would be decidedly unjust to those districts which were now proposed to be rated were they to be the only ones to have to bear this burden. It had been pointed out that the Bill did not ask for larger borrowing-powers. It had those powers already, and it merely asked to have a further security for raising that loan. When this loan was proposed there were considerable reserves given for the purposes of this harbour, and there was no intention whatever of rating the freehold property. The proposal now before them seemed to him not to be a right one. So far as he could learn, the works which had been already done were not a success; certainly the channel of the river was not so good as it had been. One honourable member had mentioned that he had been there this session. He had also been there, and coming up the river the captain of the boat remarked to this effect: "There was no difficulty in getting over the bar; the difficulty was in going up the river;" and from what he (Mr. Johnson) saw that was so. The channel was a most tortuous one, and apparently there were a number of places where the captain felt a great anxiety in passing, although the boat would not be drawing a great draught. From what he had seen elsewhere he should doubt whether the expenditure of additional money in the manner now proposed would be at all a success. There must be great risk about it; and, seeing the difficulties of the settlers in the district, and that this district was a very limited one—far too limited, he thought, in fairness—and seeing there was a great doubt as to whether the works, in the end, would be anything like a success, he certainly thought it would be better to postpone the question for the present, and he should vote against the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR would just like to say that his sympathies were naturally very much with these small harbours, and he did not think it was fair to judge of them when the works were only partly executed. The Council was told that the works would require to be carried out 900ft. or 1,000ft. before the expected benefits could be reached. In his report on the harbour Sir John Coode said no attention was to be paid to the alterations until his scheme had been considered. It could not be expected that a moderate expenditure would cause great results. He was inclined to assist this Board, more especially as they had given assistance to other Boards to carry out their works. He thought the question that had been raised by the last speaker was a very serious one indeed—that was, that the district to be rated was not a fair one, and that the ratepayers were not to contribute alike. He thought, therefore, this matter should stand over for the present at all events, and that would be his reason for voting against the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said the objection to the rating-area was no doubt a very important one. He was perfectly free to admit that, as a matter of strict justice, a portion of Rangitikei ought to have been included. But some time ago—as long ago as 1885—a compromise was arrived at between the different parties representing the districts proposed to be rated, and they settled that the line, so far as Rangitikei was concerned, should be drawn at the Turakina River. That portion of the area, however, had been struck out in the other House, as he had explained in introducing the measure. It was estimated that £65 Os. 8d. would be lost by the change in the districts. The other districts were as follow: Wanganui Borough, which was estimated to contribute £781; the County of Wanganui, £590; and the County of Waitotara, £584. It seemed to him that a still greater injustice would be inflicted on these people by refusing to allow them the opportunity of rating themselves, notwithstanding the amount of injustice they now suffered from. He would next refer to what had been said by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse as to the Committee having only taken evidence on one side. He was not desirous of defending the members of the Committee, but he would point out that the reason they did not take evidence on the other side was that there was no evidence to take; they could get no more from the petitioners than what appeared in their petitions. Reference had been made to the report of a pupil of Mr. John Rennie. No doubt he was an engineer, but he was not a marine engineer; and he (Mr. Pharazyn) thought that gentleman had always taken a very strong prejudice on this question; and, as to his competency to judge, he might mention that some years ago the river broke out on the opposite side of the east sandbank, which enabled a harbour to exist in Wanganui at all. That gentleman considered it was advisable to let that opening remain, and to allow the river at Wanganui to form a new channel. It was obvious to any one gifted with common-sense, without being an engineer, that had this been done the whole thing would have gone into a variety of channels. In 1879 there was only a depth of 7ft. 4in., while in 1886 there was a depth of 12ft. 10in. It was perfectly true, as had been stated by the Hon. Mr. Reynolds, that the Harbour Board made a great mistake in beginning at the wrong end. He had a calculation which showed that the rates to be raised would amount to £1,956. The following was a return showing the probable proceeds of the rate proposed to be levied on the Borough of Wanganui and Counties of Wanganui and Waitotara:—

	Valuation.	Rate.	Proceeds.
Wanganui Borough ...	500,000	3d.	781 5 0
Wanganui County ...	506,855	3d.	590 9 5
Waitotara County ...	561,373	3d.	584 15 3
			<hr/> £1,956 9 8

By the repayment of the £10,000 loan from the Insurance Department the Board would be relieved of the interest on that sum, amounting to £650 per annum. By a recent revision of the scale of wharfage charges the Board's ordinary revenue had been increased so as to meet all ordinary expenditure, which included interest on existing loans. The interest at 5 per cent. and sinking fund of 1 per cent. on £30,000 would require a sum of £1,800 annually—an amount fully covered by the proposed rate, irrespective of the surplus the Board would enjoy by the repayment of the Insurance loan. The feeling of a considerable number of the Wanganui people—he was speaking of both the country and the town—was that they would rather pay a certain amount of rate than see the work useless. The work had cost less than works of that class generally did. The breakwater had been exposed to two or three winters, and it had been exposed in an unfinished state to the heavy seas, and, practically, no damage had been done. Taking all these things into consideration, he hoped the Council would agree to the second reading of the Bill and would finally pass it through Committee.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now,' proposed to be omitted, stand part of the question."

EDUCATION RESERVES.

Mr. SMITH wished to ask the Minister of Education if he was in a position to give a reply to the question which he put to him on Saturday with regard to the sale of certain education reserves.

Mr. FISHER said he had made inquiry into the matter, and had ascertained that so far back as May, 1886, application was made by the Wellington School Commissioners to the Government for funds to enable them to pay rates on certain secondary-education reserves. Many subsequent similar applications were made. To these requests the Government consistently replied that they had no funds for such a purpose. The next stage, as was now generally known, was that certain education reserves had been announced to be sold by public auction in order to pay these rates; but the singular part of the whole proceeding was that the reserves announced to be sold were reserves for primary education: that was to say, reserves for primary education were to be compulsorily sold by public auction to pay the rates on secondary-education reserves. The honourable member was aware that the question was put to him (Mr. Fisher) late on Saturday, after all the Government officials had left the public offices, and there was no time to ascertain why these particular reserves had been announced to be sold by auction. But that information he would obtain in the course of the day, and would inform the honourable gentleman in regard to it.

Mr. SMITH asked the Minister of Education if he would be good enough to state what were the names of the School Commissioners who had taken action in the matter.

Mr. FISHER said the School Commissioners for the Wellington District were Mr. J. R. Blair (Chairman), Mr. C. P. Powles, Mr. Marchant (Commissioner of Crown Lands), Mr. Mason, Mr. Ballance, and Mr. W. H. Warren (Secretary).

Mr. ORMOND would point out that the School Commissioners had plenty of funds with which to pay these rates, and had full powers to disburse moneys in any way the law required.

Mr. SMITH asked whether the Minister of Education intended to stop this sale.

Mr. FISHER pointed out to the honourable member for Napier that the correspondence related to an application by the School Commissioners to the Government for funds to enable them to pay the rates levied on secondary-education reserves, and the Government replied that they had no funds for such a purpose. Then came the announcement of the sale of certain reserves by public auction, and the discovery that the reserves announced to be sold were primary-education reserves. In reply to the honourable member for Woodville, he might state that he certainly thought the sale ought to be stopped; and immediate inquiry would be made with that object.

Mr. TURNBULL would like to know if the School Commissioners assigned any reason for selling primary-education reserves to pay rates on secondary-education reserves.

Mr. FISHER said that, so far as one could gather from the correspondence, the reserves appeared to have been abandoned to their fate.

Mr. IZARD asked if the Minister of Education would state what was the amount of rates against the reserves in question.

Mr. FISHER said that, so far as he could gather, there was an amount of £54 odd claimed by the Masterton County Council, and £35 odd by the local body at Alfredton. He did not know whether there were any other claims against the reserves. The claims began in the year 1886.

Mr. COWAN would like to draw the Minister's attention to the fact that not only public reserves seemed to be at the mercy of local bodies, but private property was in the same position. Very serious injustice was done under the present system. The Southland County Council, for instance, a few weeks ago, advertised about a hundred sections for sale for non-payment of rates. Some of these properties belonged to private individuals, some were public bodies' endowments, and some reserves for educational purposes. He thought the attention of the Government should be strongly drawn to the fact, and that the power of sale for non-payment of rates should be very much modified. In the present case, for instance, if the matter had not been brought under the attention of the Government the sale would have proceeded; and he therefore hoped the Government would fully consider the whole subject so far as dealing with these public reserves was concerned; and he also thought that, in the interests of justice, there should be some different provision as to the sale of private property for the non-payment of rates. The matter was a very important one, and it was exceedingly fortunate it had been brought up. He moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BEETHAM was aware that in the Wairarapa District there were many reserves which had long been a block to settlement, and the settlers adjoining those reserves were put in a very disadvantageous position, because they were not able to get any assistance towards fencing; the rabbit-rates were not paid in respect to the reserves, nor were the ordinary rates paid to the local bodies. It seemed there was no legal power of sale, and yet he presumed the Registrar had taken legal advice on the matter. He was very glad attention had been drawn to it.

Mr. TAYLOR thought the honourable member for Masterton must have made some mistake; because, if reserves were blocking settlement, their being sold by auction would soon remove that obstacle. He thought the facts that had been brought to light showed that the trustees of these reserves greatly neglected their duty by allowing public property to be drifted about in this manner, and the sooner they were put under some different management the better for every one. The remarks that had been made absolutely proved that it was imperatively necessary that something should be done about the management of these reserves, for they were being managed in a monstrous way now. Those who had the control of these properties were greatly neglecting their duty in not using them so as to carry out the purposes of the trust. He trusted the Government would take some decided stand, and would cause those who did not properly administer the properties to retire from the trusts.

Dr. NEWMAN said the question of dealing with education reserves in this province had been a burning one for many years; but it was now in process of solution, because, under the recently-passed Public Bodies' Leaseholds Act, sufficient power was given to beneficially deal with reserves. Under that Act the College Governors had been able to lease a considerable number of their reserves in the Wairarapa advantageously. As to the Education Board's reserves, there would be no difficulty in leasing them at a very early period. These reserves could not be leased formerly except at ruinously low rates: in fact, he had known of one case in which a lease had been granted for twenty-one years at one penny per acre; and he thought such bargains as that should not be allowed at all. All the reserves in the Wairarapa could now be let at a satisfactory price, and thus any block to settlement removed. There was one difficulty in the way, however, with the Education Board. There was a large reserve close to those which had been about to be sold for rates, which belonged to the College Governors, who had no money to survey or they could let it easily; and if they could get an advance to pay for the survey it could be let within the next eighteen months at a good rate. And in the case of the primary-education reserves, assuming they were surveyed they could now be easily let, and their rents would reduce the cost of education to the Government.

Mr. ORMOND said the remarks that had been made seemed to show a general condemnation of the School Commissioners for not performing their duties properly, as they had full power to do. The facts that had been stated certainly showed a great amount of laxity on their part, and he hoped means would be taken to compel them to attend to their duties. He would point out that the Crown Lands Commissioner was usually the Chairman of the body having control of these reserves, and it was his duty to bring under the notice of the Board any claims against the property, and it was then the duty of the Board to provide for those claims out of the funds at their disposal—nothing could be more simple. He supposed the Commissioner was the Chairman here, and he hoped it would be distinctly ascertained whether the Commissioner had done his duty in this respect, and on whom the blame rested. If these complaints were substantiated it would show that the Government ought to take steps to put the management of the reserves in the hands of gentlemen who would better administer them.

Mr. FISHER said he was glad to hear the remarks of the honourable member for Napier, for he must admit that the apathy of the Wellington School Commissioners in this matter had greatly surprised him. The remarks of the honourable member for Masterton and the honourable member for Hokonui opened out a much wider view of the question. Those remarks were worthy of, and would receive, the best consideration of the Government.

Mr. SMITH said he had brought the matter under notice partly because the reserves in question were situated in the district he represented, and, quite naturally, he did not wish to see them disposed of in the manner proposed. It appeared that the Commissioners had let the rates for the secondary reserves go by default, and the local body was virtually seizing the primary reserves to pay the rates on secondary reserves. The same Commissioners had control of both, and he supposed that under the law the local body presumed they had this power. He hoped the Government would fully consider and deal with this important matter.

Mr. BEETHAM said he had made no charge against the Commissioners, but he condemned the system. He knew the Commissioners had hitherto been unable to lease some of their reserves, and they had now no power to sell as they had some years ago.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

LAND BILL.

A message was received from the Legislative Council stating that the Council had passed the Land Bill, with certain amendments, in which they requested the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON moved, That the amendments be agreed to, except the striking-out of clauses 38 and 34 of the Bill as it passed the House, and the insertion of a new clause 34; and that Mr. Beetham, Mr. M. J. S. Mackenzie, and the mover be appointed a Committee to draw up reasons for such disagreement. The Council had struck out the provisions for electing Land Boards, and had made provision for abolishing Land Boards altogether, as was proposed by the Bill when first introduced.

Mr. SEDDON moved that the name of Mr. O'Callaghan be added to those to be appointed to draw up reasons for disagreeing with the amendments made by the Council in this Bill.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON thought three was the number ordinarily appointed, and if there were too many the business would not be got through so quickly as otherwise.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN wished to know whether the Minister would take into consideration the excision of subsection (7) of clause 26 as a matter for disagreement with the amendments of the Council. That subsection provided that renewal of education reserve leases should be subject to the approval of the Minister. He thought the House would like to see that subsection retained.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said there had been so much feeling in connection with this matter that he had not thought it wise to reopen it by objecting to this amendment.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said there had been a good deal of feeling over the Waste Lands Boards question also.

Sir J. VOGEL asked if the House was to understand that the Minister disapproved of the amendment made by the Council with regard to Land Boards, because he understood that the amendment made by the Council was supported by both members of the Government in that Chamber.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said he was not responsible for what took place in another Chamber. The Waste Lands Boards clause as passed by the House had been thrown out by a very large majority in the other Chamber. He understood the figures were 20 to 5.

Sir J. VOGEL said it was rather a strange thing, especially coming from the Government, which boasted that its members always voted together, that in the other Chamber the two Ministers should have supported this amendment. It seemed to indicate that the amendment was made with the consent and connivance of the Government. Yet here the Government were proposing to object to that amendment.

Mr. Beetham

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON thought the honourable gentleman was hardly justified in using the expression "connivance" in regard to this matter, and he would point out that the members of the Government in the other Chamber had voted for the Bill as it was introduced into this Chamber, although in this House the Government had to accept the amendments made by the House.

Sir J. VOGEL said there could be no doubt that the members representing the Government in another Chamber voted for and accepted the amendment made by the Council in this clause. As to connivance of the Government, if there was no proof of it, it was a reasonable supposition. He had simply raised the point because, if the House meant to insist on its decision, it would probably be well to appoint Managers who were strong upon the point. For his own part he thought the Land Boards should be retained.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN moved, That this House does also disagree with the amendment made by the Legislative Council in striking out subsection (7) of clause 26. He had no desire to enter into the reasons, for the matter had been thoroughly threshed out. But he thought there was a considerable majority in favour of the position that was taken up.

The House divided on Mr. O'Callagan's amendment.

Majority against, 34.

Mr. O'Callaghan's amendment negatived.

Motion agreed to.

Subsequently, the following reasons were brought up by the Managers for disagreeing with the amendments made by the Legislative Council:—

"(1.) That the change in the constitution of the Boards was approved by a large majority of the House of Representatives.

"(2.) That a system of elective Land Boards brings the working of the Lands Department under the review and control of the public, the proceedings of the Land Boards being open to the public and the Press.

"(3.) That a Commissioner would be subject to pressure difficult to withstand except by the assistance and advice of a Board, and that a Minister holding extreme views could administer the Land Act partially except for such a check, the Commissioner being his servant, and subject to dismissal by him.

"(4.) That the local knowledge of the members of a Board as to the requirements of settlement and the prices of land is invaluable.

"(5.) That a feeling of security is engendered by selectors knowing that in the Boards they have a Court of appeal from arbitrary decisions of a Government official."

The following reasons were subsequently received from the Legislative Council for insisting on the amendments:—

"(1.) That the amendments disagreed with were carried by a large majority of the Legislative Council.

"(2.) That, as the Commissioner would, by subsection (6) of clause 34, have to exercise his functions in the mode prescribed to the Board, publicity would be the same in the one case as in the other.

"(3.) That the tendency of elective Land Boards is to weaken the responsibility of Government in matters of land-administration.

"(4.) That the Commissioners have in all cases sufficient knowledge to enable them to judge as to the requirements, and the prices of land.

"(5.) That the feeling of security in the decision of the Commissioner would be strengthened by the knowledge that he is not controlled by local influences, more especially as there will be a right of appeal direct to the Government against any arbitrary decision of the Commissioners.

"(6.) That in several instances the expenses of the Boards are out of proportion to the returns of revenue, and in the interests of economy the change made by the Council is desirable."

On the motion of Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON, it was resolved not to agree with such reasons; and it was ordered that a Free Conference be asked for: Messrs. M. J. S. Mackenzie, Beetham, and G. F. Richardson to be Managers on behalf of the House.

CLASS V.—EDUCATION.

Mr. FISHER.—As this vote relates to a very large and important question, in which the people of the colony generally feel a keen interest, I desire to express the hope that the discussion upon which we are about to enter may be approached in an impartial and dis-passionate spirit. In order to eliminate from the discussion one contentious element, I desire to explain, with regard to the Order in Council to which such frequent reference has been made, that that Order was issued as an answer to hundreds of applications for information forwarded by every educational institution and every educational authority in the colony. No step has been taken, and no step is proposed to be taken, under that Order, until this House, by its vote, shall have expressed its decision on the whole question. Having given that explanation, I hope the House will eliminate from the discussion any discordant feeling which may have arisen in consequence of the issue of the Order in Council. Now, I desire to place the proposals of the Government before the Committee in the plainest possible form; and I may explain that the discussion is taken in Committee in preference to being taken in the House for the reason that it will give members an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon the specific points raised in a way in which they could not have been expressed in a restricted debate in the House. I shall explain to the Committee in short form what the proposals of the Government are, and I will ask honourable gentlemen to make a note of each proposal as I proceed, for that will facilitate the discussion upon the several points, and will avoid frequent requests for information upon those points as the discussion advances. The proposals, then, are these: By raising the school-age to six we anticipate that a reduction of about 8 per cent. on the total educational expenditure would result. We should save, say, from £26,000 to £30,000. We can only put it approximately, because there is a difficulty, as honourable members are aware, in ascertaining the exact number of children under six attending the schools. That is the first proposal. The second proposal is to take away the 4s. capitation at present paid, which will mean a further saving of about £16,000. The late Government, it will be remembered, had already taken 1s., and we propose to take the other 4s. That means a further reduction of £16,000. The third proposal is to substitute the principle of "strict average" for the principle of "working average" in making out the returns. That change, I anticipate, will result in a further saving of £8,000. The fourth proposal is not to renew the vote of £8,000 for the training of teachers which appears annually on the estimates. That is the vote for the maintenance of the training colleges, or normal schools as they are called, in the different education districts. Having thus clearly placed the proposals of the Government before the Committee, we propose to give the Committee an opportunity of voting separately upon each. To give that opportunity any member of the Committee on either side of the House may submit a proposal to reduce the total vote by £5. The first discussion will be taken on the question of raising the school-age; and, if a resolution to reduce the vote by £5 is carried, that will be accepted as indicating the decision of the Committee that the school-age is not to be raised. Then the Committee will be invited to make a second and further reduction of £5 on the total vote, and if that is carried the resolution will be taken to mean that the capitation of 4s. is not to be withdrawn.

An Hon. MEMBER.—How can we show that we wish a shilling taken off each year?

Mr. FISHER.—We do not propose a gradual reduction at all. If the Committee desires the reduction to be gradual, there will be no difficulty in making that clear by a subsequent distinct proposal to that effect. We shall have no difficulty in dealing with that point when we reach it. Next, if the Committee objects to the substitution of the principle of "strict average" for "working average," it will carry a resolution for a further reduction of £5. As to the fourth proposal, if the Committee objects to the abolition of the training colleges, it will reduce the total vote by a further sum of £5. Thus there are marked out four distinct stages. I propose that the discussion shall, so far as is possible, be restricted to the consideration of the particular questions in the order in which I have named them. I make these suggestions in the interests of the Committee itself, because the Committee will better understand while discussing one subject that the others have to come on in the order in which they will be put.

Mr. W. P. REEVES said it was understood that, if the school-age were raised to six years, certain provision would be made to prevent the change falling heavily on country schools.

Mr. FISHER.—I will explain all that in due course. With regard to the question of raising the school-age, possibly many honourable members have not yet had an opportunity of reading the evidence given before the Education Committee. I do not propose to read any of that evidence, or even to discuss it, but I propose to put before the Committee the net results of the investigations of that Committee as far as they have gone, and I shall state briefly the opinions of some most experienced men—gentlemen of high educational standing in this colony—who have forwarded to the Education Committee their opinions generally upon the subject of education. The answers given by experts in regard to the question of raising the school-age to six numbered thirty-nine. Of the thirty-nine, twenty were in favour of raising the school-age, sixteen were against it, and three offered no opinion at all. Of course it is fair to analyse these opinions, and it is fair also to say that, while twenty witnesses, principally School Inspectors, were in favour of the age being raised, the sixteen against are mainly gentlemen interested in the maintenance of the system as it is. I should mention that all these gentlemen have given opinions upon other questions submitted to them by the Education Committee, and, as their opinions, being the opinions of experts, are interesting and valuable, I presume I need make no apology for placing them before the House. In addition to being interesting and valuable, they also show how diversified are the views of those best qualified to express opinions upon the question how and in what manner retrenchment should be effected. The names of the witnesses, their opinions, and their educational standing are as follow:—

† School Teachers' Associations—against.

* School Inspectors—in favour of.

Now, Sir, in discussing the question of raising the school-age it has to be remembered that the children enter the school at five years, and, as a rule, they pass the First Standard at about nine years. Therefore the question which the country as well as this Committee has to consider is this: Is the country in a position to pay for a period of four years £4 a head for somewhere between forty and fifty thousand children while they are passing through a number of infantile exercises which do not advance them very much in any proper scholastic sense? I think it a sufficient demand upon the resources of the country that it should be asked to begin to pay this £4 a head at six years of age. We have the opinion of Dr. Brown, Chairman of the Otago Education Board, that it is positively injurious to the physical system of the children that they should be sent to school at this early age; but, he says, being Chairman of an Education Board, "we are interested in getting them into the schools for the purpose of obtaining the funds. Therefore," he says, "I do not speak so strongly as I otherwise would about the necessity of keeping these children from the schools." That is refreshingly candid. One sees plainly that, while these gentlemen—medical men as well as educational experts—hold these rigid opinions in regard to the necessity of preserving the physical systems of the children, their view is modified or altogether obliterated by the other consideration that the Boards want the money which the presence of these children produces. I come now to the point raised by the honourable member for Nelson. He wishes to know whether we intend to carry out the proposal that a pupil who has passed the Sixth Standard shall not continue to be educated at the public expense. I may say that I was not aware, until I assumed the office of Minister of Education, that there was a Seventh Standard taught in the public schools. The common impression throughout the country is that the standards end at Standard VI.; but the Education Report for the year shows that there are 1,667 pupils in the public schools who are in a Seventh Standard, and that the cost to the country of their education in that standard is about £7,000. It is therefore a question for Parliament to consider, whether these pupils should obtain this higher education gratuitously and at the cost of the country. I hold that it was never intended they should. Why, I have learned from reading some Inspectors' reports that the headmasters of certain schools are not engaged in teaching Standards I., II., III., IV., V., or VI. They are exclusively engaged in teaching Standard VII., while the rest of the school is neglected. Now, I am quite aware that, in connection with the education of children of tender years, the kindergarten system is highly approved by men like Professor Huxley and Matthew Arnold, and I should like to see some such system introduced into this country. And while speaking upon this branch of the subject I should like to mention that, while I am not in favour of denominational education, it is a singular thing that one religious body—the Anglican Synod of Auckland—should be in a position to offer to educate all our children of tender years at a cost of 80s. per head per annum. Now, if that can be done, is it right that we should be asked to pay £4 per head per annum for children five years of age? I think this is the proper place to mention, in connection with this proposal to raise the school-age, that the Government give an undertaking that no country school shall be closed in consequence of the adoption of this proposal, should it be carried. We give that distinct undertaking. The Government will provide whatever money may be necessary: but, at the same time, I think the expense of these schools might be very considerably reduced if female teachers were appointed, as is the case in many other countries. I do not think it at all necessary to employ high-class teachers for the work of going through the infantile training of these young children. Now I have said all I have to say in regard to the first of our proposals. I come now to the second: the proposed reduction of 4s. in the capitation. In discussing this, or any other proposal which touches the cost of the education system, I hold that Parliament is bound, as a matter of right, to take into consideration that large proportion—one-seventh of the population—who labour under a serious disadvantage because they are unable to avail themselves of our educational system. It is our duty to make that disadvantage as light as possible by reducing the cost so long as we take care not to weaken or lessen the efficiency of the system. That is the point which I have to urge in regard to the necessity for making reductions. Common justice demands that we should have some regard for the feelings of that large section of the community who, on conscientious grounds, object to avail themselves of our education system, and who object to the high rate of expenditure incurred in keeping it up. That is the position. On the one hand stand a large and important section of the community who quite rightfully demand that the cost of the educational system, from which they derive no benefit, shall be minimised. On the other hand stand a great and influential scholastic guild who regard education, and the education system, as a fetish to which ought else should be sacrificed. But, Sir, above and beyond all this, we have to consider the interests of the taxpayer as a whole. It will be the aim and object of this Government, as much as it was the aim and object of any Government which preceded it, to maintain the efficiency of the education system; but at the same time I say that, taking into consideration the financial condition of the country, we are bound to see whether any reductions can be made without weakening or breaking down the system. We say such reductions can be made. I hear an honourable member, in an undertone, say, "Show us how this can be done." In answer to that, I say that it hardly devolves upon the Government now to show how that can be done, for it has already been done by several Education Boards in the colony. The Hawke's Bay Education Board has frequently made known its willingness and its ability to carry on the education system at a less amount than the sum now voted. The Auckland Education Board has also frequently discussed the question of making reductions; and on a recent occasion it voluntarily showed a reduction in its expenses to the extent of £1,000. But there is a Board in the colony, the name of which I do not care to give, which shows, by its own estimates, that on its ordinary maintenance account it will have in December, 1887—at the end of the present year—a surplus balance of £5,601 13s. 4d. Indeed, the difficulty with some Boards has been how to spend their surplus money, and some of them have spent it in a manner similar to the manner mentioned by the honourable member for Dunedin South a few evenings ago, in his reference to the expenditure on high-school buildings in Dunedin.

Mr. DODSON.—Will the Minister give us the name of the Board?

Mr. FISHER.—I would rather not give the name of the Board, but I will give the name of another Board which has taken up a very creditable position. It is the case of the Otago Education Board, which has voluntarily offered to meet the exigencies of the country by reducing its expenditure by a sum of nearly £9,000 a year. Now, this proposal of the Otago Education Board is to be found fully explained in the Otago Daily Times of the 18th November last, in which paper will be found a very able speech by Dr. Brown, the Chairman of the Board, from which I take this businesslike sentence:—

"The total estimated reduction, calculated on these lines, would come to between £8,500 and £9,000, giving a fair margin over the estimated loss of revenue."

In connection with this subject I may be permitted to read a letter which I subsequently received from a member of the Board, who says,—

"Dunedin, 18th November, 1887.

"DEAR SIR,—You will have received yesterday a telegram from our Chairman giving the result of the financing of a Committee of the Otago Education Board, convened to consider the question of retrenchment. In moving for the appointment of this Committee, I considered I was simply discharging an obligation that now lies upon every public body in the colony to support the Ministry of the day in their effort to bring about radical retrenchment. In my opinion we can come down to £10,000-per-annum reduction, if necessary, without in the slightest degree impairing the efficiency of the service; and, if we can do this in Otago, the colony can surely reduce £100,000. The most pleasant feature of the whole business is the cheerful co-operation of the teachers themselves, who, as a body, are perfectly satisfied to have their incomes shrunk to meet the exigencies of the situation. I feel certain that you will appreciate our spontaneous efforts to assist you, and that our action will greatly strengthen your hands in dealing with other Education Boards.

"I simply took action on the broad ground of retrenchment, and from no other reason: indeed, as a matter of fact, I cannot be classed as a supporter of the present Ministry.—I have, &c.,

"JOHN F. M. FRASER,

"Member of Otago Education Board."

I ask honourable members to specially mark that part of the letter which refers to the willingness of the teachers to assist in the retrenchment scheme, because it has been said that the only result of our proposals will be a reduction in the salaries of the teachers, and a feeling of antagonism has been set up on that account. Some Education Boards have taken up a distinctly antagonistic attitude. The Wellington Education Board has thought proper to send out to the teachers a definite intimation that the proposals of the Government mean a reduction in the salaries of the teachers, and that only. I do not think that is at all a creditable manner in which to meet the proposals of the Government. It would have been much better if the Board had taken time to consider the subject before sending out such an intimation.

Dr. NEWMAN.—It was the Chairman who sent that circular, not the Board.

Mr. FISHER.—Then I think the Chairman took upon himself a function to which he had no proper claim. Now, Sir, with reference to the salaries paid to teachers in New Zealand, it has been said that they are much lower than the salaries paid elsewhere. That is a question upon which the Committee should have full information before it comes to a decision on our proposals, in view of the statement having been broadly circulated that those proposals involve a reduction of the teachers' salaries. The following table will show the salaries paid in New Zealand and in other colonies:—

NEW SOUTH WALES.

10 per cent. are ..	Under £100.
35 " ..	Between £100 and £150.
50 " ..	Between £150 and £300.
5 " ..	Over £300.

The maximum salary of a master is £400.

NEW ZEALAND.

30·8 p. cent. are ..	Under £100.
53·6 " ..	Between £100 and £200.
11·9 " ..	Between £200 and £300.
2·8 " ..	Between £300 and £400.
0·9 " ..	Between £400 and £483.

Average salary, £150 2s. 2d.

The Victorian salaries are very much the same, and the Victorian Minister of Public Instruction has stated in Parliament that the Victorian teachers are the highest-paid teachers in the world. It should also be remembered that, in addition to their salaries, many teachers in New Zealand receive liberal bonuses. Especially is that the case in the Otago Education District. And further, the greater proportion of teachers in New Zealand are provided with residences. I do not say that these residences are given free in all districts, but in many they are. In making these comparisons, I desire to illustrate the further point as to the necessity for the adoption of some more general plan for the payment of teachers. For what do the figures in regard to the salaries show? They show this inequality: The highest salary paid to a headmaster is £495, in Hawke's Bay. The lowest, £272, is paid to the headmaster in Taranaki—who, it may be presumed, is a man of equal scholastic attainments. The highest-paid headmaster in Otago gets £483. The highest assistant-master at Hawke's Bay receives £353; the head assistant at Wanganui receives £177. In Otago the highest head assistant receives £287, as against £353 in Hawke's Bay; and in other parts of the colony the payments are as follows:—

	A.		B.		C.
	1.	2.	1.	2.	1.	2.
Auckland ...	£ 455	£ 80	£ 250	£ 30	£ 170	£ 28
Taranaki ...	272	84	180	50	114	55
Wanganui ...	347	128	177	60	197	90
Wellington ...	370	120	230	80	190	25
Hawke's Bay ...	495	153	353	80	153	73
Marlborough ...	300	130	162	40	130	15
Nelson ...	300	73	280	12	140	44
Grey ...	320	140	245	60	150	18
Westland ...	339	175	210	75	151	19
North Canterbury ...	459	86	326	65	164	30
South Canterbury ...	340	130	210	50	164	64
Otago ...	483	153	267	70	197	70
Southland ...	351	149	255	100	163	59

Columns A 1 and 2 give highest and lowest salaries for headmasters in the several districts; columns B 1 and 2, highest and lowest for assistants; and columns C 1 and 2, highest and lowest for sole teachers.

There is another instructive feature about this. In Table M, attached to the Education Report, we find that Otago pays £64,002 to 510 teachers, or an average of £125 per teacher; while Auckland pays £54,359 to 640 teachers, or an average of £84 per teacher. These figures, I say, point to the necessity for the adoption of some better general plan, under which men of equal attainments, of equal standing, men who are equally studious, and who devote themselves with equal earnestness to educational pursuits, should receive salaries proportionate to their attainments and ability. I now come to the third of our proposals, which is the substitution of the strict average for the working average. The working average is arrived at by making allowance for what one might call extraordinary circumstances, allowances being made for absence on account of weather, sickness, and other causes. If we adopt the strict average we shall pay upon the average of the number of children who have actually attended school. That is all I need say upon that point. And now with regard to the fourth proposal—namely, the proposal to abolish the vote for training-colleges. I am bound to say, with regard to these colleges, that the results obtained from them in different parts of the colony differ very widely. There are four of these colleges, located in the four principal cities, and the vote of £8,000 is divided amongst them. One is bound to admit that the results obtained in the Otago Normal Schools are very much better than those obtained in the other districts. I cannot speak with any authority with regard to the results obtained in Canterbury, beyond saying that they do not equal those of Otago; but, with regard to the North Island, I feel justified in saying that the results do not in any sense justify the expenditure. It is also worthy of remark that, while the four principal education districts have had the benefit of these training-colleges, the Education Districts of Hawke's Bay, Taranaki, Marlborough, Westland, and Southland have got on just as well without such institutions. In fact, the general experience is this: that those teachers who have not been trained at the training-colleges turn out to be more efficient public teachers than those who have received their training at these institutions. The principle upon which these colleges are conducted is this: The students or pupils attend a two years' course, during which term they receive at the different institutions from £40 to £60 a year; so that on the average they receive, say, £100 for the two years' attendance, and, in addition to that, they receive their two years' tuition. It happens also that the pupils are mostly females, many of whom, having received a hundred pounds and two years' education, decline for various reasons to take up the work of teaching. Then, with regard to the male pupils, they do not prove to be more successful than other teachers not trained in the training-colleges: in fact, they are less successful than those brought up in the ordinary schools. But I take it that upon this point the House would prefer to have the opinion of an expert. I will therefore read the opinion of Mr. Fidler, M.A., Inspector of the Auckland Education District. Having spoken of the schools in his district, and of the work sometimes being very mediocre, he expresses this opinion:—

"Some of the schools classed as very mediocre were in charge of certificated teachers from the Training College, and I regret to have to say that in them either the work or the discipline was not what was to have been expected in schools conducted by those who were supposed to have gone through a thorough course of training in the art of teaching."

That is the experience of Auckland. When we come to Wellington the experience of members of the Education Board is that the sooner the Training College is abolished the better. Having mentioned that, I need say no more with regard to Wellington. I think it much better that we should adopt the Victorian system, namely, that of training our teachers in the public schools, which is more likely to give them experience in the work they will be called upon to perform when they come to occupy the position of teachers. The instruction given in the training-colleges is purely of a literary character, and is not calculated to enable the teachers to carry out the duties which afterwards devolve upon them. And, even if we speak of literary training, I am bound to say that the literary training imparted in the training colleges is much below the standard of that which could be obtained in the universities of the colony; and I believe the highly-paid Professors in these institutions are absolutely starving for want of pupils. What better function, then, could these Professors take upon themselves than that of training teachers for the public schools? Many of the headmasters and assistant masters of the public schools are gentlemen who have taken university degrees, and they have proved the best qualified and most able teachers. I would suggest that our teachers for the public schools should undergo a properly-graduated course of training or apprenticeship in the public schools, and that at the end of a four or five years' course they should be granted the E certificate, which would give them a fair standing as teachers. In this way we could provide an ample supply of efficient assistants. Sir, I might detain the Committee much longer in discussing this branch of the question, which is to me a most interesting study. It is a portion of our education system in which I take a great deal of interest: but I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee longer. I have only occupied time sufficient to explain the proposals of the Government, so that the Committee may clearly understand them, and the form in which they will be put to the Committee. An honourable member asks me to say something in regard to the Syllabus. That is a subject on which very strong opinions are held, and I do not feel justified in burdening the general question with the consideration of that branch of the subject now.

Mr. SEYMOUR would like to hear the honourable gentleman's views on the subject of higher education, as that was a subject of very great importance in this country.

Mr. FISHER.—I wished to confine this discussion exclusively to the question of primary education, and to the proposals submitted to the House by the Government; but, since the question of the cost of higher education in New Zealand has been raised, I feel bound to say that the cost of higher education in New South Wales forms a very strong commentary upon the cost of higher education in New Zealand. For instance, the income of the high schools in New Zealand for 1886 was,—

From endowments ..	21,711	2	5
From school-fees ..	21,189	13	7
From votes of Assembly	3,725	0	0

Cost to State .. 25,436 0 0

The average attendance of pupils was 2,213. It follows therefore that the cost per head was £21 1s. 10d., of which—

	Per head.
The parents contributed ..	9 11 0
Parliament ..	1 14 0
Endowments ..	9 16 10

Total cost per pupil .. £21 1 10

In New South Wales there are six high schools, with an average attendance of 688 pupils, who cost a fraction over £10 per pupil.

Total cost of these schools is .. £7,079
Less fees paid by pupils .. 3,751

Net cost to State .. £3,328

The figures relating to the cost of high schools in New South Wales are taken from the "Special Report of the Assistant Inspector-General of Victoria on Public Instruction in New South Wales." Mr. Brodribb, the officer named, was specially instructed by the Victorian Minister of Public Instruction to visit New South Wales and report upon the school-system of that colony. His report was extremely interesting, and was rather a surprise to the Victorian people, for it showed that in many respects the school-system of New South Wales was superior to the Victorian system. As I have shown, the cost per high-school pupil in New South Wales is £10, against £21 1s. 10d. in New Zealand.

Mr. FITZHERBERT asked if the Minister would say something about industrial and Native schools.

Mr. FISHER wished to inform the Committee that he had specially excluded all questions from this discussion which did not directly affect it. He thought this was not the time for entering into questions relating to the Native schools or the industrial schools. He was sure if they once touched upon the industrial schools they would open up the whole question of the administration of charitable aid.

Sir J. VOGEL asked if the Minister considered school-buildings beyond the limits of the present discussion.

Mr. FISHER did not say that the expenditure upon school-buildings went beyond the scope of the present discussion, but the expenditure upon school-buildings was a question already disposed of, having been discussed on the public-works estimates.

Mr. W. P. REEVES said the Minister had told them that the saving proposed by reason of the school-age being raised to six years had been estimated to come to about £26,000. On the other hand, the Minister of Education told honourable members that a certain sum would be required to keep the country schools open. Had any estimate been made of the sum that would be required to keep the country schools open?—because that would materially interfere with the saving to be effected.

Mr. FISHER said an amount would be taken in the Appropriation Act to cover the necessary cost of keeping the country schools open.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—What amount?

Mr. FISHER asked whether it was not sufficient that the Government gave a pledge, understanding, or undertaking that the country schools should not be closed. Might it not be left to the Government to adopt the very simple process of taking an amount which would be sufficient to keep the country schools open?

Mr. SEDDON said that, if the matter were left to the Government, one Board might be treated liberally and another might be treated in a contrary manner. It was giving too much power to the Government.

Mr. FISHER hoped the honourable gentleman would accept the assurance that the Government would take the view that they were dealing with the system of education, and not with a particular district or with a particular Board or with a particular member. They would take the large view of the matter.

Mr. W. P. REEVES said the reason why he pressed the question was that it distinctly ought to have weight with the House as to whether they should adopt the proposals of the Government. There was only one reason why they should adopt their proposals—namely, that this large saving was to be made; but, if a considerable portion of it was required for keeping country schools open, then there was no reason why the proposals should be adopted.

Mr. FISH said that, in any event, there must be a considerable saving if the plan of the Government was carried out. It would not affect large schools or suburban districts, but small country schools, and he imagined then that not many country schools would be affected. There would be a very large saving; and, if they desired to make any attempt to save on the education vote, they should leave a considerable discretionary power with the Government until the experiment was fairly tested. He was disposed to place the fullest confidence in the Government in this matter.

Mr. CADMAN said there was one thing the Minister had not explained, and that was with respect to opening new schools in the country districts. This was a very important matter, as in a few years a number of new schools would be required all over the colony.

Mr. FISHER would like the honourable gentleman to understand that, although they were endeavouring to curtail expenditure, the Government would not fail to make provision for new schools. He hoped the honourable gentleman was as clear in his mind on that point as he (Mr. Fisher) was.

Mr. LEVESTAM said there was another matter on which the honourable gentleman had not spoken at all, and that was as to withholding the capitation for any boys or girls who had passed the Sixth Standard, irrespective of age. What he wanted to know was this: Did the Minister of Education intend to adhere or not to what was stated in the Proclamation, that capitation money would no longer be paid for children who had passed the Sixth Standard? The Minister had carefully avoided to state that, although he had asked the question very distinctly. He should like the Minister to reply distinctly to that question. Another statement made by the Minister was that, out of thirty-nine gentlemen who had been asked to state their opinion as to the school-age, nineteen were in favour of raising the school-age and sixteen were against it; and he then went on particularly to tell honourable members that these sixteen were all interested in continuing the age as at present. But he did not tell them who the nineteen were, and whether they had any interest the other way.

Mr. FISHER said they were mostly School Inspectors.

Mr. LEVESTAM would like the honourable gentleman to explain what his intentions were with regard to children who had passed the Sixth Standard but who were not of the age of fifteen.

Mr. FISHER said the answer was that as a rule the pupils were close up to fifteen when they passed the Sixth Standard. He could understand the honourable gentleman's objection coming from the members from the West Coast, where there were no training colleges; and yet the children on the West Coast passed the Sixth Standard a year earlier than those in any other part of the colony. His opinion was that, where a bright or intelligent child, male or female, distinguished itself and got to the Sixth Standard below the age, that child ought to be taken up by the Education Department and educated as a pupil-teacher; and, whether made a pupil-teacher or not, it ought to have the right to go forward and take a scholarship if it could do so. That was a point to which he should pay special attention. But there were children of well-to-do people—he would not say wealthy people, because he did not wish to raise class distinctions—who were kept in the schools after they had reached the age-limit and had passed the Sixth Standard; and what he said was this: that if those people wished to give their children a higher-class education which the children of the mass of the people did not get they ought to pay for it. If they desired to reach a higher standard of education than the generality of children attending the common schools, they ought to attend the colleges or district high schools, and the Education Act, section 56, said that for the education given at district high schools those who received it should pay.

Mr. SMITH thought that, if the school-age were raised, it would be wise at first to let it apply only to the boroughs, and let country schools be entirely exempted. There would then be a chance of carrying the proposal; but he did not think that country members would agree to their schools being affected. In his own district there were a large number of bush schools, mostly in new settlements, and about a third of the children attending them were under the age of six. Therefore, if these children were shut out, the schools would be starved. There was also this consideration: The parents of these children were mostly poor people, and even the mothers had often to be absent from home at work, and it was far better that these children should be safe in schools than running about uncared-for. Even if no capitation were paid on them they should be allowed to attend the schools. He hoped the whole proposal as to raising the school-age would be abandoned; but, if not, it should certainly be confined to the borough schools.

Mr. FISHER said that, representations having been made to the Government by members on both sides of the House as to the strong feeling existing with regard to the school-age proposal, the Government had determined to modify their proposals. He did not say that any communication or representation to the Government made by a section of members should be regarded as binding on the Committee; but the honourable members to whom he referred, speaking for themselves, had suggested that, if the Government did not press the proposal for raising the school-age, they would not object to the other proposals of the Government. He did not know how far that might be in accord with the views of the Committee as a whole, but, speaking for the Government, he was disposed to accept the agreement.

Mr. SEDDON disagreed with the other proposals. He could understand that members representing large centres should be indifferent on the question of school-age; but a large number of country schools would be affected, even were the proposed compromise agreed to. With a view to saving time, he had prepared certain questions to put to the Minister; and he would ask the honourable gentleman, first, if he would place on the table the opinion of the Crown Law Officers as to the power to raise the school-age by Order in Council alone. If the honourable gentleman thought it was not advisable to lay the opinion on the table, would he give some idea as to the clauses relied on by the Law Officers as giving that power? The Education Board of Otago had put certain queries to Sir Robert Stout, one of the ablest lawyers of the colony, in regard to this matter, and that gentleman had replied,—

"I am asked to advise the Board generally on their position—(1) the position of the Board regarding their teachers; (2) the position of the Board relative to the Normal School pupils—and also regarding the circular that has been issued by the Education Department, of the intention to pay a less amount towards the Board's expenses than has been paid formerly.

"This circular states that the amount to be paid, beginning in January, 1888, will be £3 15s. for each child in average daily attendance; but that no children under six years of age, and no child that has passed the Sixth Standard, will be paid for.

"I assume that the Parliament will be asked to sanction these proposals by Act, as, in my opinion, the Governor in Council has no power to make regulations to give effect to them. The power of the Governor in Council to make regulations is limited to nine things: see section 100, which is as follows:—

"The Governor in Council may, subject to the provisions of this Act, from time to time alter and repeal regulations and orders—

"(1.) For the organization and management of the Department of Education:

"(2.) For defining the principle on which daily average attendance shall be calculated:

"(3.) For the examination and classification of teachers:

"(4.) For the employment, education, and examination of pupil-teachers:

"(5.) For the issue of certificates of competency to teachers:

"(6.) For the establishment and management of normal or training colleges:

"(7.) For defining the standards of education which, under the provisions of this Act, may be prescribed by regulations:

"(8.) For prescribing the times and manner of auditing the accounts of Boards and Committees.

"(9.) For making such other regulations as may be necessary to secure the due administration of this Act.

"And all such regulations shall fix a day on which the same come into force, and shall be published in the Gazette, after which they shall have the force of law, and shall be laid before both Houses of the General Assembly as soon after they are passed as circumstances will permit."

"If it were contended that under subsection (2) there was power to alter the school-age I might point out that this subsection refers obviously to subsection (2) of section 8, which is as follows: 'In payment to the Board of every district of a sum of £3 15s. for each child in average daily attendance at a public school, such average daily attendance to be computed in manner prescribed by regulations.'

"The regulations to be made under subsection (2) can only define how this average daily attendance is to be computed. It makes no provision for either fixing the age or the standard the child has reached as a test of payment.

"The Act makes two provisions regarding the age of pupils. (1.) The school-age, under section 83, is defined as being between five and fifteen; and I submit that the obvious meaning of the Act was that all children were to be admitted free who were between those ages. (2.) The other provision of the Act dealing with school-age or attendance is that called the compulsory clauses. In these—89 and 90—there is provision that the children must attend between seven and thirteen. Their parents or guardians may apply for exemption, inter alia, if the child has passed a certain standard; but there is nothing compelling a guardian or parent to do so, and I am of opinion that, if the exemption were not asked, a parent or guardian would be bound to send the children between these ages. If the new regulation is carried out sections 89 and 89 of the Act would be altered or modified. Of course the Government may expect School Committees and Boards to receive children in the schools for which there is to be no capitation-allowance. But surely this would be a positive alteration of the Act. I am of opinion that regulations for defining the principle for calculating the average daily attendance cannot declare that children of school-age are not to be deemed to be enrolled, and that the regulation is ultra vires of the Governor in Council.

"I mention these points, and I assume that, though the Governor in Council has, on the advice of his Ministers, made a regulation, the Parliament will be asked to validate it by amending the Education Act. If the Act is not altered, and the proposals are attempted to be carried out, then they will be given effect to without the sanction of the law, and I should hardly think such a step will be taken by any Education Department.

"Obedience to the law is the important thing to be observed in a country with institutions like ours; and a Department of Education, whose duties are onerous and important, will be the last to disregard the law and set an example that cannot help being baneful.

"1. The position of the Board regarding teachers.—I am of opinion that the Board have no power, without the consent of the teacher, to lower any teacher's salary unless three months' notice of the intention to do so is given. The teachers are practically three-monthly servants, and their salary cannot be lowered at a week's or a month's notice.

"2. The engagements entered into by the Board with Normal School students are binding on the Board. They have been made under the sanction of the Act and of the regulations approved by the Minister under the Act, and I do not see how the Board can refuse to carry them out. It may be said if the Board are sued they have no funds. That would mean, however, that all the assets are exhausted; and that cannot well be said. If the true position of matters was pointed out to the Minister I cannot believe that he or the Parliament will ask the Board to repudiate contracts solemnly and legally entered into, unless indeed it is thought desirable to destroy the education system altogether. I cannot believe this is desired, and I am of opinion that the alterations have been proposed without a knowledge of the position in which the Education Board are placed.—ROBERT STOUT."

It was true that the attendance of children under seven or over thirteen could not be made compulsory; but, if the parents chose to send them, had not the Board legal power to claim from the Government capitation in respect of them? The Government had told them that the Crown Law Officers were of opinion that the Boards had no legal remedy in such circumstances; but, seeing the opinion given by a gentleman of such standing in the legal profession as Sir Robert Stout, it was only right the Committee should have the fullest and most certain information possible on the subject. While the general rule against the production of the opinions of the Law Officers might be a good one, he thought the Committee should be told what clauses the Law Officers had relied on as to the power to issue the Order in Council. On that point he wished to have clearly defined what the position of the Government was and what was the position of the Education Boards. Unless the matter was cleared up there might be a lot of money wasted in litigation. If there was any doubt as to the power of the Government, would they, if the House decided that the school-age should be raised, bring in a Bill to give effect to the wish of the House?

Mr. PYKE thought the last speaker was under a misapprehension. Schoolmasters were not paid by capitation. He knew a school in which there were only twenty children, and the master received £145 salary and £20 bonus. As a general rule, the salaries came to less than the capitation in the boroughs and more in the country. He must enter his protest against the compromise proposed by the Minister, for he was most strongly of opinion that the school-age should be raised. He thought, in the first place, that it was a waste of public money to send children between the ages of five and six to school. Why should the State schools become State nurseries? If it was necessary to keep schools open for these children, let kindergärten be established. To send a boy of five years to school was an act of cruelty, to begin with; both mentally and physically the child would be injured thereby, and there was no patriotism, no common-sense, no humanity in doing that which would tend to ruin a child body and mind. He remembered a long time ago a song very popular in England, of which a verse ran thus:—

There's a good time coming, boys,
A good time coming;
Little children shall not toil
Under, or above, the soil
In the good time coming,
But shall play in healthful fields,
Till limbs and mind grow stronger,
And every one shall read and write.
Wait a little longer!

We ought to allow our children to play in "healthful fields" a little longer. It might be said that these were sentimental reasons; but there was a good deal of truth and philosophy in sentiment sometimes; and, apart from that aspect of the question, any one who knew anything of the matter would know that there would be a good deal of saving by raising the school-age as had been proposed: and every one must know, too, that the colony was not in a position to any longer keep baby-farms. For these reasons he should be compelled to vote against the Minister if he allowed the school-age to remain as it was at the present time.

Mr. FISH regretted to say that he found himself in a most unfortunate position. During the whole of this session every measure which the Government had brought forward up to the present time he had felt it his duty to oppose, and now, when a matter came up on which he could heartily support them, he found that the Ministry were weakly ready to accept a compromise. If there was anything good in the proposals of the Government as laid before the House by the Minister that morning it was with regard to this question of the reduction of the capitation-grant, paying upon a strict average instead of a working average, the abolition of the training-schools, and the increase of the school-age. The last, to his mind, was the most important of all; and yet that was the proposal which the Minister was willing to give up! He felt so strongly upon this point that he should divide the House upon it and take a vote against the withdrawal of this proposal if he had no one to follow him in the lobby. None of the proposals which the Minister had brought forward could have so much commended itself to the good sense of the House and the country as that one. He agreed with the last speaker, who said that children should not be sent to school who were under the age of six years. Parents who had any sense of responsibility as to the future welfare of their children would not send their children to school at so early an age. It was only those who were desirous of getting rid of the responsibility of looking after their children who were so anxious to send them to school between the ages of five and six years. He was therefore very sorry, after the excellent reasoning which had been given to the House by the Minister of Education—and he could heartily compliment the honourable gentleman on the very clear manner in which he had put his statement to honourable members—that he should recede now from the most tenable grounds that he had for the position he had taken up. If they were to have retrenchment, if this was not an idle cry, in what better way could they retrench than by taking something from the people which was of no value to them? One argument that he admitted to be reasonable against the proposition of the Government was, that it might be injurious to the country schools; but, when the Minister of Education met that objection in the very fair manner in which he did by saying that under no circumstances should a school be closed on account of this increase of school-age, he (Mr. Fish) thought all objections to the proposition should be withdrawn. The propositions were practically of a tentative character. It was an experiment that was being made; and the experiment ought to be proceeded with, because it was worth trying, and, if in the course of a year or two it was found that it did not work well, it could very easily be abandoned. He was afraid that the Minister of Education had not had sufficient time at his disposal since accepting office to go thoroughly into the questions which related to his department; nor did he (Mr. Fish) intend to raise those questions in their broader aspect at this period of the session. He hoped that by next session the honourable gentleman would have grasped the whole question in relation not only to primary education but also to secondary education. The Minister should approach that subject with a view to seeing whether, in his opinion, a secondary system was necessary at all in this colony; and, if he found that it was, he should go still further into the matter, and see that it was conducted in a way that would lead to a great improvement in the relations between the primary and secondary systems. He should see that there should be no such loss of teaching-power as there was at the present time, owing to the absence of relationship between the two systems. The honourable member had cursorily said that it was a scandalous thing that secondary education should cost £24 per head in New Zealand, while in New South Wales it cost only £10. There was no doubt that was a scandal, and it was a subject well worth the consideration of the Government and the House. The House had too long neglected this very important question, and it had been neglected owing to the local feeling which had been engendered in consequence of the endowments which had been made in one place and another for educational purposes. The Province of Otago had most weakly and, he was justified in saying, most shamefully wasted money derived from these reserves, mainly owing to a fear that the reserves would be wrested from them at some time or other. It was so in other parts of the colony, he had no doubt. The people in the localities where the reserves were situated would not grapple with the question for fear of losing something that they at present possessed. So things were going on from day to day, and the evil was increasing. It was time that that feeling was given up, and that the House should attempt to deal practically and seriously with the whole question of education, both from a primary and a secondary point of view. With regard to the reduction of the capitation by 4s., he thought that that ought to be carried by the House unanimously. He was not inclined to argue out the details and show how it would affect this one or that one; but he wished to say this: that, from his experience of local bodies, which had been considerable, he knew that when any reform of this sort was raised there was always an outcry that this, that, or the other would be injured, and that the local body could never get on; but, when the reform was carried out in spite of all protests, it was found that things worked very well, and that people then came to wonder how it was that they had not carried out the reform long before. So it would be in this matter. If the House said to the Boards that they must get on without this 4s., it would soon be found that the system worked very well, and that the Boards carried on very well notwithstanding the loss. Whilst on this question he should like to say he should be glad if the Minister would consider the question of doing away with Education Boards altogether. If there was one department more than another of government action in connection with which it was possible to centralise, it was this matter of education. It was a matter which essentially concerned the whole colony, and he had no doubt that, whatever Ministry came into office, no matter to which party they belonged, they would deal fairly and justly with the whole colony. He did not say for a moment that the Education Board of Otago had not done good work; but, judging by what he had seen of that Board, he had no doubt that all over the colony there was a good deal of money being wasted by these Boards; thousands of pounds annually could be saved to the colony if these Boards were dispensed with. Look at the officers they employed, look at the paraphernalia employed and the expense incurred,—which could be got rid of if the whole thing were centred in the Government. In connection with this question they saw, in Otago, that the Committee of one of the largest suburban schools were anxious to retain the services of a teacher whose conduct and service they considered satisfactory, as did also a large majority of the inhabitants of the district, as expressed in a public meeting; and yet they found the Education Board arbitrarily dismissing the teacher notwithstanding these emphatic protests! Such a thing showed that there was something wrong with the machinery, and that it should be altered in some way. He was certain that, if the various district Committees had larger powers given to them, and the Boards were done away with, great good would be done to the cause of education generally. Then, there should be no hesitation in doing away with the extra capitation-grant. That strict average should be taken also appeared to him a good suggestion. That might affect the question of teachers' salaries, but the Minister should deal with that point also, and he had promised that the subject should engage his attention. The better equalisation of salaries of various teachers was desirable. In Otago the teacher who had been fortunate enough to get a large school would be receiving a salary of £550 or £560 a year, whilst other men, who were equally competent but who had small schools, would only receive £130 or £150; and this difference, he thought, was too great. He was not quite sure as to the wisdom of abolishing the training-schools. In Otago that school worked remarkably well, and it enabled the children of poor people, if they passed a certain examination, as a matter of right to become trained as school-teachers; whereas without such an institution it might be only those who could bring influence to bear that would get appointed pupil-teachers in the schools. The statement by the Minister, that the average age at which children passed the First Standard was nine years, had come upon him as a surprise. He should have thought it was nearer seven or eight years.

Mr. FISHER said the Education Report of 1887, Table F, showed—"Average age at which children pass the standards—Standard I., age 8·8"—that was eight and four-fifths.

Mr. FISH said even if that were only approximately correct it showed distinctly that there was no necessity to send children to school between the ages of five and six. He hoped the Minister would adhere to his proposal, and take a vote on the question of raising the school-age. Regarding the Seventh Standard, the Minister showed clearly, by the return produced, that there were only 1,600 children in the Seventh Standard; and these cost the country £7,000! He held that that money was thrown away. The standards, he thought, should be reduced to five, and the system of scholarships extended, so that by that means bright boys and girls whose parents desired that they should go further could obtain the advantages of secondary education. He thought it was a mistaken idea that it was necessary to give the bulk of the community, nine-tenths of them, an education beyond the Fifth Standard, and that in doing so they unfitted the children for those avocations of life which they were necessarily compelled to follow. He would strongly advocate giving every boy and girl in the colony a good sound education; but he did not think it necessary to give all who would follow various trades and farming and artisan employments education beyond the Fifth Standard. Besides that, at the present time they were taking boys and girls away from useful occupations at which they would be much better employed than they were in going to school. He said this in the interest of those whom he mainly represented—the working-classes. The honourable gentleman had made a remark to the effect that, as the Roman Catholics were non-participants in the State education, we should restrict our expenditure upon it as far as possible. That argument seemed fair enough; but he should like the honourable gentleman to consider whether it was not right that the Roman Catholics should have some assistance from the State, as well as the members of other religious denominations. Why should not that body of our fellow-colonists receive some aid towards teaching their children? We saved an enormous sum owing to the fact that the Roman Catholics did not send their children to the State schools, and it would pay better to give them a capitation-allowance than to induce them to send their children to the schools, for if they attended the State schools the accommodation would have to be enlarged, and a large additional expenditure incurred. This question was perhaps not in the line of the present discussion; but it was one that must engage the attention of the House, and, on the ground of fairness, sooner or later the claim of the Roman Catholics would have to be satisfied. He hoped the Minister would take a vote upon the question of raising the school-age, and he should be happy to go with him into the lobby on that matter.

Sir J. VOGEL was at a loss to know how to deal with this subject, as it came before them in such a strange fashion. To begin with, the honourable gentleman in charge of the estimates had given a positive assurance, when being elected, that he would neither alter the standards nor the school-age until he had absorbed the endowments into the general pool. Therefore it seemed to him that this proposal to alter the school-age, and to some extent to alter the standards, by only educating up to the Sixth Standard, would be the forerunner of the absorption of the endowments. But, putting that on one side, he thought the House was placed in a most absurd position. The education system of the colony was one of its most cherished institutions—one of its most important institutions—and large changes had practically been made by the Government without the authority of law, and the House was now asked to express an opinion on the subject by a vote of £5. Where would be the record? He was not even aware that a Hansard report was being taken in Committee; it was not generally done. Where would be the record of honourable members' opinions on the question, voting whether a sum should be £5 more or less? This was placing the House in a most absurd and unfair position. He contended that the Government had no right to go the length they had gone in the way of making a public announcement to the various Boards, and in that way stimulating those Boards to give notices and make changes, without having previously taken the authority of the House. He contended, further, the taking a vote in Supply as to whether or not the amount should be reduced by £5 was not giving the House a right and fair opportunity of recording its opinions. There were many opinions upon this subject, and these could not find any means of utterance on the question of simply £5 more or less. There appeared to be no doubt whatever that the changes proposed could not be legally made without the authority of an Act. He held in his hand the opinion of Sir Robert Stout upon the subject; and he did not think any one who read that opinion, so clearly and concisely expressed, could have any doubt whatever as to the meaning of the Act which was at present in force, or that it was not going beyond the law for the Minister of Education to have instituted such changes, or to institute such changes in the future without special authority of law. It was clear that the Minister of Education had not power to issue regulations altering the school-age for children, and the Minister was now asking the Committee to concur in an illegality. He now came to the various points of the proposals, and he would first take the question of the reduction of the subsidy by 4s., and the statement that the country schools would not suffer. It was clear that the honourable gentleman was somewhat mistaken as to the conditions under which these subsidies were paid. If they were given in such a manner that the amounts to the country schools as against the town schools were ear-marked, it would be possible to say that the reduction in the subsidies would not affect the country schools; but, as a matter of fact, the Boards had the whole revenue in their hands, and the result was that the country schools received the surplus after the town schools were provided for. Therefore, if the school-age were reduced, and also the amount of subsidies paid, the result would be that the country schools would be in a worse position than they were in now. There was no logical manner in which such a proposition could be carried out under the present law. No doubt it was worthy of consideration whether the scheme of capitation should not be so altered as to allow of different amounts being paid to town schools and to country schools; but the figures lately quoted by the honourable gentleman—and which he

(Sir J. Vogel) might say were compiled at his request before he left office—showing the average cost of schools of different sizes, proved the fallacy of the idea that the country schools could be kept intact while reducing the amount of capitation. He believed that at the present time, in the case of schools with an attendance of over a hundred, the average expenditure was over £3 per head; in schools with an attendance of from fifty to a hundred, it was over £4 per head; and in the case of schools under fifty it was nearly £6 per head. It was clear, therefore, that striking off children under six years of age, and taking the exact numbers attending at country schools, would not regulate the amount which those schools would receive from the Boards. The late Government proposed that the reduction should be at the rate of 1s. a year, and he could see no reason why the House should increase that rate of reduction. He was content that 1s. should be reduced for the present year, and another shilling for next year, and so on; but how he was to propose such a thing he did not know, under the proposition that there should be only a general reduction of £5. The mode in which the question was placed before the Committee was preposterous, and only showed the way in which it was sought to fetter the discretion and liberty of the House. As to the reduction in the school-age, he thought, himself, that it was not desirable that children should be sent to school before they were seven years of age; but that was only his individual opinion; and they knew that the practice obtained amongst parents of sending their children to school at as early an age as five years, and, under our boasted free system of education, we should not prevent parents carrying out their ideas in that respect. There was no doubt that a great many parents were in the position that when their children grew to a certain age they required their services, some at twelve years of age, and some at fourteen; and if the age at which those children could be sent to school was raised it would be putting it out of the power of those parents to give their children a proper education. The proposition of the Government was a retrograde step, and one that was opposed to our liberal system of education; and it was not in harmony with the condition of these institutions before the General Government absorbed them from the Provincial Governments. He was decidedly against increasing the school-age unless a very specific intimation were given by the House that it should be done. Moreover, it was a question which should be decided by Act, and not merely by resolution in Committee or even in the House. He had heard it said that some members of the Opposition and some of those who supported the Government had agreed to a compromise; but he was no party to anything of the kind, and had only heard of it when mentioned by the honourable gentleman in charge of the estimates. He would strongly urge upon those who considered themselves members of the Opposition not to be led into any arrangement whatever, even if they approved of these alterations, because an offence would be committed against the law if any action were taken without the sanction of the House by Act. Further, he said that, even if honourable members had agreed to the proposals, they had no right to allow them to be carried out under a vote of a reduction of £5, more or less, but that they should insist upon their being given effect to in a constitutional manner. With regard to the general question, they knew what the effect would be of taking from the revenues of the Boards. The Minister of Education proposed to take some £60,000 or £70,000 from the Boards. He could not say that the honourable gentleman had not authority to do that, and he was disposed to agree with the honourable gentleman in regard to gradually doing away with the training-schools, because he did not think the State had any more right to educate persons to be schoolmasters or schoolmistresses than it had to educate persons to be doctors or lawyers. Therefore he was favourable to doing away with those schools, provided it was done in a legal manner. But let the Committee look at the effect of taking away £60,000 or £70,000 from the revenue of the Boards, and it must be seen at once that that meant a reduction in the salaries of teachers to the extent of 15 per cent. And he would ask, if it was justifiable to force upon school-teachers such a reduction, why should it not be made to apply to the Civil Service generally? As far as he could see, there was not the slightest intention on the part of the Government to do that. The late Government proposed a pro rata reduction; but he would not discuss that now, and would only ask, why should they, without any notice, force on school-teachers this large pro rata reduction? If there was any way in which an honourable member could enable him to vote in favour of 1s. reduction this year and another shilling next year, and so on, he would support such a proposition. Otherwise, he took it that, if they voted for the proposition as it now stood, to take off 4s., it would be open to the Government to propose a reduction of another shilling next year. He hoped the House would not sanction the raising of the school-age to six years; and, if it were sanctioned in this irregular manner, he trusted the question would afterwards be tried by law; and the Government would then learn that they could not override the laws of the country without taking the proper constitutional mode of doing so.

Mr. FISHER desired to take advantage of the earliest opportunity to say that the agreement to which he had referred earlier in the day, which was intended to give effect to the wishes of many members on both sides of the House, had proved unsatisfactory to both sides; and therefore he would ask the Committee to vote upon the proposals in the form in which he had submitted them that morning. He wished also to say that if the proposals as a whole were carried the Government would still adhere to the understanding that the country schools should receive full assistance.

Mr. PEACOCK, confining himself in the meantime to the point before the Committee, thought the position taken up by the honourable member for Christchurch North was certainly inconsistent, and could not be justified. The honourable gentleman said very decidedly that in his opinion seven years was young enough to send children to school; and yet he even objected to the age being made six years. The honourable gentleman should not refrain from carrying out his decided opinion merely for party purposes.

Sir J. VOGEL explained that what he said was in regard to his own children; but other parents had a right to their own opinions with regard to their children.

Mr. PEACOCK thought it might at all events be asserted that those who advocated the raising of the school-age to six years as a means of economy in the education system might claim to be as good friends to that system as those who objected to the change being made. The matter might be viewed from two stand-points—first, the question of precedent for the adoption of that age; and, second, considering our own circumstances in this colony, was there any valid reason against the proposed change? With regard to the question of precedent, he held in his hand the general report of the School Commissioners of Scotland, in which it was stated that practically the age was six years there. In the United States also the general school-age was six years. And the same applied to Germany. He was, of course, aware that there were some arrangements in the latter country with regard to infant instruction; but, speaking as to the primary schools, the school-age was practically six years. Then there was the other question. It was stated by those who were opposed to raising the school-age that children would be running about in the gutter, and that certain evils would befall them by so doing. He should ask the Committee what it really meant. He presumed honourable members would not dispute that, so far as bodily health was concerned, it was far better for a child at that age to be breathing the fresh air and developing itself physically than to be cooped up in the close atmosphere of a schoolroom for five hours a day. Surely there could be little difference of opinion upon that point. Very well, what was the evil to be apprehended in case the children were allowed to remain outside between the ages of five and six years? Was it moral contamination? Then, he put it whether the proposition did not refute itself. From whom would they receive evil example or learn bad language? Surely it would be from children older than themselves. But these children would be in school, and therefore he maintained that the objection had no force. There was thus a decided advantage in receiving physical outdoor exercise at an early age; and contamination from children older than themselves could not take place, because the older children would be in school at the time. He was very glad to hear the Minister of Education say that he would adhere to this point, and that the Committee ould take a vote upon it. He thought that considerable advantage would result in the shape of economy by the adoption of the Government's proposition, especially as they were assured that precautions would be taken so that country schools would not suffer if such plan were carried out.

Mr. ORMOND was glad the Minister of Education had decided to adhere to his proposition, and for this reason: that he knew from practical experience that the amount he asked was sufficient, if it were properly administered, to provide everything that was wanted in the district schools of the colony. He (Mr. Ormond) rose for the purpose of quoting the expenditure that took place in the district he came from, and here the expenditure was kept within the amount given under the Act and the 4s. allowance; and, besides being kept within that amount for several years, a large sum had been placed to the credit of the building account after providing for the cost of education. The district he came from was called the Hawke's Bay District, and it was a very large and scattered one. It extended from the East Cape down to Woodville. It included as large and as scattered a population as there was in the colony, and had a very large proportion of small schools. Therefore it laboured under the greatest disadvantages that any district could labour under. As a rule, the salaries paid by the Board would compare with those of other districts, excepting in one particular: that the same large salaries were not paid in schools that had very small averages of attendance; and he entirely agreed with the honourable gentleman that those schools should be provided for by employing certificated female teachers instead of male teachers, and, of course, at a smaller salary. He had been looking to see how it was that in other districts they could not do as they did in Hawke's Bay—provide for their schools with the amount placed at their disposal; and the reasons were: first, that there was a great difference in the proportionate cost of administration—the Boards were more extravagant with their officers. That was one cause. The other cause was that to which he had referred—it was that they paid in the small schools in the country districts salaries out of proportion to the work to be done, and which could be done more economically. He might give the figures, showing what was done last year in the district which he wished to put as an example before the House. In that district, extending from the East Cape to Woodville, there were 4,198 attendances, which, at 4s a head, gave £16,792. The allowance for inspection was £300; consequently the total income last year was £17,092. The following was the expenditure: Salaries, including the board, inspection, and everything, £900; incidental, £200; teachers' salaries, £10,774; bonus on tuition of pupil-teachers, £330; bonus on average results, £1,000; and School Committees, £1,600. That totalled up £14,804 for the last year; so that there was left, out of the moneys allowed by Parliament, a balance of £2,288. That showed, at any rate, that education was carried out as efficiently in his district as anywhere else; and he believed a reference to the Inspector-General would elicit from that gentleman the opinion that the schools there were as efficiently taught and as well equipped as any schools in the colony. They endeavoured to supply small country schools with female teachers, when these could be got, or by giving salaries according to the work; and where good men were wanted they paid them higher wages than were paid in any other part of the colony. He had worked out what would be the position of that district under the allowance of £3 15s., and supposing children between five and six years were excluded from the schools; and he found that then, with some 500 children deducted from the average attendance, instead of having 4,000 odd attending there would be 3,619; and that number, at £3 15s., would give a revenue of £14,116. They would be able to pay every salary exactly the same to all the principal teachers, pay the same bonuses, give the same allowance to School Committees—do everything except provide for the tuition of these 500 children, which would be a very small sum, because they did not cost, on an average, the same sum as older children. He was able to show that in that district they could provide the whole education at £3 15s. with no reduction of salaries, the same allowance to School Committees, and the same average results upon the work of the teachers, and do it for the money the Government proposed; and he saw no reason why that could not be done in other parts of the colony. The question, then, was, Could they assist the Minister in arriving throughout the colony at such a result? It appeared to him that one of the things required to be done was that there should be established one fixed scale on which all teachers should be put in proportion to the attendance at their schools. If that were done, they could at once do something which would establish an average expenditure all over the colony. No part of the colony could then complain, and the teachers would put themselves on a better basis than they were on at this moment. If that were done, they would do away with the anomaly referred to by the Minister when he opened the subject to the Committee. He (Mr. Ormond) took a liberal scale of salaries all through, and payments according to work and results. He would not have the anomaly which the honourable member for Dunedin South had pointed out, that of a man having a school for which he was getting a large salary, and a master alongside getting a much smaller salary, although they had each equal claims. If teachers were paid according to the work done, according to attendance and results, and if a proportionate limit were placed on the cost of administration, and the system assimilated all over the colony, the cost of education would be enormously reduced, and they would be able to carry out what the Minister proposed—provide education at the diminished cost he proposed. He had shown that in one district it was absolutely possible to give effect to the Minister's proposals; and he challenged any honourable gentleman who disagreed with him to get the opinion of the Inspector-General so as to obtain that gentleman's opinion as to the condition of the schools he was referring to. He ventured to say that the Inspector-General would state that the schools of Hawke's Bay were as well provided with teaching-power and in every other respect as any other schools in the colony. If he had succeeded in showing this, he thought he had done something towards establishing the principle which the Government were contending for. A word now as to what had been said against raising the school-age to six. It was contended that, if they did this, they would injure the country schools. Those who said this did not remember that in the case of country schools, infinitely more than town schools, children between five and six were in a great number of cases unable to go to the schools. The schools were so isolated, and the children had to travel such long distances, that a large proportion of the children between five and six did not attend these schools. In fact, the number of these children as compared with those of older ages was comparatively small. It was a question open to controversy as to the benefits which children between five and six derived from attending town schools. All sorts of opinions could be got from specialists on that subject, but, as far as he had been able to read and instruct himself, the general belief was that a child under six years of age could get no real benefit from the teaching. That the child got some benefit from having a little order or regularity put into his life was the most that could be contended; but it was all that could be sought by those who were in favour of that principle. But they were obliged to do at the present time what their means enabled them to do; and parents of children of that young age must be told that the country could not provide nurseries for them. Therefore he hoped this limit of the age to five would not be insisted on, but that they would raise the age to six. He would be one of the first to raise his voice against the minimum age being raised to seven, because it would be taking away one of the years when children were beginning to benefit by education, and robbing them, in many cases, of one of the few years during which they could remain at school. He had therefore dealt with the school-age, and with the reduction of the capitation to £3 15s. With regard to the strict average, he was bound to say to the Committee that, if the other reductions were made, that could be allowed, because he had only been able to show to the House that, in the district he came from, they were able to provide everything on the present scale on the ordinary average attendance, and the Minister told them that the difference between ordinary and strict average would be a sum of £8,000 over the whole colony. Therefore he was unable to contend from his experience that that could be done without making some reductions in the scale of the salaries and the other moneys paid to the teachers. Wishing, as he did, to see the full system maintained, he did not see that they could agree to the further reduction proposed. As to disallowing capitation on those who had passed the Sixth Standard, that, he thought, was an illiberal proposal. The parents of 1,670 children, and the children themselves, chose to avail themselves of a privilege now given them of getting further education after they had passed the Sixth Standard, and he did not think they should be deprived of that privilege which the law allowed them now. He hoped that next session they would consider how the primary schools should connect and be merged with the secondary system, and, if proper proposals on that subject were made, he should agree with those who would do away with the Sixth Standard. Then, there should be a system of scholarships, which would give every child in the colony the possibility of getting higher education under the secondary system: the benefits of the secondary system should be open to all alike, even the poorest, which they certainly were not now. However, that was a large subject, which there was not now time to discuss. He agreed with those who thought the Committee was bound to take into consideration the position of that section of the community who did not derive any benefit from our education system—he meant the Roman Catholics. In considering proposals of this kind on the part of the Government it was their bounden duty to remember that section of the community; and, remembering that they did not derive any benefit from our system, it was more the duty of the House than it otherwise would be to make the charge for education press as lightly as possible on the taxpayers, so that the Catholics might feel it as lightly as possible. He went further and said that that section of the community were entitled to some assistance from the colony in the education of their own children: but the present was not the time to discuss that question. He hoped the House would agree to the proposals of the Government; and if they were passed he was sure the Boards would be able to bring down their expenditure to more reasonable limits without in any way affecting their capability of giving a good education to the children of the colony.

Mr. BARRON hoped the Committee would not agree to the proposals of the Government. He did not know who those honourable members were who had suggested a compromise to the Government, but he did not agree with any of the proposals. Here they were, with only two or three days more to consider a large amount of important business, hurrying through a discussion on such an important question as this, which merited exhaustive consideration and discussion. Early in the session the House appointed a Select Committee to inquire into the whole education question, and that Committee had taken a great deal of evidence, but found that the evidence offered was so voluminous, and the subject itself so large, that it was utterly impossible for it to come to any mature conclusion and make a report of any value during the time at its disposal; and they had therefore recommended that the inquiry should be postponed till next session, and that in the meantime no material changes should be made. Now, he believed it would be very unwise to make now any changes such as those proposed, because they might be making some changes hurriedly that they would afterwards find there was cause to regret. He thought that honourable members would be perfectly justified in saying to the Government, "We have had a useful preliminary discussion, we know exactly the opinions of the Government, but we do not think that any material changes should be made before the subject can be fully considered, and therefore it would be well to let the whole matter stand over till next session, when we shall be able to deal with it and perhaps to dispose of it." Many honourable members had spoken of the great cost of the system. Well, whose money was it? It was the money of the great mass of the people. A glance at the list of our chief sources of revenue showed that it was the great mass of the people who provided the greatest portion of the revenue; and this was one of the most important of the few inadequate returns they got for the heavy contributions they made to the cost of the public administration. No doubt there were extravagances in our present education system, and economies might be possible without affecting the efficiency of the system; but changes should be approached in the most careful manner, and they had not sufficient evidence to warrant them now in making those changes. The Minister of Education was only new to his portfolio, and he could not be supposed to have had time to give that exhaustive consideration to the subject that he otherwise would, and therefore, for the sake of his own reputation, he should hesitate to lay a finger on the system until he was more fully possessed of information than he possibly could be now as to the direction in which reforms should go. If the Minister would make up his mind to leave the system this session as it was, and to make an exhaustive inquiry throughout the colony during the recess, it would be a very good thing. He would benefit by the general and local knowledge so acquired, and he would find that reforms were called for in one part of the colony which might be undesirable in others. For instance, there were the normal schools, which had apparently been a failure in some districts, while in Otago they had evidently been a great success. There were many differences of that kind, which the Minister should carefully consider before proposing any such radical changes as these now before the Committee. He (Mr. Barron) should not support any of the changes now proposed, although he should be very glad the next session, after getting full information, and giving the subject long and careful consideration, to consider each proposal on its merits, and possibly to support some of them.

Mr. SEDDON would remind the Minister that he had not answered a question put by him (Mr. Seddon) some time before with reference to the legal power of the Government to raise the school-age except by amending the Education Act. It was most undesirable to give any possibility for wasting public money in litigation over such a matter. He would ask the Minister to decide that the school-age should not be raised in the country districts, and that capitation payments on working average should continue, the capitation not being decreased. He would show that the proposals of the Minister would have the effect of closing schools in the country districts, and therefore that the reductions should certainly not apply to country districts. That was the only fair way of meeting the contingencies that were bound to arise. Those who had passed the Sixth Standard should not be excluded from the schools in districts where there were no means of secondary education; because to allow them to continue at the primary schools was the only way by which they could prepare for the Civil Service examinations. It would be grossly unfair to withdraw the capitation in such cases in districts in which there were no means of secondary education. He had been connected for twenty years with the working of education in New Zealand. Before the general system was started, and when means for schools had to be obtained in the best way available, he had taken a part in it, and since the system was established in 1877 he had been closely and intimately connected with its working; and he would state to the Committee how his experience caused him to regard the present proposals. It would be less unfair to the Westland District if the Government raised the school-age and did not persist in their other proposals than vice versa. There were, say, seventy children under six attending school in the Westland District, and the Board would receive as capitation for them about £270, and therefore to exclude them would mean so much loss of revenue. But the effect of adopting the other three proposals of the Government would be a loss to the Board of £900 a year, the two sums together being just one-fifth of the Board's present yearly revenue. It would therefore be preferable for that district that the school-age should be raised to six, and that the Government's other proposals should be negatived. Now, to bring the expenditure of the Board within the reduced revenue, the Board would have to reduce the salaries of its teachers. The total amount paid away by the Board was £6,000, of which £4,238 was paid to teachers, so that if the revenue were reduced by one-fifth there must be a reduction of teachers' salaries. But already the teachers in Westland were paid less than they were in any other part of the colony, and if they were further reduced the result would be that the best of the teachers would be lost to the district, and a great blow would be struck at education in that part of the colony. And he might say, in reply to a remark which had been made by the Minister of Education, that in the Westland District the value of the residences was taken into account when the teachers' salaries were fixed, and so were the payments of bonuses for teaching pupil-teachers. Then, let the House look at the figures as to the salaries paid to teachers in different education districts. In Taranaki there were forty-one teachers receiving £100 a year; in Westland there were thirty-five receiving under £100; in Taranaki there were twenty who received between £100 and £200; in Westland there were twenty receiving between £200 and £300, in Taranaki one, in Westland five. In Hawke's Bay sixty-five teachers received under £100, thirty-nine received between £100 and £200, nine between £200 and £300, two between £300 and £400, and one over £400. In Westland there were none over £300. These proved that the salaries now paid in Westland were very small; and how was it possible for the Board to further reduce them? Then, as to the attendance. Table J of the Education Report of 1886 showed that the average attendance in Hawke's Bay was 95·7 per cent., whilst in Westland it was 68·9 per cent., and in North Canterbury it was 70·4 per cent. That would show how much would be lost by Westland if the strict average were to be taken. Owing to an adverse climate, and the distances pupils had to travel in Westland, the attendance was very likely to be interfered with, and what would not be felt in Hawke's Bay would be very seriously felt in Westland. The honourable member for Napier should have remembered that when he was speaking; and it was owing to those influences that, while Westland would lose £280 or £300 if the school-age were raised, it would lose £900 if the capitation were reduced, and if the strict average were taken instead of the working average. As to the size of the schools, Westland showed very poorly by comparison with others. In Westland there were five schools where there were under 20 pupils, two in which there were less than 25, six in which there were less than 50, three in which there were less than 100, one only where there were 150, two where there were 250, and only one where there were more than 300. Whereas in Hawke's Bay there were five having 15 pupils; one from 15 to 20; two, 20 to 25; eleven, 25 to 50; four, 50 to 75; four, 75 to 100; five, 100 to 150; six, 150 to 300; seven, 300 to 500. Of course, where there were so many of these large schools, it was possible to make reductions to meet a reduced capitation-grant, and, so far as Hawke's Bay was concerned, he indorsed everything that had been said by the member for Napier in reference to the possibility of reducing expenditure; but it was not possible to do that in districts like Westland, where there were so many small schools. This all went to prove that the whole thing should be in the hands of one central department, so as to secure equality in the payment of teachers. If they looked at the cost of administration they would see that the charges in Westland were very low as compared with those in other places. The cost of inspection in Hawke's Bay stood at 3s. 9d., whilst in Westland it was only 2s. 10d.

Mr. Seddon

Mr. ORMOND.—Take the whole cost of the executive staff.

Mr. SEDDON said the number of schools in Hawke's Bay was 39; Westland, 22; Taranaki, 62. The average attendance was—in Taranaki, 1,611; Hawke's Bay, 3,264; Westland, 1,467. And the cost of management per head was: Taranaki, 4s. 11d.; Hawke's Bay, 2s. 3d.; Westland, 4s. 3½d.

Mr. ORMOND.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SEDDON said, if the honourable gentleman would take the average daily attendance into consideration, he would see that really the cost of management in Hawke's Bay was just three times what it was in Westland, for of course the large number of pupils reduced the rateable amount in Hawke's Bay. Taking the cost of inspection, it was—in Hawke's Bay, 3s. 9½d.; in Westland, 2s. 10½d.; while in Taranaki it was 5s. 3d. That showed that the cost of inspection in Westland was much less than in Hawke's Bay, and was only one-half of that expended by Taranaki. As to maintenance, the cost in Westland was £3 8s. 10d., and in Hawke's Bay it was £3 13s. 8d. In this matter, again, the Westland Board was managing more cheaply than that of Hawke's Bay. Now, the totals showed as follow: Hawke's Bay, £3 19s. 8½d.; Taranaki, £4 8s. 1d.; Westland, £3 16s. 1d. It could not be said that they were extravagant in regard to inspection, management, or payment of teachers. Then, coming to the current expenditure on buildings in Westland, it was only £4 11s. 2d., and in Hawke's Bay £5 11s. 4d.; so that Hawke's Bay again was favoured considerably more than other districts. He had forgotten to mention that in Taranaki the total was £4 5s. 4d., as against £3 16s. 1d. in Westland. He put this table before the Committee to show that the carrying of these proposals meant the stopping of the whole system in districts like Westland, Greymouth, and Taranaki, unless they took the profits from the more favourably situated districts, like Hawke's Bay, and applied them to the other districts. Then, as to the children attending the school after they had passed the Sixth Standard, was no credit to be given to districts like Westland and Greymouth, where, labouring under the difficulties he had pointed out, the pupils passed the standards at a very much earlier age than in other parts of the colony? He would undertake to say that that was the case, and that children going from the Auckland District to Westland were always put back a standard. What were they to do with their boys who passed the Sixth Standard at twelve years of age? Were they to be refused permission to attend the school any longer? There were no scholarships for them. It was a crying shame that in the whole Education District of Westland there were only two scholarships—he believed now only one scholarship. That being so, there was no chance for the boys to enter the professions, to become teachers, or to pass the Civil Service examination, unless they were allowed to attend school after passing the Sixth Standard, for there was neither high school nor university on the West Coast. Why should they in one session say that the Civil Service of the colony should be open to all the people of the colony—to the child of the poor as well as to the child of the rich—and then in the next session render the law a dead-letter and say they would reduce the standards, or not grant the capitation for any child who had passed the Sixth Standard? The Minister of Education had had to admit that in Westland children passed the Sixth Standard at the age of thirteen; and if a boy passed the standard at that age, and there was no scholarship open to him and no secondary school he could attend, how was he to pass the Civil Service examination, or have a chance of becoming a teacher? This was, he thought, one of the worst proposals made by the Government. Then, to take the proposals made by the Minister. He had told them that he expected to save £26,000 by raising the school-age, £16,000 by reducing the capitation grant, £8,000 by paying on the strict average instead of the working average, and £7,000 by doing away with the subsidy upon pupils attending the school after they had passed the Sixth Standard. Taking the promise which the Minister of Education had definitely made, that no country school should be closed owing to these proposals, he thought that only one-half of that amount would be saved; that, instead of the total saving being £57,000, it would not be more than £27,000 or £28,000. If that were so, would it be worth while disturbing the existing system to effect that paltry saving? He contended that it would be far better for the Government to allow this question to stand over till next session, and then to deal with the matter in a comprehensive way, sweeping away the Boards of Education entirely, making the wealthier districts of the colony contribute to the cost of education in the more sparsely populated districts, and having a general system of inspection, so that there could be no difference in the standards, and a comparison could be instituted between the different districts. In some districts the standards were much below—a full standard below—what they were in other districts. It was also necessary that there should be greater equality in the payment of teachers. He could say unhesitatingly that teachers who were producing results that were unequalled in any other part of the colony, who were giving every satisfaction, and were performing their duties in an heroic and patriotic manner, were getting smaller salaries than others who were not doing anything like such good work; and the sooner this phase of the question was faced by the Minister of Education and dealt with the better. Then, the proposals before them plainly meant the closing of the schools to 6,500 children. What would the parents think of the Parliament, or of the representatives, who would close the schools on such a large number of children who were at present being educated in them? No provision whatever had been made, no warning given; but these 6,500 children were to be turned adrift. He thought this would cause much bad feeling, and that the people of the colony would rebel against such a high-handed proceeding. They should bear in mind that the mass of the people paid through the Customs something like £1,500,000 per annum, and that all they got for that large amount was simply the amount recouped to them by way of education, which was less than £500,000. He could prove conclusively that in Westland they could pass the children through the six standards between the ages of five and twelve; and that those standards, as the papers would show, were higher than the standards in any other part of the colony. These children had a chance for the Civil Service, the professions, and scholarships, if they were kept at school two or three years more, between the ages of twelve and fifteen; and they should not be deprived of that chance. The children were passed through the standards without any injury to them physically, as could be seen by any one who would pay a visit to any of the State schools on the West Coast. You could go to the galleries of the schools on the West Coast and hear the children between five and six years of age singing their little ditties, learning three or four verses and singing them to music, saying their alphabet from A to Z, and showing such memory as many members of the House could not show. Then, they were brought under discipline in marching and in their classes. It was absurd to say that these things should be taken away from them because it was doing them an injury. You could not keep them away from the schools, and to compel them to stay away would be doing them an injury in after-life. The bulk of the people were paying a million and a half every year through the Customs, and all they got in return was this education. Having established the system it should not be swept away, as was proposed to be done under the Government proposals, for they meant sapping the whole system. If it were put to the people of the colony, they would rather pay this paltry £28,000 which it was proposed to save than have their education system interfered with. Before now the people of Westland had paid £1 a head, and even the miners who had no children paid it willingly rather than have the education system destroyed. What did property contribute to the revenue? A paltry £300,000. Yet property, and the Government, which represented property, were trying to prevent the education of the masses by sapping the present system of education. The Civil Service was now thrown open to competition, and the children of poor people had a chance of getting into it, and it would be grossly unfair for the House to shut that door to them. Those who were in favour of the Government proposals were those who wanted to keep the Civil Service and the professions to themselves, and to keep the poorer classes down as hewers of wood and drawers of water. He, for one, must resist any such proposal. Let the Government carry their proposals in toto, with a pledge that the country schools should not suffer; and he would prefer that to the compromise proposed by the honourable member for St. Albans and other honourable members. He was glad to think that there were only some five or six persons who had joined in that compromise, because it was purely in the interests of the rich and against the education of the poorer classes. He would like the Minister of Education to give a distinct pledge to the Committee that during the recess he would consider the question of having the whole thing centralised, and making the wealthier parts of the colony pay for the poorer; also of equalising the payment of teachers, and making education more generally equal.

Mr. W. P. REEVES moved, That the vote be reduced by £5. He would have liked to discuss the whole question at length; but, owing to the action of the Government in putting this the most important question of the session off to so late a period, and taking it in Committee, instead of having a full discussion in the House, he felt that the Committee did not desire a long discussion, as it was anxious to bring business to a conclusion. He hoped, however, that before the discussion was over some honourable member would reply to the speech of the honourable member for Napier, which was really the only good speech in favour of the Government proposals. Of course every one knew the difference between Hawke's Bay and Canterbury, and no doubt Canterbury could run its education system as cheaply as Hawke's Bay, if it chose to reduce the salaries of its teachers; but the people in the country there thought that £120 a year was quite as little as ought to be paid to teachers, and therefore a reduction could not be made. He understood that if his motion were carried it would be taken by the Government as an indication that the school-age should be raised.

Mr. FITZHERBERT thought the remarks of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay showed that if School Committees husbanded their funds and dealt with other matters in a businesslike way there need not be the enormous expenditure which at present was incurred for education. The honourable gentleman had shown that in his district, after paying their teachers good salaries and meeting all other expenses, they could make a saving; whereas the honourable member for Kumara put an entirely different aspect on the question in regard to his district. No doubt there was a waste of money in some districts, and if they looked at the report of the Inspector-General for the year 1886-87 they would find that, although the Education Board for Hawke's Bay had made the most of their funds, that had not been the universal practice in New Zealand. By that report it would be seen that there were eighty-six buildings not belonging to the Government in which school was held, and that meant that buildings would have to be erected for those schools. Therefore some Education Boards did not spend their money on school-buildings. Then, there were 271 teachers' residences not built—not in Hawke's Bay, but in other parts of the country. Again, it would be found from the report that there were a number of School Committees who were over head and ears in debt, which showed that they had not made the most of the funds at their disposal. Then, they were told by the honourable member for Napier that there was plenty of school-accommodation; but that was absolutely incorrect as far as the rest of the colony was concerned. According to the report there were 46,000 children of school-age who were not attending schools, and those attending school had absolutely only six square feet allotted to each of them. Out of the 46,000 children not attending the schools, 22,000 were Roman Catholics; and, as the honourable member for Dunedin South had pointed out, if the Roman Catholics had chosen to take advantage of the State schools it would have been necessary to expend £100,000 to accommodate them. Therefore, notwithstanding what the honourable member for Napier had said on one side and the honourable member for Kumara had said on another, the fact remained that the funds at disposal were not sufficient to meet the liabilities and to give every child in the colony an opportunity of getting education. So that something must be done, and the question was, In what direction should it be done? He was glad the Government were going to make a reduction, for he had always told his constituents that there must be a reduction; and he thought it was right to leave it to Ministers to say where it could be made. In towns it was right that the minimum age should be six instead of five; but he thought in country districts the five-years age should be retained. But, with regard to the remark of the honourable member for Kumara that children, as a rule, in his district passed at an early age, he thought they would find that that all depended on the master who had charge of the school. Some masters placed children at a very early age in the First Standard; others would not put them there until they were older. He thought the test was the percentage of children who passed the different standards. If the honourable member for Kumara would look at the statistics on the subject he would see that his district was one of the last. His district showed only 10·5 per cent. of passes, whereas Auckland showed 14. The only district below the honourable member for Kumara's showed 9·6; but, so far as passing was concerned, his district was a long way behind other districts, and was only the second worst in the colony. The honourable gentleman need not tell them about the intellectual ability of the parents and children, for, apparently, their ability was not equal to that of parents and children in other parts of the colony. It was necessary that something should be done, and he (Mr. Fitzherbert) must support this reduction of 4s. of capitation. What he should have preferred to see was, that children should pay for teaching in the Fifth and Sixth Standards. According to the last statistics, if these children paid 1s. 6d. a week each the sum of £52,000 would be derived from that source. The children in the Fifth and Sixth Standards were, generally speaking, children of well-to-do people. The children of the labouring people were generally taken away, after they had passed the Fourth Standard, to assist their fathers and mothers in their daily labour. Those who could keep their children in the Fifth and Sixth Standards should be made to pay 1s. 6d. a week, which was not a great sum for the education they would receive in those standards. Therefore he should have liked to see the Minister of Education frame his reductions in that form. He should vote for the proposed reduction of 4s., because he thought it was a step in the right direction. He should also vote for making the minimum age six instead of five years, because he thought a child of ordinary intelligence could get through the remaining standards in the time placed at its disposal. There were some children whom all the education in the world would not make clever. If they were made to pay in the Fifth and Sixth Standards, they should then give a number of good scholarships, so that the children of the poorer people should have every opportunity of getting the best education the State could give them. Such a system would be beneficial to the children and their parents, and would be a great saving to the country, because the parents would know that their children would not be kept in idleness in the schools at the cost of the colony. He should vote for the reduction, and was only sorry to say that the proposals of the Government did not go far enough.

Mr. IZARD would have great pleasure in supporting the raising of the school-age if the Government had made provision for kindergarten schools, or provided for the education of young children in some other way; but, inasmuch as no provision was made in this direction, the Committee should not agree to the proposal of the Government. He had consulted with the chief of the Education Department and with several others who had to do with schools, and the almost unanimous conclusion was that, unless children were sent early to school, they ran about the streets and contracted habits that were afterwards fatal to them. The universal opinion of those connected with education was, that this was the inevitable result of children being allowed to run about in that way. The same argument did not apply to country schools as much as it did to town schools, because in the country the children did not get into the same habits as they did in the large cities of the colony. In the towns they did not get into habits of obedience or discipline, and it was very hard indeed to keep them in order at all. There was another objection to this proposal, which was this: that the Education Act distinctly stated that the school-age should be from five to fifteen; and nothing could be plainer than that. Now the Government proposed to raise the school-age from five to six; or, in other words, they proposed to do by vote what could only be done by statute. They said they would not give capitation to children between five and six, and the result would be that the provisions of the Act would not be complied with. This would practically repeal the clause in the Act, which was binding on the Government. Moreover, there was this further difficulty in the matter: He doubted very much whether the Government would save anything at all in the way they proposed to do it. According to the report of the Minister of Education, there were 21,025 between the ages of five and seven attending school. There were no means of finding out how many there were between five and six; but, assuming that 10,500 was the number, the 10,500 would be deprived of education, and the saving would be £3 15s. on 10,500, or about £39,000. The Government pledged themselves that no school should be allowed to stop for want of funds. There were 1,054 primary schools in the colony. How many of these were in the towns and how many were in the country he could not say. The returns did not enable one to arrive at any distinct conclusion on that point; but he would suppose there were two-thirds in the country and one-third in the towns. It amounted to saying this on the part of the Government: that, at any rate, they would undertake that two-thirds of these 1,054 schools should be practically—he would not say maintained, but—supplemented by the Government; or, in other words, that 800 schools should receive an additional payment from the Government. How much such payment amounted to they were not told. The Government did not say how much they proposed to give this or that school. But he could see it was not at all a large estimate to imagine that they would have an average to pay £50 for each school. If that were the case, the saving effected by raising the school-age vanished or almost entirely vanished; and they had 10,500 children absolutely deprived of that education which the Legislature distinctly said they were entitled to have. Although he was opposed to this first item in the Government programme, yet he thought the Committee should agree with the Government on the other items. He thought it was quite right that they should make a reduction of 4s. a head. He was perfectly well aware that in some districts there was great difficulty as to the capitation allowance. The schools in the towns might be worked very easily for less than the capitation, and the balance saved devoted to schools in the country; and this fact came in aid of his argument that the saving effected would be very little indeed. With regard to the normal schools, he should like to say that there were only four of them in the colony, and they cost £8,000 a year. The Wellington Normal or Training School was kept up last year for the sole benefit and instruction of seventeen students. In 1886 the number of students attending the Wellington Normal School was two males and fifteen females, a total of seventeen, for which the whole machinery and teaching staff of a normal school were kept in operation. They might very well do without the normal schools at all, and other and more economical arrangements could be made in the secondary schools by which those who desired to become teachers could receive necessary instruction, while the machinery of the University might be used for examining them. He therefore agreed with the proposal of the Government to abolish the normal schools. He would express his agreement with a great deal that had fallen from the honourable member for the Hutt. He presumed that a great many honourable members, while willing to support the maintenance of the education system, would be willing that a small fee should be charged for pupils in the Fifth and Sixth Standards. He believed that idea had taken considerable root in the public mind, and he knew that during the late election it was much discussed in this part of the colony, at any rate; and he thought the opinion generally arrived at was that the parents of children in those standards should be asked to contribute a small fee towards the cost of the education system. There were 11,333 children in those standards, and a very small payment for each would very considerably reduce the cost of education to the Colonial Exchequer. He was in favour of the abolition of Education Boards. There were thirteen of those bodies in the colony, each with its separate staff, and the total cost of these Boards was £10,000 a year. He thought their functions might very well be conducted by the Minister of Education, with the assistance of a small staff; and he would very much like to see that change carried out. He believed there would be no opening for him in accordance with the forms of the House to move an amendment in that direction, and therefore he had to content himself with expressing his opinion. He should support the proposals of the Government.

Mr. SEDDON said the honourable member for the Hutt had stated that Westland was in the second worst position among the education districts of the colony as regarded passes. The real fact was that Westland was only lower than two other districts, that it was equal to one other, and above all the rest. This would be seen from the report of the Education Department presented to the House during the first session this year, where the relative percentages of total passes in the six standards of pupils attending the State schools in each of the education districts in the colony were shown to be—Nelson, 49·9; Wellington, 46·0; Marlborough, 45·5; Otago, 44·7; Westland, 43·7; Hawke's Bay, 43·7; Auckland, 43·1; South Canterbury, 41·1; Grey, 40·0; Southland, 39·6; North Canterbury, 38·6; Wanganui, 38·2; Taranaki, 34·3. It would thus be seen that Westland held fifth position, was equal with Hawke's Bay, and ahead of Auckland, South Canterbury, Grey, Southland, North Canterbury, Wanganui, Taranaki. In the total percentage of passes Wellington headed Westland by less than 3 per cent., and these advantages were only gained in the First and Second Standards; in the Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Standards Westland headed Wellington.

Mr. Isaard

The following were the relative percentages in passes in standards:—

		I.	II.	III.	IV.	V.	VI.
Wellington	..	13·2	9·4	9·9	6·5	3·6	1·7
Westland	..	9·2	9·0	10·0	8·4	4·9	2·2

— the total being, as he had said, Wellington 46·0, and Westland, 43·7. In all the standards except the two first, Westland showed an average of nearly 2 per cent. above that of Wellington. Knowing these figures were in existence, he was naturally surprised when the honourable gentleman made the assertion he made. If the honourable gentleman was not more correct in the advice he gave his clients than he had been in this matter there could be no wonder if they got into trouble. He could not let the honourable gentleman's statements go unrefuted, for they were calculated to give very little encouragement to the teachers and to the pupils in the State schools of Westland. There was also this fact: that the cost per pupil was nearly £2 a year less in Westland than in Wellington.

Mr. LOUGHREY said that in common with many other members of the House he was pledged to retrenchment; but at the same time he was also pledged to support the present education system, and to use his best endeavours to prevent the school-age as at present fixed, and the curriculum of the State schools, from being interfered with; that from one end of the colony to the other the mass of the people had stated in the plainest possible manner that the ages at which the children should be permitted to attend the State schools should not be altered, and that a large majority of the members in the House were pledged to support the present Education Act to that extent. It was one of the burning questions during the late election, whether the present education system should be preserved in its entirety, so that its efficiency should not be interfered with; and he believed there was not one candidate who, when questioned, had not replied that, though in favour of retrenchment, he would support the education system as it stood. The people generally were proud of the system and of the results it had produced, and he thought any interference with it would be most injudicious, and would be objected to throughout the colony. It was the mass of the people who contributed the cost of the system; and it was the mass of the people who had questioned candidates during the late election and made them pledge themselves to support the system in its integrity; and he was quite sure that if any candidate had ventured to say he would interfere with the efficiency of the system he would have had no chance whatever of being elected. He was surprised, seeing how strong the expression of opinion on this question had been all over the country during the election, to find so many honourable members in favour of altering the system materially. A good deal had been said as to the physical disadvantages which would result from children under six years of age attending school. He had had considerable experience in the management and working of State schools, and he had never been able to see any physical disadvantages follow from children of that age being taught in these schools. The opinion of one medical man had been quoted to show that it was very disadvantageous indeed for children to have education forced on them at an early age; but, notwithstanding this opinion, he thought the best judges of whether attending school at an early age was physically injurious were the parents themselves, and he ventured to say that, if you travelled the country over, not a single parent would be found to say that a child had been known to suffer physical injury from attending school too young. On the contrary, the evidence of parents would be that young children attending school and being made subject to discipline and receiving the elements of education made them brighter and smarter; and the experience of teachers and Inspectors was the same. Directly these young children began to attend school, and mixed with the older scholars and with each other, they began to pick up all kinds of information unconsciously, just as they had learned to speak unconsciously from listening to those who spoke near them; while if they kept away from school till they were seven, or eight, or nine years of age before learning anything in this way, it would be much more difficult for them to begin to acquire the rudiments of knowledge. It was surprising to find how much information children could acquire before they were seven—they learned to read well, to write fairly, and got some knowledge of arithmetic; and by that time they were strong enough, mentally and physically, to continue at school, and to go on to more advanced work without any strain. There was no real strain on children up to fourteen or fifteen in going through the primary-school course. Those honourable members who could remember their own schooldays would know that they had felt no strain in those times; and that it was only when they became adults and had to face the struggles, difficulties, and problems of life that they began to feel conscious of any strain. Very few, if any, children in the State schools were strained, either mentally or physically, even those in the highest classes; and he thought it would be the greatest misfortune to raise the school-age. He entirely agreed, too, that those who had passed the Sixth Standard, and who had not reached the limit of school-age, should be allowed to remain at school if they chose. Many children passed that standard by the time they were twelve. They might not be able to get employment; and why should they be turned into the streets, where there was a great probability of their acquiring very undesirable knowledge? The law said that these children might attend school till they were fifteen, and he thought, in those circumstances, those whose parents wished them to be more thoroughly grounded in the higher parts of the subjects they had studied should be allowed to remain at school. It was at that very time that children were likely to derive the most advantage from attending school, and, so far from excluding them, he thought they should be encouraged to remain after they had passed the Sixth Standard; but, as honourable members knew, in many cases, owing to the position of the parents, it was not possible for them to remain even till they had reached the Sixth Standard. He believed our system had been copied from the Victorian, and he knew that there the children, after reaching a certain standard—after being well grounded, in fact, in the three Rs—might leave school; but, notwithstanding such children had received a certificate showing that they had passed the standard required by the Education Act in that colony, they were not only permitted but even encouraged to remain in the schools until they had attained the age of fifteen years. Many passed the compulsory standard at eleven years of age, and they could then leave school if their parents wished; but many of these children, unfortunately, were compelled to leave school at an early age, in order to assist their parents to obtain the means of living. It was seen even in this colony that parents were often in such straitened circumstances that whatever could be earned by their children was of great assistance in helping to supply the wants of the family; and for this reason children of tender years were often found at work who should be attending the State schools. He therefore thought that every inducement should be given to encourage the children being kept at school as long as possible, and every effort made to secure that they should, while at school, be given a suitable education. It was unnecessary for him to say anything in favour of the State system of education. People of all classes who had inquired into it carefully believed that it was doing a great amount of good, that education of a most thorough character was being imparted, and that a youth who had passed through the various standards of a State school in this colony was so thoroughly grounded in the rudiments of an ordinary English education that he could, if he were studious and desirous of proceeding with his studies after leaving school, be able to obtain the highest honours that could be conferred by the universities. He believed it was a fact that those pupils who had taken the highest positions at the universities were those who had been primarily educated at the State schools. He felt very strongly on the subject, and was sure that no greater mistake could be made than to increase the school-age, or to exclude children, as had been proposed by Ministers. With reference to the next question, that of reducing the capitation by 4s., he was, as he had said at the commencement of his remarks, in favour of retrenchment, and, if the Ministry thought that they could get the children educated for £3 15s. per head with as much efficiency as at present, he would give his hearty support to their proposal. With regard to the substitution of strict average for working average, he could not agree to that. So far as his knowledge went—and it was some time since he had anything to do with State schools—the allotment of staff was made in accordance with the average attendance at the schools, and that average was made up by dividing the total attendance by the number of days on which the school was open, after deducting the number of days on which the attendance had fallen below a certain number, and upon the result so obtained teachers were allotted to the school; but under strict average the total number would be divided by the actual number of school-days, making no allowance for the attendance having fallen owing to sickness or from any other cause. If the basis suggested by the Minister of Education were adopted it would lead to an inadequate staff being employed, and to the teachers' salaries being reduced. There might be many wet days in the year, and epidemics sometimes very materially interfered with the attendance; and he feared that evil results would follow from making the allotment of teachers to the schools on strict average instead of working average. He would therefore be unable to support that proposal. With regard to training teachers, he was wholly in favour of training-institutions being carried on by the Government; but in his opinion there were too many of these institutions in the colony. One for each Island would be quite sufficient. In Victoria the practice was that, after children had passed a certain standard or a certain examination, they received appointments as pupil-teachers, going through a course of three, or four, or five years. They were then sent to a training-institution, and remained there for two years; and while there they were taught by professors—university men—and they were also given practical experience in the State schools, receiving the salaries usually paid to assistants, to help in their support. He believed that there should be some system of that kind by which the State could train its teachers; but he thought there might be substantial reductions in the expenditure now incurred in this direction. With regard to the reduction of expenditure in the State-school system, he thought considerable retrenchment might be made without touching the school-age, without interfering with the working average, or without materially interfering with the training-institutions; and it might be made by abolishing the Boards. It would have been seen, by what had fallen from several honourable members in the course of the debate, that some Boards were not conducting their affairs upon economical principles. The honourable member for Napier had shown that some Boards were not worked cheaply, and that, in fact, where Boards were disposed to be economical, they could make considerable savings. In the honourable gentleman's own district, he understood, they had saved £2,000 out of the allotment during the past year, which had been put by for building purposes, though the honourable member did not say that it was required for that purpose. He (Mr. Loughrey) was in favour, therefore, of abolishing the Boards. Each of these bodies had a staff consisting of Inspectors, a secretary, clerks, et cetera, which to a large extent might be done without if the system were worked from one centre. If the Boards were dispensed with the teachers would be appointed in a proper manner; they would be more independent, and not be at the beck-and-call of the Committees of the districts in which they might be situated, and for this reason they would do their duty better and more efficiently. The Minister had already stated that, though he proposed to increase the school-age, he would see that the country schools were not interfered with; but he should like to ask the honourable gentleman what average he intended to take on which to keep the country schools open. He believed that they were at present kept open when there was an average of twenty. If that average should be reduced in consequence of the exclusion of the children mentioned by the Minister, what advantage would be gained? The same expenses would be incurred in working the school, notwithstanding the reduced attendance; and the only advantage—if it were an advantage—would be that a number of children would be deprived of the means of being educated. It was no more trouble to teach twenty than it was to teach twelve. The teacher had a certain number of classes to instruct, and it would make no difference to him whether there were five or six children in a class, or two or three. In conclusion, he had to say that he was prepared to support the second proposal of Ministers—that was, to reduce the capitation-allowance—he had no doubt it had been carefully considered—and he could support a reduction of the grant in aid of training-colleges; but he was not prepared to support the other proposals.

Mr. WALKER felt sorry that the Ministry had not adopted the same course with this subject that they had adopted with other of their estimates—that was, to state to the House their inability to make definite proposals, and to seek from the House confidence that they would do their best to effect economy where they could. It would have been asking a good deal from the House, but he believed that the House was prepared to grant them that confidence. He was sorry that in this the most important part of our expenditure, a matter which required the most complete knowledge and the most delicate treatment, they should have been so precipitate as to rush in where angels feared to tread, and to propose to do something which might seriously affect the excellence and good working of the education system. It would have been much more wise if Ministers had been less radical in their proposals, and more cautious in the reductions which they proposed to make. Although pledged and persuaded that the present education system must be supported in its entirety, that was, so far as work was concerned, he was not averse from economy: in fact, he was prepared to follow Ministers or anybody else where it could be shown that economy could be secured without a sacrifice of efficiency. But what he felt was that it had not yet been shown that economy could safely be effected in the direction proposed by Ministers. The fact had already been referred to by the honourable member for Caversham that a Committee was appointed at the beginning of the session to consider this matter; and he regretted that that Committee had not been trusted so far as to have effect given to its report. That Committee stated generally that it had not had time to complete its investigations, and candidly confessed its inability to bring down any report that could exhaustively and thoroughly deal with the question. Why, then, should the Minister, unless he was prepared to say that he had more information than that Committee—which he could not have after but one fortnight of office—come down and say that he saw his way to alter the whole system? It would have been infinitely more creditable to say candidly that he was unable to recommend at the present time any specific reduction, but that, if the House would leave the matter in his hands, it might safely trust him—declaring that he valued the system too much to injure it, but, at the same time, he would endeavour to effect such reductions as were possible by next session. If the honourable gentleman had said that, the House would have extended to him its confidence.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What would the Opposition have said?

Mr. WALKER said the Opposition never refused reasonable advice from any Minister, nor refused to extend to any Minister reasonable confidence. So much for the general question. He was sorry indeed that the Government had altered their tactics on this particular point of their policy, because he considered it would have been much wiser not to have done so. So far as the House had heard from the Minister, the only specific point he really brought up that required serious consideration was that which had been also dealt with by the honourable member for Napier, which was that there was a good deal of difference of administration in different districts. That was the most important point that had been laid before the House that day. And what did it prove? Not that any particular part of the system should be reduced all over the colony, but that the administration should be improved where it was faulty. The Minister, however, had not shown exactly how it was to be improved, even in districts where he thought there had been a lack of good administration. The whole circumstances only pointed to this: that more mature deliberation and consideration of the whole subject was, in the first place, necessary before the Minister could presume to guide the House in this most important matter. He trusted the Minister would take into consideration all he had heard that day upon the subject, and endeavour, next session, to lay before the House better and more matured recommendations. He ventured to doubt whether, at present, the Minister had any data upon which to found his proposals; and the fact that he was prepared to accept a compromise showed that he was acting upon insufficient data. The exact nature of the compromise he (Mr. Walker) did not know; but the fact that the Minister was willing to accept a compromise showed that he was not quite clear himself, for if he had seriously considered the matter he would have been the last person to accept a compromise. He did not see how the Committee could arrive at any distinct issue on any one of the matters submitted to it. They were really working in the dark, and the Minister would not be fully assured as to what the real opinion of the House was upon any one of the four points. However, he trusted that before the debate closed the Ministry would gather the opinions of a good many of the members. As to the first question, the school-age, the Committee which had been appointed at the beginning of the session was able to gather some evidence, and he was not astonished that the evidence which was procurable was certainly not of a character to support the Government proposals. When the Committee was appointed some members, during the course of the light debate that took place on the question, said that they would not send their children to school before the age of seven. That was exactly a point upon which there was much misconception. It was all very well for honourable members who had nurseries and governesses not to send their children to school at the age of five years; but, then, their children were under governesses, receiving most important training and discipline, though, nominally, they were not going to school. Then, there was this point he wished to emphasize: that the younger children who went to school were receiving most valuable instruction and discipline in habits and manners. At the same time that they were not subjected to anything which could hinder their physical development, as regarded their mental development they were receiving most perfect training, which would enable them, when the proper time came, to learn the different subjects which would come before them. The evidence placed before the Committee was most conclusive on that point. The evidence of Mr. Habens certainly went to show that in his opinion it was a fallacy to suppose that the education in the lower classes in the public schools did anything more than train the children in habits of discipline and obedience: it also showed that, more than that, the training they had to undergo was absolutely pleasant and agreeable, and had all the advantages that the kindergarten system possessed. Then, as regarded the inclusion of these children in the schools, that affected in the most prodigious manner the cost of the whole system. It was by these children being included that they were enabled to support so many country schools. The education of the children in the infant schools did not cost more than £1 5s. or £1 10s. per annum, and the money that was saved by their capitulation enabled the Boards to keep up the country schools. As against that, the Minister proposed that, if these children were kept out of the schools, not a single country school should be shut up; but, as had been shown by the honourable member for Wellington Suburbs, the saving thus proposed to be effected would be merely nominal: the money that would have to be sent to keep up the country schools would be precisely the same amount as that saved, and, in addition, the children would be turned from the other schools into the streets. He thought they should get the children into the schools as soon as possible. It would do them no harm, but good; and under the present system the country would not be a penny the better for the proposed change, while the education of the country would be a great deal worse. For these reasons, he maintained that, so far as the question of school-age was concerned, the Minister of Education had not made out a case, and he would be prepared to vote for the retention of the school-age as at present. Regarding the children who had passed the standards before they arrived at the other limit of the school-age, if clever, hard-working children did that he should be very sorry to see them excluded. At the same time, he admitted that this was one of the branches of the subject which showed the necessity for exhaustive consideration, not only with regard to primary but also with regard to secondary education. He therefore desired that the Minister, who was evidently desirous of making good the old proverb about a new broom, should look into this matter during the recess, and endeavour to show what he could do with regard to the whole system. If he could bring down to the House a system which would save all overlapping, and enable every link in the chain to be well welded and to do its work efficiently—primary education doing its work, and secondary education not overlapping, but also doing its work—he, for one, should be exceedingly glad: and he trusted the Minister would devote his energies to this during the recess. Then, with regard to the normal schools, the Minister laid a great deal of stress on the fact that two of our normal schools were not doing good work. The honourable gentleman admitted that the Otago Training-school was doing good work, and he said nothing about the North Canterbury school; therefore it was to be presumed that silence gave consent, and that it also was doing good work. He should be very sorry to see all these normal schools done away with. He admitted that, in the interests of economy, there might be only one for the South Island and one for the North Island; but it was wrong to suppose that any economy or assistance would come to education by doing away with them altogether. He therefore could not agree with that proposal. One of the arguments of the Minister of Education was that some of the districts which had no normal schools did very well without them; but what happened in those districts? Simply that they got the teachers they wanted to fill important positions from the districts which had normal schools. That certainly did not show that normal schools were not necessary to the colony. With regard to the averages, he was not sufficiently acquainted with the working of the system to say whether the proposal of the Minister was right or wrong; but he learned enough from the speech of the honourable member for Linwood to know that it would work very unfairly in some instances, and therefore he would urge on the Minister to hold that back for further consideration. As regards the capitation, he would not be averse from its being reduced to the statutory amount, because if they had learned one thing during the debate it was this: that there had been a great deal of difference in the administration by different Boards, and that some conducted their education system for much less than others. His own experience in Canterbury had been that the Board had for some years been managing their affairs in an exceedingly extravagant manner. They had been lavish in putting up school-buildings in places where they were not wanted, and the style of buildings they had erected was much more palatial than the circumstances of the neighbourhoods required. They had not even considered whether the district was one that was likely to be permanently settled, or one which was merely stuffed with little children for the moment and so enabled to appeal to the Education Board for a school. He therefore thought that a little enforced economy in their case and in other cases would have a salutary effect. He had listened with a great deal of pleasure to many of the remarks of the honourable member for Napier, which tended in the direction of showing that some of the Education Boards had administered their affairs with a great deal of economy, and without any bad effects to the cause of education. For these reasons, he would vote for the reduction of the capitation to the statutory amount. It had also been hinted that Boards were an expense and drag upon the system. Why that should be so he did not know. The members of those Boards were certainly gentlemen who devoted themselves to the work for no other cause than that they loved it and wished to do their best for it. The expenses of these Boards were not very great, and it would not be fair to do away with them all over the colony. That would render the central expense in Wellington at least five times as great as it was now. He would be sorry to see that change effected, because there would be nothing that would tend more to destroy the sense of self-reliance of the people than to have to apply for everything to the central office in Wellington. Properly administered, the district Boards ought to be valuable adjuncts to the cause of education, and valuable advisers to the central office in Wellington. In conclusion, he would urge upon the Minister, if only for the sake of his own reputation, to pause a little longer before he pressed these radical changes on the country. If the honourable gentleman would only take three months to consider he would probably bring down a scheme which would be more advantageous to the colony, and more conservative of the good parts of the system we now had. He believed in the prudence of this delay, because the system of education was of immense advantage to the future, and to the children of the colony; and it was one for which every taxpayer of the colony paid, and every taxpayer had a right to get his full value from it.

Mr. ALLEN must commence by saying a few words on the general question, so that the attitude he took up might not be misunderstood. He yielded to no man in his desire to see the whole population educated in the very best possible manner, and he said that because he believed the danger of the future, the danger of competition, was not from pauper labour, but lay in the competition which would take place between us and highly-educated labour elsewhere. At the same time, knowing the position we were in, it behoved us also to see that our education, while being as efficient as it was now, was managed economically. That was a question which was prominently before the electors during the recent electioneering campaign,—and, in connection with that, he might answer one argument brought forward by the honourable member for Linwood, who said that every candidate was pledged to support the school-age at five years—

Mr. LOUGHREY had not said anything of the kind.

Mr. ALLEN understood the honourable gentleman to say that if any one had dared to propose that the school-age should be increased from five to six years he would have lost his election. As far as he himself was concerned—and honourable members knew whom he had to oppose at the election—he boldly stated to his constituents that he thought the raising of the school-age from five to six was necessary under our present difficulties. Then, they were told by the last speaker that the physical strain on children attending school at five years of age had no evil effects. The honourable gentleman was not present at the meeting of the Education Committee at which medical evidence was taken which tended to prove exactly the contrary. Dr. Brown gave evidence to this effect before the Committee:—

“If I am to give an opinion, speaking as a medical man, I think that children in the majority of cases are sent to school too early. I do not think that for the purposes of real education the majority of children derive much benefit from schooling under six or seven years of age. During the early years of childhood I think that the best use that can be made of a child's time is to help him to get as sound and healthy a bodily organism as possible.”

Then he was pressed minutely on this point, and he said he thought that under any circumstances a child would be better in the open air enjoying any healthful form of recreation, and that his opinion was based on experience and observation. That evidence came from a gentleman who was not only a medical man, but also Chairman of an Education Board, and one who took a great interest in the work; and some weight ought to attach to his opinion. What, then, was there in favour of raising the school-age? They should also take into consideration what was done in other countries which were in the van of progress in regard to education. In Switzerland, which was in the very front rank in educational progress, the children were bound to go to school at seven years, and could go at six; in France the compulsory age was from six to thirteen; in Hamburg the children could not enter the schools before they were six; and in America the legal minimum age was six: the compulsory age was from eight to fourteen. He would admit that there were variations in the school-age in America, and that the average was from five to six years; but in nearly all of the countries of Europe the lowest age at which a child might enter a school was six years. He thought that, taken with what he had mentioned before, should also have some weight with the Committee. It would be seen, then, from what he had said that he was quite prepared to vote for the raising of the school-age from five to six years; but he should have been quite prepared to accept the report which came down from the Education Committee, not because he personally wanted much more evidence in favour of the raising of the school-age, but because he thought it wise, when a large reform was being made, to take time to consider it. If, however, a division were called for he was pledged to vote for the raising of the age to six. Then, with regard to the reduction by 4s. of the capitation-grant, he was also quite prepared to vote for that; and, as far as he could gather from the speeches in the Committee, most members were prepared to vote for the 4s. reduction. At any rate, he should vote for it himself; and he was not afraid to say that he saw no reason why the salaries of the more highly paid school-teachers should not be reduced. The late Government proposed reductions in the Civil Service, but none in the salaries of highly-paid school-teachers; and the late Colonial Treasurer based his argument for the reduction of the salaries of Civil servants on the fact, as he said, that the purchasing-power of money was far greater than it was a few years ago. If that argument had any weight with regard to Civil servants, certainly it had the same weight with regard to highly-paid school-teachers. On that ground alone he should be prepared to vote for the reduction of the 4s.

Mr. SEDDON.—What is your definition of a highly-paid school-teacher?

Mr. ALLEN.—£500 a year.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—How many of those have you in the colony? Only three or four.

Mr. ALLEN said there were several. He must candidly confess that not sufficient evidence had been adduced to enable him to make up his mind on the third proposal of the Government, relating to strict average, and he should therefore prefer that that question be left over until next session. With regard to the normal schools or training-colleges, he felt that it would be advisable to leave the question open until next session. He knew from the evidence that had been brought before the Committee that in some cases the training-colleges had proved more or less failures; but he was not prepared to accept that judgment in regard to the normal schools in the district from which he came. He thought everybody coming from that part of the colony would admit that they had been to a very great extent a success. But it involved a very large question of policy. The training of school-teachers was a large question they could hardly make up their minds upon in one day or evening. He should prefer it to be left over until next session, when they might discuss it under more favourable conditions. An honourable member made a remark that afternoon that in Hawke's Bay they had got no training-college, and yet got on quite as well without it. Now, that might be quite true; but, from the evidence he had before him, Hawke's Bay had been drawing her teachers from the Otago training-colleges. He had before him a letter to Mr. James Fulton, M.H.R., from Dr. Stuart, a gentleman who, he supposed, was known to everybody in the House. Dr. Stuart said,—

"I have had the opinion that our Normal School does good work. Its trained men are in demand in South Canterbury, Hawke's Bay, and Taranaki, and in such demand that at this moment there is only one trained man who is not in a situation. When its students go up to the University they take a full share of the honours."

He had also before him evidence from the head-teacher of the Normal School in Dunedin very much to the same effect. He said,—

"Were the school training only for the Otago District there might be reason even in this [i.e., reduced expenditure on the Normal School]; but it trains teachers for Southland and South Canterbury, for Hawke's Bay, Taranaki, and Wanganui, and for other education districts as well. The teachers of these districts would not be burdened with the cost of training. Why should the teachers of Otago?"

Well, with evidence of that kind before him, he could not make up his mind to vote for doing away with normal schools and training-colleges, and he hoped that question might be held over till next session. Of course the whole question was a large one. He supposed they all very much regretted being obliged to make any reductions whatever in the education system; but they had to admit that the time had now come when they were sorely pressed for funds, and, if it were possible to make economies in the education system without impairing its efficiency, why, then, it was their duty to do so. However, he would not go into the whole question now. He supposed that next session the question would crop up again, and they would then have the full evidence of the Education Committee before them, and perhaps those who had been unable yet to come to any conclusion would then be able to make up their minds more readily.

Dr. FITCHETT had a good deal to say on his subject, but would mercifully refrain from saying most of it, because the matter had already been pretty exhaustively argued. But he could not content himself without saying something, because he thought that, from every point of view, this was the most important matter they had had to discuss this session.

Mr. Allen

Now, he was a very loyal friend of the present system of education, and, as far as possible, he would allow nothing to touch it that, in his judgment, would injure it. It was because he was so loyal a friend of the system that he would cordially assist every effort to intelligently economize. There were enemies on all sides, and the friends of education could best sustain it by showing no vulnerable point of attack. Therefore he was strenuously in favour of every attempt to economize the education system. But he was not going to economize at the expense of the system, and he was very sorry to say that, so far as three out of these four proposals went, he was emphatically against them. He thought the Ministry had been altogether premature in this matter. They appointed a Committee, and voluminous evidence was taken; and yet the House was now asked to deal with this great question while honourable members generally were in a state of ignorance as to the evidence adduced and the result of the labours of the Committee! Ignoring the labours of the Committee, the Government came down with a series of isolated lines on which they proposed to pursue their retrenchment. Indeed, the interim report presented by the Committee was directly in the teeth of the Government proposals. He thought this was a mistake. It would be noticed that in the discussion, though every speaker had urged retrenchment, they were by no means in accord with the Government. One honourable gentleman declared that Boards should be abolished, another that the standards should be revised, another that the high schools should be abolished. All these things went to show that the Government were premature in endeavouring to retrench before they knew where to retrench: and therein lay the danger which the system ran at the hands of the Government. He protested against tinkering with so important a question as the education system of the colony. He thought they should have time during the recess to exhaustively analyse the whole affair, and at the beginning of next session come down with a complete and exhaustive scheme of retrenchment. In that he would assist, and he believed that not only would the loss consequent on the delay be very trifling, but he believed retrenchment to the extent of nearly £100,000 could be achieved, and that, too, without injuring the system—in fact, it might heighten the efficiency of the system. Dealing with the Government proposals, and taking first the school-age, the onus lay on the Government to establish the advisability of a change. The Government had pledged themselves to do nothing to injure the efficiency of the system. The onus rested on them to show that raising the school-age would not injure the system. That view had not been sufficiently urged on the Committee. What evidence was adduced in support of the proposed change? The Minister of Education told the Committee that, of thirty-nine reports or answers, nineteen were in favour of raising the school-age, sixteen were against it, and four were silent. He (Dr. Fitchett) took it that the four who were silent were really in favour of the present state of things; so that, from the Minister's own figures, there were nineteen in favour of the change and twenty against it. Thus the balance of evidence was against the Minister. That, however, was perhaps a narrow way of looking at it. Honourable members had not before them the evidence given before the Committee, but he would briefly refer to one or two points that had already been touched on. The Minister of Education laid emphasis on the evidence in favour of raising the school-age given by Dr. Brown, and therein he was followed by the honourable member for Dunedin East. Now, in considering that evidence they must remember one thing: that Dr. Brown was not a specialist in education at all. He had no practical knowledge of it. He was a specialist as a medical man, but not as an educationalist. But his evidence did not support the contention of the Minister of Education, or of the honourable member for Dunedin East, who carefully omitted an answer given by Dr. Brown that put his evidence in an altogether different light. He would read the question and answer:—

"You say that you think the children are sent too early to school. Does not that depend upon the sort of instruction they get and the sort of accommodation that exists?—Yes; but, assuming the instruction to be intelligent and the accommodation fit, I consider that at the present school-age children would get no harm from attendance at school and the form of instruction they get there—supposing the hours are not too long. I lay great stress on that point. I put special emphasis on this point so far as it relates to the school-hours. I think they are at present too long for infants. I fail to see what benefit is derived from an attendance of four hours—two hours in the forenoon and two hours in the afternoon—for very young children."

There he surrendered the whole position, for if the instruction were not intelligent or the accommodation fit they should be made so. If the hours were too long, that was a matter of detail to be remedied by the department; it was not a reason for raising the school-age. Again,—

"Is the present accommodation fit?—It has been made as fit as possible—that is, as fit as we could make it in Otago."

"Do you not think that a child would be better off even if kept in premises not exactly adapted to his use than if he were running in the street?—I do not."

That was a matter on which each honourable gentleman could form a judgment. He (Dr. Fitchett) submitted that it was far better that a child should be kept in a well-regulated school than be allowed to run about in the back-lanes of a city. Then, the Minister asked, "You think that under any circumstances the child would be better in the open air enjoying any healthful form of recreation?" Dr. Brown answered, "I do." The doctor was under the delusion that if a child was not at school it would of necessity be enjoying healthy recreation outside. Now, had young children, particularly the children of poor people, who formed the mass of the population in cities, any opportunity of enjoying healthful recreation outside? They had not.

Mr. FISHER.—Why necessarily in the gutters?

Dr. FITCHETT said, in the cases of the poor, the fathers being away at work, and the mothers engaged in their domestic duties, the children were left to their own sweet will, and they went to the gutter naturally—it was the only place open to them. He would draw attention to the evidence of a witness of greater authority than Dr. Brown, or, indeed, probably than any other witness—the Rev. Mr. Habens, Inspector-General of Schools. In one answer he put concisely and conclusively the whole position of those who contended that the school-age should not be raised. He was asked, "What do you think is the general effect of discipline and teaching on these younger children?" and the answer was,—

"Considering the early age at which the children of the artisan and the labourer ordinarily leave school, I am of opinion that it is necessary to admit such children to school at an early age, in order that their school-course may be of reasonable length; and that, in schools which are sufficiently organized to provide instruction upon proper methods for children between five and seven years of age, such children derive a very great benefit from the discipline and instruction which they receive, and are thereby prepared for the severer methods of instruction that will follow in the more advanced classes. I think it should also be remembered that the children of the same class, if they are not at school at an early age, are likely to receive a practical education out-of-doors that, however advantageous it may be to them from a physical point of view, is perhaps very detrimental from a moral and intellectual point of view. I may add that, if we regard the example set by England in this matter, the English Government recognises the attendance of children just above three years of age as entitling the schools they attend to grants from the Treasury."

This was what Dr. Brown said about school-age and capitation:—

"At the same time, I must say that, having gone carefully into this question of capitation-allowance and its bearing on the cost of education, I fail to see how, as long as the State continues to have the control of education in its hands, this system can be maintained unless the school-age is retained pretty much as it is or the capitation-allowance is increased."

Yet the Government actually proposed to reduce the capitation-allowance. He would not appeal further to authorities, but he would appeal to the common-sense of the Committee as to whether it was not reasonable and right to let children go to school at the age of five. As it had been well put by one honourable member, raising the school-age would, paradoxical as it seemed, be imposing a tax to keep the children out of school. The country schools would suffer from the decreased capitation, and would have to get assistance from the Government to keep open; so it would be really imposing a tax to keep children from the schools. It had been said that children between five and six were too young to undergo a steady course of instruction—that they were physically and mentally too weak, and that therefore they should not be permitted to go to school. But honourable members could see, and the evidence would show, that these young children were not instructed in the sense spoken of at all, but that they were kept at school subject to discipline, where they learned habits of order and attention, and unconsciously absorbed, through their pores, as it were, a large amount of information. They acquired a habit of noticing things, and in all these ways they fitted themselves for learning more quickly later on. The evidence went to show that children who attended school at an early age learned faster, relatively, than children who had not attended school at an early age. As to the proposed reduction of capitation, it seemed to him that it would be entirely inoperative. Under the present system the Government gave the money to the Education Boards. The Boards gave a sufficiency to the town schools, and the country schools got what was left. It was like pouring water into a cup; the cup was filled, and then what more was poured ran over. Here the money was poured into the cup of the town schools, and what was over ran to the country schools. If the quantity poured was decreased the cup would still have to be filled before any could run over, and of course it would be the overflow that would be so much less to the country schools, and the country schools would have to come to the Government for enough more to keep them alive. It was as clear as a syllogism. There would be no real saving: the towns would be first supplied, and would absorb all the funds. The country schools would come to the Government for more, and would get it; for the Government were pledged to keep open the country schools. As to the strict-average proposal, the honourable member for Linwood had put that quite out of court. By having the strict average instead of the working average an indefinite punishment would be inflicted on the teacher—it would be making his salary dependent on the weather: salaries would go up and down with the barometer. Anything more absurd could not be conceived. The Minister could not have considered what would be the effect of such a change or he would never have suggested it. The master would have to do the same amount of work at all times, for it was just as easy to teach six as four; but, as he had said, the man would get a fluctuating salary, and, literally, it would depend on the weather. Reverting for a moment to the raising of the school-age, he would like to point out that the honourable member for Napier seemed to miss the point of what had been urged in favour of the present order of things. The argument was that, as the town schools did not cost so much per head to maintain as the country schools, if the allowances were decreased there would not be so much to go to the country schools by way of surplus from the town schools; that, therefore, the country schools would suffer most. The honourable gentleman said that in the country children under six years did not attend—that it was usually too far for them to go, and they were kept away by the weather; that therefore it would be the town schools more than the country schools that would suffer. On reflection the honourable gentleman would see that the surplus was chiefly created by the attendance in town schools of children under six. As to closing the normal schools, that was a new proposal not indicated in the Financial Statement, which gave the general lines of the proposed retrenchment. If it was intended to abolish them, direct evidence on that point should have been taken by the Education Committee. This was not done, but such evidence as there was was entirely in favour of the retention of the normal schools. All the witnesses, both those who gave their evidence orally and those who did so in writing, were asked if they could make suggestions for effecting economy, and not one had suggested abolishing the normal schools. That was really affirmative evidence in favour of retaining them. The Minister had quoted a Mr. Fidler as reflecting on the efficiency of the Auckland school; but when Mr. Fidler came to give evidence before the Committee he did not say anything on that subject. But, because one school was inefficient, that was no argument for abolishing the entire system; it only proved that one school wanted improving. In Canterbury and Otago the training-schools had done most excellent work, and had given full value to the country for its money in the teachers they had turned out.

Mr. FISHER.—Canterbury?

Dr. FITCHETT could speak from his own knowledge of the Canterbury school and of those conducting it. That school had turned out teachers worth the whole vote to the colony. Besides the actual work of training teachers, the normal schools also served a most valuable purpose as nurseries to the university. Our system of education encouraged teachers to go through the University. There was great benefit in that. Those going through the training-colleges simply would probably acquire only enough to suit their immediate purpose and enable them to pass the necessary examinations, while those passing through the University acquired a larger and broader knowledge. They knew all round the subjects they taught, and so were better teachers. The system of normal schools was a good one. They took the cream of the scholars and made them teachers. Abolish them, and the supply of trained teachers must be imported from outside. He hoped they would be allowed to remain till next session at all events, when the whole subject could receive mature consideration. Indeed, he hoped the whole of the proposals would be allowed to stand over till next session. He knew that savings could be made in the administration of the primary system and in the cost of higher education; savings could be made in the standards, and savings could be made by lessening the number of Education Boards. There could be also large sums saved and greater efficiency attained in the system of inspection. Not one of these things was embodied in the proposals of the Government. He knew this matter had been discussed apart from party consideration, and he hoped all honourable members would be guided without prejudice in coming to a decision on the different proposals submitted. He was satisfied that, though possibly the reducing of the capitation might not do much harm, yet the raising of the school-age and the abolishing of the normal schools were organic changes of a most disastrous kind—changes that hereafter would be bitterly regretted.

Mr. PEACOCK would not say much now on the question of school-age, as he had spoken on it before; but, after what had been said and quoted by the honourable member for Dunedin Central, he could not refrain from giving a quotation bearing on this point. The honourable member had referred somewhat disparagingly to the evidence of Dr. Brown, given before the Education Committee, because it happened to be against his own views, and stated it was overridden by that of the Rev. Mr. Habens. He wished to read a few lines from the evidence of perhaps the highest expert on the subject in the world. Mr. Arnold, Inspector-General of Schools in Great Britain, when being examined before the Royal Commission on Education, referred as follows to Germany, a country in the front rank of the nations as regarded education: "In Germany they tell you that it is settled by all the medical authorities that children have no business to begin to learn before they are six years old."

Mr. DUNCAN said the Committee had heard a great deal of argument from the town point of view, and he would now say a few words on the country side of the question. There were twenty-one or twenty-two schools in his electorate, mostly small ones: in fact, in about seven of them there was attendance about enough to let the teachers be fairly paid; while, as to the rest, if the Government proposals were carried there could be no doubt that further assistance would be wanted to keep them alive. He supposed that the average for seven of those schools would be about 120, and that the average attendance at the others would be about forty, while some of them had as few as twenty-five pupils, so that it would mean that, if this plan were carried out, a number of those teachers would have to come to the Government for assistance—that they would actually have to beg for an existence. That deserved consideration; and another matter which deserved consideration was that nothing should be done which would reduce educational advantages to the children of those people who went into the remote parts of the country to carry on the work of colonisation. He did not believe that the Minister of Education had sufficiently thought the matter out. He had no doubt that the honourable gentleman was sincere in stating that he would not allow country schools to be shut up; but there were so many of them that were at starving-point already that any reductions must have the effect of shutting them up. It had been stated that there would be a saving of £26,000 by raising the school-age. He did not know how that was arrived at; but he did not think that it would be so large. At any rate, he did not suppose that raising the age would very much affect the small country schools, because children under the age of six could not walk any distance to the schools. But reducing the capitation-allowance would affect them to a very large extent, especially where there were a good many small schools in a district. The Boards did not seem to be able to give these schools much for maintenance now, and they would then be compelled to give them less; and he feared that it would come to this: that the cost of maintenance would be thrown upon the people in the neighbourhood of these schools; and they could not afford it. As to the alteration in the average, that would have a very serious effect, because the children in wet weather, when the roads were bad and the creeks were flooded, could not attend. Many of the children had seven or eight miles to travel, and it was certain that there must be many causes to prevent regular attendance which were not to be found in connection with the schools in town. He therefore hoped that the country members would endeavour to see that this change in the average should not be made in the case of the country schools, for, to secure an average sufficient to keep the schools open, the children would have to go in weather and under circumstances that might bring on illness that would do them more harm than remaining from school for a week or two during the year. He did not agree with the proposal made by the honourable member for Napier, if he understood him aright, that female teachers should be appointed to the small country schools. There were lots of grown-up boys, say, of eight or nine or ten years old, who were sent to these schools when they knew little or nothing; and he should like to know what power a female teacher would have of controlling half a dozen boys such as those, especially if, as might often happen, they had never been to school previously, and had not learned any discipline. For another thing, it would not be easy to get females to go into these out-of-the-way places. They must necessarily have parents or some one to protect them. He thought it should be male teachers who should be sent to these out-of-the-way places. Then, it was said that there was no need to have as high-grade or highly-trained teachers for these country schools as for the town schools. But he held a different opinion. If they were to have a national system, then the outlying schools should really have better teachers than were to be found in the town schools, or, at any rate, as good. The primary schools in the country districts were the only schools that the children brought up there would have the benefit of, whereas in the towns the children would have the high schools to go to. That led him to another point, and that was that it was not right, especially in the outlying districts, where there were no high schools, to stop the teaching after the Sixth Standard had been passed, or to call upon the parents to pay for it. There were not many of the pupils who stayed after they had passed the Fourth or the Fifth Standard; and if there were any who could stay till they could pass the Seventh or the Eighth Standard—if there was such a standard—they should be allowed to stay, especially seeing that they could be educated at the cost of £8 15s. per head, whereas in the high schools the education cost on an average £24 for each pupil. That showed the unfairness of the thing. He was unwilling to see the education system touched to any material extent. He did not say that there could be no savings effected, because he believed that there might be in some of the higher salaries, and in the reduction of the number of Inspectors, who, moreover, should be made to change districts occasionally. Referring to Otago, he knew that there were three Inspectors employed there; and he believed that they might very well take Southland as well as Otago. But, beyond that, he did not think there could be many changes, and he was quite against any interference with the standards and the school-age, or the alteration of the system of averages now in force. He had explained his views regarding these points very fully during the election, and had told his constituents that the people would be very foolish if they permitted any change in the education system: it was about the only thing that the bulk of the people got for the money they contributed towards meeting the expenditure of the colony. His opponent had expressed approval of raising the school-age to six years, and had said that he would cut down unnecessary expenditure where he could, pointing to those things which the Government had now proposed. The result was that he (Mr. Duncan) had been returned. With regard to the normal schools, that was one part of the system that should not be touched, and he would tell the House why. In his early days, in the North of Ireland, the young teachers went to a training-college in Dublin, and they went under a system that might be very well followed in this country. Every teacher commenced as a pupil-teacher, and when he had got to that stage of efficiency that he could take charge of a school he was given a small school, but he was allowed every year three months free to go to Dublin. A man was put in his place; and he was allowed three months' free education at Dublin College, and if he passed the necessary standards there he could go again for a fourth year. He thought that was a plan which might very well be followed here. Three months' tuition at the normal school would give pupil-teachers a grasp of the subject which they could not get otherwise, and make them more efficient teachers.

Mr. FISHER said experience had not proved that they were the best teachers.

Mr. DUNCAN said his experience was different. In his district they had had teachers from the normal school, and they had proved most excellent; but he believed practical training in the schools in the art of teaching and normal-school tuition were both required, and that then they would get the best teachers. The best teachers were not the M.A.s, but men who had a grasp of human nature, who could conduct a school mildly, intelligently, and strictly, without harshness. If the normal schools were done away with the clever youths of our poorer classes would be crowded out from becoming teachers, because they were not in the same position as the rich to obtain outside tuition; and the schools of the colony would be the losers. With the exceptions he had mentioned, he could not conscientiously support the proposals. Of course, all unnecessary expenditure should be done away with; and he had no doubt there was such expenditure. He hoped the present Minister of Education would find these things out during the recess, and come down with a comprehensive measure next session. It would be far better to do that, to remodel the whole Education Act, than to bring proposals down in the form of resolutions at this late period of the session. However, since economy was the order of the day, he would not be against the 4s. being taken off the capitation-grant, to see if it could not be done without, as no great injury could be done by taking that away for a year or two, at any rate.

Mr. TANNER said it was evidently the intention of members to discuss the whole of the questions mentioned by the Minister of Education. Some honourable gentlemen opposite who had spoken had said that this subject should not have been brought on at this late period of the session: but much valuable time had been wasted in useless party discussions, instead of being occupied with the consideration of the great question submitted by the Ministry; and for this he did not think the Ministers were to blame. When he heard the honourable member for Dunedin Central he could not help thinking that he must be a bachelor, for he showed such a want of knowledge of the habits of children. That honourable gentleman seemed to think that of necessity if children were not at school they were in the gutters. He ventured to think that parents would resent such an imputation. The children in New Zealand were well conducted, and when not at school were by no means necessarily in the gutters or in mischief. In proof of this, he would ask honourable members to look at children during the vacations, when there were no schools open. If they went along the streets during the holidays they would not find the children in the gutters, but would find them behaving respectably and quietly. The argument he had made use of was certainly drawn not from facts, but from imagination. When he heard the honourable member for Kumara descanting upon the merits of the children on the West Coast he could not help thinking that they must be very precocious there—perhaps living where there was a great deal of moisture caused them to spring up more rapidly; but, still, he thought that the children who had been heard singing their little ditties must have been between six and seven years of age, and not between five and six.

Mr. SEDDON.—No.

Mr. TANNER said of course he would accept that statement; but the children in that part of the colony must be very precocious. He would like to have brought on the floor of the House a child who was between the ages of five and six to show what infants such children were. He had found one of that age; but its mother would not let it out on exhibition. He asked the child's mother if it had learnt its A, B, C, and she replied that she thought the child should not begin to learn even its A, B, C before it was six years old. The honourable member for Napier had said that the question of the school-age would not affect the country schools so much, but only the town schools—with which he (Mr. Tanner) agreed. In his own district, he might say there were a large number of country schools, but only one of them would be affected by the alteration of the school-age; for the families whose children attended the other schools were so scattered that children between the ages of five and six could not attend the schools. But they might put that question on one side, for they had the assurance of the Minister of Education that the raising of the school-age should not interfere with any of the country schools. He regarded the raising of the school-age to six as proper, and the saving that would be effected by it as a genuine saving, and in that respect different from the savings subsequently proposed. The school-age, he believed, should have been raised to seven. There were twenty thousand children between the ages of five and seven years receiving education at the present time, and it would have meant a saving of £80,000. That was a direction where the saving would have been real. Then, again, he thought the secondary-education reserves ought to be taken and used for the purposes of primary education. He would begin with the Auckland Girls' High School reserve. That reserve was originally dedicated to primary education, and was then taken for secondary education; and so he would like to make a beginning with it. He would like to see an Act brought in next session handing it back to the purpose for which it was originally dedicated. Excepting by way of scholarships—and scholarships were paid for out of primary-school funds—the children of the poorer classes could get no advantage from these secondary schools. Parents were required to pay fees amounting to £9 a year at these schools; the poorer classes could not do that, and therefore the secondary schools were not available for them. For this reason the reserves should be taken away from the secondary schools and handed over for the benefit of the primary-school system. He did not think the capitation should be reduced by 4s., as proposed, but that the saving should be effected by raising the school-age. The average age of children who passed the First Standard was very nearly nine years; and, as he was convinced that if they went to school at seven they would be able to pass the First Standard at nine, he thought the saving should be made by raising the school-age; but the reduction of the capitation-grant by £26,000 seemed to him to be in the wrong direction, and likely to injure the system. Many who had spoken in favour of the proposed reduction of the capitation had said that, above all things, the primary-school system should be supported in its efficiency; but the reduction of the capitation-grant would certainly go in the opposite direction. The complaint throughout the whole country was want of funds; and even in Hawke's Bay, where things were so well managed, when applications were sent down to the Board for more accommodation or appliances the answer had to be, "No funds;" and yet it was proposed to reduce the vote still further, and that in face of the fact that the population of the colony was increasing! There were twenty thousand children who were receiving no education at the present time, and the School Committees could not put the compulsory clauses into force, because they had no accommodation; and yet honourable members spoke in favour of reducing the means of affording accommodation! He hoped honourable members would pause before they voted for that. In order to test the question, he would move, when the proper time came, that the vote be reduced by £5, and would press it to a division. There were some honourable members who said that they desired to see assistance given to that section of the community who carried on education at their own expense. He would ask how they proposed to give that assistance. By reducing the capitation-allowance? If assistance was to be given to that section of the community, the only way to do it was to make a saving on the general system by raising the school-age to seven, which would effect a saving of £80,000, and by appropriating the secondary-education reserves, which would give another £20,000; and then those claims could be met without increased expenditure. One word with regard to Education Boards. He was one of those who thought that a saving would be made by abolishing these Boards, and that if the business were left in the hands of the Inspectors and School Committees the work would be better done. There was no doubt that a great many Education Boards had gone to great expense in their management, and the fact that the Hawke's Bay Board had managed well was no test of the general management. The honourable member for Napier, who was Chairman of that Board, was a prudent man and a good administrator, and it had been mainly through his management that there had been no extravagance. It had been just the same when that honourable member was Superintendent of Hawke's Bay, and that was almost the only province which, on the abolition of the provinces, showed a credit balance. He believed that savings could be made without cutting down the salaries of the teachers, and he agreed with the honourable member for Napier that the best plan would be to have a scale of salaries which would not be subject to any change. That would be the only way to get efficient teachers, because those who undertook the education of children would know that they would receive such an allowance as would warrant them in going to some expense in their own education. With regard to the Seventh Standard, which meant that those who had passed the Sixth Standard might remain at the schools afterwards, he thought they should be able to do so if their parents could spare them. Fourteen was the average age for passing the Sixth Standard, and the school-age terminated at fifteen; and he did not think it would be wise to drive these children away as long as their parents could allow them to stay.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE thought that most of the arguments of the honourable gentleman who had just sat down were scarcely worth answering; but there were one or two points he would like to touch upon. The honourable gentleman first of all deprecated the waste of time there had been this session, and blamed the Opposition for that waste: but that was scarcely fair. If they considered what had caused this subject to be kept so far back they could not help seeing that it was caused very much by the Government side of the House. The House was here for seven or eight weeks before it got the Government policy. He did not say that the Government were to blame for that, because they had a great deal to do before they could bring down their Bills, particularly as so many of them had to be so constructed that they would meet the wishes of the Government supporters. Then, again, the House was asked to do in two months work that ought to occupy Parliament for at least six months; and that was the reason why, at the last moment, honourable members were called upon to discuss such large questions as that of education without time for proper consideration. The honourable gentleman said it would be a right thing to increase the school-age to seven, and that a saving of £80,000 would be made by that. That would be a very bad way to save money. No doubt it might suit the honourable gentleman and some others to reduce the taxation by £80,000; but the people of the colony would not have that justice done to them to which they were entitled if the school-age were raised. It would mean that the children of poor people—who had to leave school at ten years of age to help to support their families—could not get proper education, and would in many cases only be able to pass the Third Standard. Then, the honourable gentleman referred to the Education Boards; but his knowledge of Education Boards must be confined to that of Hawke's Bay, which no doubt the honourable gentleman thought perfect. However, it was not necessary to follow the honourable gentleman further. Coming to the real question at issue, he believed that the proposals of the Government would seriously affect the education system of the colony; and, if there was any question on which the people at the last elections gave a decided voice, it was on the question that the system of education should not be seriously interfered with. It was a pity that the House had not a better opportunity of expressing its opinion on this question, and he thought that the Minister of Education should have brought distinct resolutions before the House, and not brought on the discussion on a question of money. He could then have tested the opinion of the House on each subject separately. A large number of honourable members objected to a reduction in the vote, and yet they were asked to vote for a reduction in order to enable the proposals to be carried out. He was sorry that the Government had not seen their way to leave the question over till next session, with the exception of the capitation-allowance. They might have asked the House to express an opinion on that point, and that would have compelled the Education Boards to review their expenses and the salaries they paid to their teachers; and then the House would be in a far better position next year to deal with the whole subject. He believed they could make a large saving in the education expenditure without doing any injury to it, and he would be prepared to vote for the reduction of the capitation-allowance. Coming to the question of raising the school-age, he might say that he was opposed to that, because he thought it would do a great injury to country schools. He was surprised to hear some honourable members talk on this subject. It appeared to him that they did not understand it. With regard to raising the school-age, it would mean that the Boards would be unable to derive the surplus funds which they now obtained from the large town schools to assist country schools, and that the country schools must suffer to a very large extent. He did not know anything which induced people to go into the country and settle upon the land more than the fact that they were aware that, as soon as a number of children were in the district, schools would be established; but if they interfered with country schools they would put an end to this inducement. Of course the Minister had told the House that he would take care that no school was closed in the country by reason of this reduction. That might be right enough so far as existing schools were concerned, but when they came to consider the establishment of new schools it must seriously interfere with them. Then, as to the normal schools, it would be a serious matter to do away with them. Any one who knew anything of the subject must have come to the conclusion that a large number of the present teachers could not possibly have been trained but for the normal schools. What was the fact when the system was first established? We were unable to get teachers until such time as they had been trained in the normal schools, unless they were obtained from Victoria, whence the principal supply came; and it would be a poor thing to again have to depend on Victoria.

Mr. FISHER.—How does Victoria train her teachers?

Mr. J. MCKENZIE said they were trained there in the same way as they were trained here. There were 323 students trained in the Normal School, Dunedin, from its establishment up to the end of 1886; of whom no less than 227 remained as teachers in the employ of the colony, and the rest had done good service to the colony before they left the service. That was clear proof that the system had been a good one. There were now sixty-seven students in the Normal School at Dunedin, and about a hundred and fifty pupil-teachers, with whom they could not carry out their engagements unless they kept up the Normal School. If the Government reduced the vote they could not keep their engagements with the pupil-teachers and students. He thought it was a very bad thing to force the Education Board to close their normal schools. He was told they could aid those pupils by giving them scholarships—by teaching them in the college; but in the college they would have no chance of being trained for teaching. No doubt they would get a very good education in the college and be able to pass a degree—they might come out with high qualifications from a degree point of view, but they would be utterly ignorant of how to teach children. He hoped the Committee would seriously consider the subject before they did away with the normal schools. This reduction meant a reduction to the Otago Board of £14,000 a year. A committee of that Board considered how far they could retrench without seriously interfering with the system, and their proposition would be to reduce the expenditure by £7,000. The proposition of the Government now was to reduce it by £14,000. This reduction, if carried out, would very seriously interfere with the education system in that part of the country. As far as raising the school-age was concerned, and doing away with the normal schools, he would oppose the proposals of the Government, believing that those proposals would injure the education system.

Mr. MCGREGOR had supported the Government up to this particular question; but now he said, "Hold! enough." The extraordinary proposals of the Government were to him quite staggering. The idea of at once cutting off £60,000 from the education vote, and still carrying on an extravagant expenditure in connection with defence and Native matters, was something which the people in his part of the country could not possibly understand. Another matter which struck him was that the Minister came down with a proposal, and was not prepared to state what would be the effect of it. They were aware that the number of children at the public schools between the ages of five and seven was 21,054. It was, of course, a question which was open to debate how many of these were between five and six. They had no statistics to guide them on that part of the subject. He had before him the last report of the Victorian Government, which he believed was the most reliable in the colonies, and one that was looked up not only in the colonies, but by the educational authorities at Home. There were no less than 2,809 children at the public schools of Victoria between the ages of three and four; 9,708 between the ages of four and five; and 15,428 between the ages of five and six,—clearly giving an indication that in that Australian colony in which probably education was best managed they adhered to the idea of sending children to school at a much earlier age than was here proposed. The educational system of Victoria was conducted by the Minister, who had a seat in Parliament, and was supported by a secretary and staff. There were no buffers like the Boards of Education in this country, which, in his opinion, was one great fault in our system, because these Boards were frequently the cause of deadlocks and trouble. The opinions of Dr. Brown and others, who were supposed to be experts, as to the inadvisableness or otherwise of sending children to school when they were five years old differed very much on this particular question. Almost every member of that House was returned pledged, directly or indirectly, to support the present educational system. He was thoroughly and distinctly of opinion that the school-age ought to be kept exactly as it was; and he was also in favour of children being sent to school at an early age, so that they might undergo a certain amount of discipline, and be under control when they got older, and thus be more apt to profit by the system of education that was provided for them in the public schools. The passing through the schools of the elder children of a family at an early age would often enable the younger ones to go to school earlier than they otherwise would, because in some cases it was necessary to keep one or two at home. He was sure the Minister could not have thoroughly thought out the whole question, and it would be a very advisable thing for him to hold his hand now, and to devote his time and energies during the recess—to which Ministers had now become so fond of alluding—to thoroughly weighing, considering, and inquiring into the whole question. The honourable gentleman should think the whole thing thoroughly out, and in the meantime let the whole matter remain in abeyance. They knew that the honourable gentleman believed in good education—they had proof of it in the classical quotations with which he delighted the House, and which showed that the honourable gentleman sympathized with all that was great and noble in the matter of education. That being so, the honourable gentleman should during the recess devote all his leisure to education. Though great in higher education and classics, the honourable gentleman was rather weak in his decimals, as was shown that day, when he referred to children being, on an average, nearly nine before they passed the First Standard, whereas it was really only eight and a small decimal. As bearing on the question of expelling the children from the schools as soon as they had passed the Sixth Standard, no matter what age they were, he might mention that he had that day received a telegram saying a girl of his own, aged twelve years and a half, had passed the Sixth Standard with high honours, and under this proposal she would be compelled to leave the school, however much it might be desired she should stay on. As to making the reduction of 4s. in the capitation, that was a matter for fair consideration and argument; but he thought the whole subject should be left till next session. With that delicious vagueness of which he was so consummate a master, the Premier had said in the Financial Statement that the proposals of the Government would not involve the closing of any country schools. What did that really mean? Were all the small country schools to be made dame schools at £25 a year?

Mr. FISHER.—No, no.

Mr. MCGREGOR said he should like to know distinctly what it did mean before giving his vote. He should like to see nothing at all done this session, but that next session they should give the subject exhaustive consideration, and then adopt the Victorian system. In a country like this, where the institutions were democratic, it was the duty of every citizen to see that his children were properly educated. They might well consider the benefit of the system they had in this country. Scotland was one of the poorest countries in the world, but a country in the front rank as to education. There they had a system of bursaries or scholarships which drew out the cleverest children in an admirable manner, and gave them a university education at no cost to their parents. That, he thought, was the most perfect and cheapest higher-education system devisable. As the twig was bent so did the tree incline, and he believed in children beginning to attend school young, and was against the proposal of the Government to raise the school-age. He should be compelled to vote against their other educational proposals.

Dr. NEWMAN said he was very much surprised when he found it stated in the Financial Statement that the education estimates were to be reduced by £61,000, because he had been carefully through the expenditure, and failed to see how that could be done without seriously interfering with the salaries of teachers and with the efficiency of education. He was still more astonished when the Minister came down and said he would reduce the vote by £65,000. He was satisfied that, if the reductions were made as proposed, no Education Board would be able to carry on without incurring an overdraft or taxing the school-teachers' salaries in all directions. He was prepared to vote for a large reduction of the education vote, because he believed it was absolutely necessary; but to take £65,000 off one vote at one fell swoop was too much and too serious. If the Minister would kindly look at the items that made up the £381,000 he would see that there was plenty of room for retrenchment. He could take £2,000 off the library vote; £2,700 off the higher-education vote, which would be a great saving to the colony—

Mr. FISHER.—Take the Wellington portion?

Dr. NEWMAN.—Certainly; take it along with the rest. He did not wish to see the Wellington College exceptionally treated. The vote for higher education in this colony was an enormously large one. Then, there was the college for deaf-mutes—there was gross extravagance in connection with that. There were in the college from thirty-seven to forty pupils, and they cost £3,250, or upwards of £80 per pupil. That seemed to be extravagant. Then, if the Minister wished for reform, there was the Native Schools Department, where there was a very large expenditure. To go back to the reforms proposed by the Minister, he thought it was wise to raise the school-age to six years. To keep the children under six years out of the schools was a fair and wise proposal. If the Boards were dealt with in the ruthless fashion proposed, within six months every Board in the colony would be unable to carry on for want of funds. He would urge upon the Minister to adhere to the agreement which he had accepted in the earlier part of the day. It was said that the young children were taught in the kindergarten fashion, and that the kindergarten children were taught for £1 10s. a head; but he would call attention to the fact that the children in the infant departments of the Wellington schools were taught at £1 10s. per head, and that the difference between that and the capitation went to make up for the cost of the higher-standard education. If they took it from the lower they must put it on the higher education. With regard to the abolition of the normal schools, he might say the Wellington Board had zealously tried to do its best with the Normal School; but there was no doubt that these four schools were not wanted, and that if they tried they could train their pupil-teachers at very much less cost. He would, however, like to see this vote kept on for one season longer. He would tell the Minister how he might retrench, in addition to the items he had already mentioned. He might abolish some of the Education Boards. There was no doubt that, with the means of communication that now existed, some of the Boards—half the Boards—could be done without and half their cost saved; though he did not think that if they did away with all the Boards the saving would be so great as some honourable members seemed to imagine, because in that case the expenditure of the central department would have to be increased. The districts should be amalgamated. Then, the Minister might, with the aid of experts, revise the syllabus, and in that way make the school lives of children shorter, and thus save a good deal of money, for there were a good many things that might with advantage be left out of the curriculum. The propositions of the Government were ruthless and sweeping; and, though he would approve of the others if the school-age were retained, if the proposal affecting that question were carried he should feel bound to vote against all the other proposals. He spoke from a thorough knowledge of the question when he said that he was sure the Boards would not be able to carry on if these sweeping reductions were made.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN would not keep the Committee long, particularly as most of his views had been so well expressed by the honourable members for Linwood and Dunedin Central: in fact, perhaps the most effective speech he could make would be to quote those gentlemen and say he indorsed their opinions. He also approved of the suggestion of the honourable member for Thorndon for the amalgamation of education districts. There were also one or two other points he wished to take notice of. The Minister had, he thought, somewhat disingenuously quoted one particular Board in New Zealand, the name of which he had declined to give, which he said had this year a balance of over £9,000. Any person who heard that statement would naturally suppose that that Board had saved within the financial year a sum of over £9,000. If the honourable gentleman had looked at the figures he would have known that the Board he referred to—the North Canterbury Board—had commenced the year with a balance of somewhere about £9,000, and that the actual expenditure within the year had taken up the whole of the receipts. Surely it was not right for the honourable gentleman to make that statement; for it was misleading the Committee. He would not give way to the honourable gentleman, as he had been waiting to speak all the evening. He had been greatly struck with the statement the honourable gentleman had made, for he knew the figures perfectly well. In 1884 there was a balance of £9,062; in 1885, £9,741; and in 1886, £9,701. Well, it must be seen that the statement was not quite fair, and it must have been made in order to give the Committee the idea that certain Boards were putting by money.

Mr. FISHER.—I did not make any such statement.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said that was what the Committee must have decided was the object of the statement. As to the proposal affecting the normal schools, he thought the Minister would make a mistake in endeavouring to make such a sweeping reduction. He (Mr. O'Callaghan) looked upon the normal schools as one of the most important parts of the educational system. It was not because the Wellington Normal School had been a failure that it was to be gathered that all the normal schools had been failures, for certainly that was not the case in Otago or Canterbury. In Canterbury they had a number of excellent teachers from the normal school, and the effect of these teachers passing through the Training-College was to make the system more uniform than it would be otherwise. Though the Wellington Normal School had failed, yet the number of teachers in the State schools turned out of the normal schools of the colony was very respectable, the number being no smaller than 546 out of a total of 2,721. That proved that the system was not a failure, for the schools had been in existence only about ten or twelve years in the South and seven or eight years in the North Island. He thought it far better that this small expenditure of £8,000 should go on, and that they should obtain really well-trained teachers, than that they should revert to the old system, under which every man who had a smattering of education was foisted into the employment of the Boards.

Mr. FISHER said that, as the honourable gentleman had not had the grace to allow him to make an explanation, he wished to say that he had not referred to the North Canterbury Education Board, but to another Board, the credit-balance of which was £5,000, not £9,000.

Mr. DODSON thought it must be admitted that this discussion had been rather disappointing to any one who looked to the House for retrenchment. Honourable members had come pledged, and the Ministry had taken office, to effect retrenchment; but on no question of retrenchment that the Ministry had brought before the House had they been sufficiently backed up by the House. In no question had this been more apparent than in the present one. Throughout the discussion there had been a disinclination to do anything in the way of retrenchment. The Minister of Education had certainly received no encouragement to effect retrenchment at present, or to consider the question during the recess. The question of the school-age had been referred to, and he might say that ever since he had had a seat in the House he had always contended that the State had no right to pay for children until they were fit to acquire the education the State was willing to pay for, and he thought the age of six was quite early enough for the State to pay for children. Previous to that they were far better at home with their mothers. Any one going into any of our schools would see these little children set up on the forms like dolls on a shelf, and just about as usefully employed. He was glad the Minister was going to give the House an opportunity of recording their votes on this question, and he would certainly record his vote in favour of the age being raised to six years, for that was amply early for the State to commence paying for the education of a child. He was very much pleased to hear the honourable gentleman admit that there was one section of the community which had not been fairly dealt with, and he understood him to say that he would take the matter into consideration, and see what he could recommend next session. That section had not received anything approaching justice, and had a great claim upon the House; and he only regretted that so little reference had been made to it. However, now, whenever any reference was made to it, member after member echoed the feeling that justice had not been done; and that gave him hope that, when the question was fairly discussed next session, that section would receive the justice due to it. The honourable member for Lincoln said that our system of education was one that we ought to be proud of; but he (Mr. Dodson) could not be proud of a system which shut out two-thirteenths of the population from sharing in the benefit of the State schools. Indeed, it was rather a scandal on this free country that we should so manage our schools as to shut out so large a number of the population from the benefits of education, while at the same time we paid for our education out of funds which were equally contributed by them. Various honourable members had referred to the Education Boards in their own districts, and he might be excused for referring to the Board of his district, which, although it was one of the smallest districts in the colony, would set an example to some of the extravagant Boards which they would do well to follow. If every Education Board in the colony managed its affairs as economically and carefully as the Marlborough Board had done there would be no necessity to do away with them. The Marlborough Board conducted its operations for some £200 a year in salaries and advertisements, and it maintained some thirty-three schools, with 1,200 pupils. And, more than that, the work done by the schools would compare favourably with the work done by any others in the colony. Its pupils were first or second in the various standards in which they could be compared with others. That being so, it was a great feather in their caps that they had been able to manage education so cheaply and well. The honourable member for Linwood had made a most interesting speech, and his sentiments were so well put that he should like to hear the honourable gentleman speak more frequently than he did. However, he must take issue with the honourable member on one or two points. The honourable gentleman said that parents were the best judges of the age at which their children should be sent to school. In that he entirely differed from the honourable member, for parents were only too anxious to press on their children and make them precocious, and these were not the children which succeeded best in life or passed through the higher standards most rapidly. Parents were not the best judges in this respect, for they always thought their own children were fit for anything, and it was well that other people should form an opinion for them. It was urged that children should be sent to school at five so that they might be able to pass the First Standard at nine; but, in his opinion, the child who was sent to school at six would pass the standard sooner, while the child who was kept at school between the ages of five and six was much more likely to have an injury done to it than any good. He could have wished that the Minister had given more particulars; but he thought each heading which the honourable member had mentioned the Committee could very well agree to without doing any injury to the system of education. He did not, himself, believe that the country schools would be injured if the school-age were raised to six, for very few schools would be closed consequent on that, and a very small sum would compensate them for the children taken away; and he supposed that was the idea which passed through the Minister's mind when saying that he would take care that they should not be injured. He did not think the colony had any right to pay for any child after it had passed the Sixth Standard. If a child were so clever as the child of the honourable member for Akaroa, and could pass that standard at thirteen years of age, of course there should be facilities for its going on to acquire higher education, for which it was so eminently fitted. But did any one imagine that the honourable member would keep his child from school because the State would not pay for that higher education? Of course not; and he would immediately send it to a higher school; and the only difference would be that he would pay for it—and would feel a pride in paying for it—instead of calling on the State to pay. If parents could not afford to pay for their children at the higher schools—children who had shown a special aptitude by passing the Sixth Standard at an early age—of course provision should be made for cases of that kind. He did not wish to deprive any child of higher education; but he wanted to see some finality in this matter, so that they might know where the State was to commence and where it was to leave off. In his opinion, when it commenced at six years of age and educated the child up to the Sixth Standard, nothing more was required of the State. So far as the normal schools were concerned, he was glad to see that they were to be stopped. That system was only partial in its operation, and, as usual, those who had these institutions near them were all in favour of their continuance. He thought this was a matter in which they might very well follow the example of Victoria and leave it to the question of demand and supply. If teachers were required they would come soon enough, and he was glad the Minister was going to do away with these institutions, and that the colony would no longer have to pay so high a sum as £3,000 a year for their maintenance. Again, the question of reserves for higher education should be dealt with, and he hoped the Minister would turn his attention to it during the recess. If these reserves were applied, as they ought to be, to primary education it would be a very great relief to the taxpayer. He trusted the Minister would bring down a Bill next session dealing with the whole question, and providing that these reserves should be for the benefit of the colony as a whole, and not be allowed to remain solely for the benefit of the provincial districts in which they had been set apart, while other parts of the colony could get no benefit from them simply because they were at a distance.

Mr. WILSON had a few figures which might be interesting to the Committee on the question of school-age. But he might say at once that he was entirely in favour of raising the school-age to six years, and he did not think it would affect the country districts so much as some honourable members appeared to think. The following was a return of schools in the Otago Education District in charge of one teacher only, with particulars of attendance and age of pupils in October, 1887: Total number of schools having from fourteen scholars to sixty-one, 106; total children on roll, 3,797; total under six years, 183. The Education Committee sent out to the various Boards and educational institutes asking them for their opinion, as well as to the various Inspectors. Naturally, the School Boards were entirely against any reduction in their votes, and nearly every one of them sent in a reply that it did not wish the school-age to be raised. The educational institutes did the same; but the Inspectors—who were the most impartial people to deal with this question, and were best able to judge the matter—were all, apparently, in favour of raising the school-age. That was a very important thing, and should not be forgotten in considering this question. He agreed very much with what the honourable member for Kumara had said regarding Boards. He (Mr. Wilson) thought the Legislature might very well abolish them altogether; but it ought, at the same time, to set up something in their place. He did not approve of the Minister of Education taking entire charge of the system. He should like to see a Council set up for the whole of New Zealand, composed of gentlemen well educated themselves, and who had opportunities of observing the state of education in New Zealand. The Minister should be the administrator of the system, and might have under him the Inspectors, and might fix a scale of salaries applicable to the whole of New Zealand. Such a Council would not cost anything like the sum at present spent in management. With regard to the reduction of the capitation, he was certainly in favour of it. He did not understand the strict-average question, and would like a little more time to consider the subject. He should also be in favour of reducing the £8,000 for normal schools down to £4,000.

Mr. LEVESTAM said there was no doubt the country was clamouring for retrenchment; but he did not believe the country wanted retrenchment in this direction, because the education of their children was about the only thing the poorer class of people got from the country. It was said that this raising of the school-age did not affect country schools as much as was represented. Now, the Education Board received the whole of the money paid in capitation, and doled it out to the country districts. It followed that, if the number of children attending town schools decreased, the funds of the Boards would decrease correspondingly. Therefore it was no argument in favour of the change proposed that country schools would receive assistance to keep them open, because it followed the same amount would be paid to the country schools as was taken away from the town schools. With regard to Education Boards, he thought it would be far better for the colony as a whole if these Education Boards were abolished, because teachers were now treated very unfairly. In many instances teachers with similar qualifications to those possessed by others were receiving about one quarter of the salary those others received; and so it would be as long as each Board had the entire control of its own schools. If a vacancy occurred, an able man who might happen to be in a small district would have no chance of obtaining a mastership in a large district, because he had no friends who would assist him into that position, no matter how good his qualifications might be. As to the raising of the school-age, there was more embodied in the proposition than appeared at first sight. The proposal of the Government not only entailed the raising of the school-age, but also the withdrawal of the capitation-grant from every child who had passed the Sixth Standard, irrespective of age. When children passed the Sixth Standard at twelve, as many did, they would not be entitled to attend a public school any longer. That would be an injustice, to which he, for one, would never consent. It was said that some children were better at home with their mammas: but that depended upon the kind of mammas they had, and he was sure that in many cases it was far better that they should be at school. They were told that in other countries children were not admitted into public schools before they were six years old. That was true. But he knew that in those countries most of the children before they were that age were sent to private schools. Here, where that was not the case, the children should be admitted as soon as they were fit to go to school. It was a well-known fact that children sent to school at five passed the Sixth Standard much earlier than children who were sent later to school. The next proposal of the Government was to do away with the 4s. He should not oppose that; but he thought it was hardly fair to say that it would not inconvenience the various Boards, because it must be remembered that, in addition to the £26,000, there would be taken away the capitation for those who had passed the Sixth Standard. The present system of education, being purely secular, could be participated in by persons of all denominations. No one had a right to complain, as one might have if religion were taught in the public schools. The moment a grant in aid of one denomination was made, another could claim the same consideration with equal right, and therefore it would never do to interfere with the system in that direction. He thought the normal schools could be done away with altogether. He did not exactly know what was meant by the "strict average," but his chief objection to the proposals of the Government was to the taking-away of the capitation from children who had passed the Sixth Standard, irrespective of age. They were told that scholarships were open to them: but these scholarships would have to be obtained in the year following that in which they had passed the Sixth Standard. If the capitation were taken away as soon as the child had passed the Sixth Standard, he would not be able to go in for the scholarships. A child of twelve, though he might have passed the Sixth Standard, was generally quite unfit to go out and earn a living; and it was absolutely necessary they should be allowed to remain a few years longer—till they were fifteen. In that part of the Continent of Europe from which he came, boys were compelled to remain at school till they were fifteen and a half; and girls till they were fourteen and a half years old; and it was enforced in this way: Employers were not allowed to engage children till they were of that age, nor parents to employ them; so the inducement to parents to remove their children from school unduly early was removed entirely. There was no such thing as remaining stationary in this world—we must either go forward or go backward; and he regarded these proposals as going backward. He particularly protested against taking away capitulation from children as soon as they passed the Sixth Standard, if they were within the limit of the school-age. If the Minister would assure him that that should not be done he would vote with him, but without such an assurance he must vote against the proposals of the Government; and he was sure the majority of the people of the country were not in favour of such retrenchment as was foreshadowed in these proposals.

Mr. GRIMMOND thought the proposals of the Government inopportune, coming at a time when the whole question had been submitted to a Committee, and inapplicable, because the Government were attempting to deal with questions which had been submitted for the consideration of that Committee, which, in the circumstances, could not report till next session. It had been stated that the raising of the school-age would not affect the status of education in the colony; but, if that were so, how was it that the school-age in other countries was less than here? He would give the following figures to show the school-ages in different countries: Great Britain, three to eighteen; New Zealand, five to fifteen; Victoria, three to sixteen; Queensland, five to fourteen; New South Wales, four to fourteen. So, in none of these countries did the grant-earning age start later than five.

Mr. FISHER.—What is the cost of different ages?

Mr. GRIMMOND said it was about £1 5s. for the lower ages: but, take them right through, the average in these colonies was: New South Wales, £6 4s.; Victoria, £5 9s. 5½d.; Queensland, £6; South Australia, £5 5s. 3½d.; New Zealand, £5 2s. 4½d. We were therefore lower in average cost than the other colonies, and our minimum age was higher—in only one case was it as high as five besides here. The Minister had read some evidence in support of his proposals, but none against them, and had therefore placed a one-sided statement before the House. He would read briefly from the opinions of some gentlemen of as much authority probably as those quoted by the Minister. Mr. Aitken, the Chairman of the South Canterbury Educational Institute, wrote enclosing the following resolutions passed by that body:—

“That this institute is of opinion that the proposed raising of the school-age to six years is undesirable for the following reasons, viz.: (1.) Because such a course cannot fail to result in serious injury to small and country schools, unless the allowances to larger schools be curtailed to a degree which will injure education in the centres of population. (2.) Because, although raising the school-age from five to six may seem to be cutting off only a year at the beginning of a child's school-career, it is in reality the last and best year of which the child is deprived by such a course, seeing that children are in most cases removed from school at a given age, and not on passing a given standard. (3.) Because under nearly all great educational systems school life begins at five years of age or earlier; and, if New Zealand interferes with her system in this respect, she will place herself in the rear of contemporary civilisation. (4.) Because a child entering school at six years of age will not pass a given standard as early or as well as one who enters at five years of age. A very sharp child who enters at six may surpass an ordinary or a dull child who enters at five; but sharp children must by no means be taken as types. (5.) Because the idea is a mistaken one that, as regards physical health and mental vigour, children up to the age of six or seven years are better away from school, and that they learn nothing till that age is reached. Children are always learning; and if they are not at school they are learning elsewhere many things which were better not learned at all, and which will have to be unlearned when school is entered. But in the year from five to six children at school learn the important lessons of obedience, order, and reverence for law, and these, too, at a time when they are not likely soon to be forgotten. (6.) Because it is only the best home-circumstances that can make up to the pupil for the want of school discipline and restraint; and here, as elsewhere, it is wrong to take the best as types.”

The Rev. Mr. Habens, the Inspector-General of Schools, and probably the highest authority on the subject, was asked before the Committee the following question: “What do you think is the general effect of discipline and teaching on these younger children?” to which he replied,—

“Considering the early age at which the children of the artisan and the labourer ordinarily leave school, I am of opinion that it is necessary to admit such children to school at an early age in order that their school-course may be of reasonable length; and that, in schools which are sufficiently organized to provide instruction upon proper methods for children between five and seven years of age, such children derive a very great benefit from the discipline and instruction which they receive, and are thereby prepared for the severer methods of instruction that will follow in the more advanced classes. I think it should also be remembered that the children of the same class, if they are not at school at an early age, are likely to receive a practical education out-of-doors that, however advantageous it may be to them from a physical point of view, is perhaps very detrimental from a moral and intellectual point of view. I may add that, if we regard the example set by England in this matter, the English Government recognises the attendance of children just above three years of age as entitling the schools they attend to grants from the Treasury."

He knew from his own practical experience that attending school at an early age had no injurious effect on children physically or mentally. There was a member of this House who matriculated at thirteen and took his B.A. degree at eighteen, and in physique he was quite equal to the Minister of Education. The Educational Institute of Otago had given the following reasons against raising the school-age:—

"(a.) That in almost every country where there is a State system of education the Government encourages attendance at an earlier age than in New Zealand.

"(b.) Raising the age will materially affect small schools in outlying districts, where they are least able to bear retrenchment.

"(c.) To raise the age practically means depriving large numbers of a year's schooling, as they are usually withdrawn to work, to assist in maintaining the family at a given age, irrespective of their educational acquirements.

"(d.) As practical educationists we are decidedly of opinion that, as a rule, pupils entering school at six would not pass Standard IV. at the same time as those entering at five; and this applies with still greater force to the proposal to raise the age to seven.

"(e.) It is quite a common mistake to suppose that children are as well out of school as in it until they are six or seven. Where the home-influences are good, where there are facilities for learning in the home-circle, the disadvantages are not so obvious; but, where these do not exist, if the school-age be postponed till six or seven the children will undoubtedly be acquiring habits not in the least degree conducive to sound conduct and character.

"(f.) The work in the initiatory department of the schools is often misrepresented: on the one hand it is said to be mere nursery-work, and on the other it is said to be work injurious to young pupils. Neither of these statements is correct.

"(g.) The educational work of the first two years has a most beneficial influence both on the physical and mental condition and health of the pupils, and gives pleasurable and systematic training in habits of regularity, punctuality, obedience, and a liking for school, at an age when these things are of great disciplinary value. Rational methods of instruction, well-ventilated schools, an excellent climate, and the good physique of the children, are all in the highest degree favourable to beginning school life at the age fixed as at present."

Mr. Mowbray wrote on the question thus to the Committee:—

"I do not think the school-age can be raised without disaster both to children and teachers. The children will suffer, because they will be deprived of a large portion of that early training which every experienced teacher recognises as invaluable. The difference in intelligence and progress in standard work of a child from a kindergarten or good infant school, as compared with that of a child without such training, is immense.

"The teachers will suffer, because not only must a large number be dismissed, but those who remain must undergo a cruel diminution of income. The number of children under six years of age in the schools is, as nearly as I can ascertain, over 12,000, which, at the late rate of capitation, represents a revenue to the Boards of £48,000 per annum. These children are taught by 800 pupil-teachers, whose joint salaries will not amount to £10,000; and the difference between that sum and £48,000 represents the loss to the Education Boards by raising the school-age one year. Take the Thorndon Infant School as an example. There are 190 children, under a mistress and four pupil-teachers. A third of the children are under six years. Supposing that they be debarred from the school, one, or at most two, of the pupil-teachers could be dispensed with, the other expenses continuing as before. The Board would thus save £50 per annum, and lose £250 on this school alone."

Enough had been said by other honourable members to show that raising the school-age would have a bad effect on the educational status of the colony. As to reducing the capitation, it had been contended by some honourable members that the Boards would be able to carry on with the reduced sum, for they had got on fairly well with the present capitation; but he knew—speaking from some experience—that in Westland the Board had had very great difficulty in maintaining a high standard under the present capitation. The district was a very large and sparsely-settled one, and was as long in one direction as the distance from Christchurch to Invercargill. If it was argued that, under the present capitation, some Boards had had more than enough money, that was an argument for the abolition of the Boards. He thought that was a right thing to do, because the excessive money now given to the Boards of thickly-populated districts would then be available for poor districts which wanted it badly—some Boards now had to endeavour to get through their money by going in for luxuries, while others could not provide the barest educational necessities. In his district, even with the present capitation, the people in the outlying districts had often to supplement it to pay the teachers decent wages, and had even to subscribe for the erection of school-buildings. The settlers in the outlying districts in that part of the colony already had to help to build school-houses by sawing the timber, &c.; and if the means at the disposal of the Board were still further reduced they would be able to get no schools at all. It was very unjust, too, to class the Boards on an equal footing, and such action showed that the time had come for the abolition of the Boards. No doubt they had done good service in the past in establishing schools, but they had now become very expensive distributing bodies, and the work which they did could be centralised with great advantage and cheapness to the colony. He said that as one who had been connected with Education Boards and Education Committees for a number of years. As to training schools, there were none in his part of the country, and he could say nothing about them; but he would say the non-payment of capitation for children above a certain age would also act very badly in the part of the colony he came from, where there were no high schools, because it would result in the children getting no higher education at all unless their parents were rich enough to send them away to places where there were high schools. A child might pass the Sixth Standard at ten years old. What were the parents to do with it then? There was one other point which he wished to bring out, that had been omitted by the honourable member for Kumara—namely, that the percentage of passes was very high in Westland, the second highest in the colony. Marlborough came first, with 92·5 per cent. general average of passes; Westland came next, with 86 per cent.; Nelson came next, with 83 per cent.; and then came North Canterbury, with 73 per cent. With reference to strict average being substituted for working average, that also would be very injurious to the part of the colony he came from. The children had very long distances to travel, and the climate was not always good, and when it rained it did rain, and children could not attend school, so that the proposed alteration would weigh very heavily on the Board there. He might say that the Grey-mouth Board was so affected by the proposed reduction that it had, on receipt of intimation of the intention of the Government, given all its teachers three months' notice of dismissal, for it could not see its way to pay them. As to paying fees, that would raise an unpleasant line of demarcation between classes as to parents and children. For the reasons he had given, he should vote against the proposals of the Government.

Mr. JONES said he was of opinion that very large reductions could be made in the general management of education; but it should not be done in the manner shown by the proposals brought down by the Government. He entirely disagreed with the proposal to raise the school-age. In the first place he did not believe that the children suffered any injury from being sent to school at an early age; and, despite the opinions of doctors who had been largely quoted, he preferred to be guided by his own experience and observation. Any one who had specially visited the schools as he had done, would have seen the children looking rosy and healthy and happy, especially those who ranged from five to seven years of age. He also disputed that they cost anything like £3 15s. or £4 to educate as had been alleged, although, as the accounts were made up, they appeared to cost this amount. They really did not cost more than £1 5s. per annum; and for saying that he had an excellent authority, namely, the experienced author of "Retrenchment in Primary Education"—"C. S. H."—who, writing on this point, stated,—

"These children below seven do not cost nearly as much per head as those who are between seven and twelve. Except in very small schools they are taught in an infant-room, where the classes are larger than in the upper department. As an example, take the case of a school in the immediate neighbourhood of Christchurch. In the infant department there is an average of 160. The teachers in this department are paid about £200—that equals £1 5s. per head. If another 5s. is added for incidentals—which is certainly a very liberal allowance—the total cost per head is only £1 10s."

Other equally good authorities stated the cost to be from £1 to £1 5s. per head. He therefore thought it was wrong to deprive these little ones of the benefits of education when they only cost 6d. or 7d. per week. That point was worthy of the consideration of the Minister of Education. He thought the item of capitation might be reduced; but reduction ought to be made gradually. In reference to the next item he agreed with the honourable members for Linwood and Dunedin Central that it would be a very unjust thing to some of the schools that a saving should be made by taking the strict average instead of the working average. As to the fourth item, the evidence to his mind clearly showed that we should continue to maintain normal schools; but certainly we did not require so many of them. On the whole, the conclusion he had arrived at was that the Minister had not had sufficient time to thoroughly digest his proposals, and he hoped that next session the honourable gentleman would come down with a better plan. He (Mr. Grimmond) should not be able to support the proposals as they stood; but he more especially objected to the one affecting the welfare of the little people and the interests of the poorer classes, who were chiefly benefited by the Act as it now stood.

Major STEWARD said that, as every honourable member was speaking, he felt it necessary to say in what direction he should vote. He regretted very much the shape in which the proposals had come before the Committee, and thought it would have been far better if the honourable gentleman at the head of this department had seen his way to bring down to the House—not to the Committee—four distinct propositions upon which members could have voted. With regard to the general proposal to reduce the cost of the education system, he took leave to say that those were the wisest friends of the system who would take care to see that its cost did not increase to an amount that would raise an outcry which might lead to an endeavour to pull it down altogether. In addressing his constituents he had placed that phase of the question before them, and he had found a very general response. He believed that in the district which he represented the education system was as much valued as it was anywhere in the colony; but the people had very fully appreciated the fact that the cost of the system must be kept within such limits that there should not be a cry raised that the system was too expensive to be maintained. The proposal to reduce the capitation allowance was not new. It had previously been reduced by a shilling, and it was proposed that its reduction should be gradual. The reduction now proposed was sharper, but, in view of the circumstances of the colony, he could not think that the Minister was at all to blame for asking that the additional allowance should be at once discontinued. He regretted that the Minister had not at once proposed to abolish the Education Boards. Although he had been for some years a member of an Education Board, he must agree that it was quite possible to dispense with those bodies altogether; and, if that were done, it would be something towards making up for the deficiency now caused. For these reasons he should vote to reduce the capitation allowance to £3 15s. With regard to the school-age, there had been a proposal to raise the age to seven, and he thought the present proposal was a reasonable one under the circumstances, always provided—and he took it as a distinct pledge from the head of the department—that some special allowance should be made to the smaller schools that would enable them to carry on, so that they would not unduly suffer by this arrangement. On this point they had a distinct pledge, and he thought the House had a right to exact a literal fulfilment of it. With regard to the proposal to take the strict average instead of the working average, he did not see his way to vote with the Government, because he thought it unreasonable to enforce a reduction in that way. Again, he did not see his way at present to vote to abolish the normal schools. These training institutions were a necessary part of our education system, and, though he admitted it might be possible to reduce their number, he did not think they should all be abolished. With regard to the children who had passed the Sixth Standard also, he thought the proposal was reasonable, and that capitation should not be paid beyond the Sixth Standard. He believed, further, that the time would come when it would be necessary to charge a small school-fee in the Fifth and Sixth Standards, at the same time providing abundant scholarships or other facilities for those children whose parents were unable to pay the fees, and who were yet qualified for education in the higher standards, so that the door of education should not be shut against any child however poor. Speaking from experience in his own district, he might say that he felt sure that the parents of children who remained to the Fifth or Sixth Standard, certainly the majority of the parents, were able and would be willing to pay school-fees. In this way he thought it quite possible to provide, year after year, for the necessarily-increasing cost of education owing to the growing number of children attending the schools. That being so, probably this would be the largest reduction that would have to be made. He should support the Government's proposals with regard to capitation and school-age, on condition that a special allowance was made to smaller schools, so that they would not be injuriously affected. He should, however, not vote for the substitution of strict average for working average, nor for the total abolition of the normal schools.

Mr. HUTCHISON had waited all day and all night for some good reason to enable him to support the Government on this vote; but he was sorry to say that, though he had waited so long, he had waited in vain. He was sorry that the Government had afforded its supporters, and those who might have been its supporters on this occasion, so little ground for inclining to their side. The Government had backed and filled in a way that rather inclined to shake conviction, even where conviction was more rooted than it was in his case. The reduction of £26,000 was arrived at in some haphazard way by calculating it at one-eighth of the whole sum; but why it was an eighth instead of a seventh or a sixth they did not know. Then, in connection with that amount, they were told that the country schools were not to be closed. Now, he would like to ask the Minister how he proposed to preserve the country schools. As he understood it, the capitation allowance was calculated upon a certain attendance for the preceding period, and was paid to the Education Boards in the various districts, to be distributed by them as they thought proper. He was not aware that the Minister had any control over the administration of these funds, so as to say what schools should be kept open and what should not; and, consequently, it seemed to him that this was a mere delusion, a snare, and a mockery, and that the House had really no control whatever, in accepting such a proposal as this, over the money it was asked to grant. That ill-favoured parliamentary property known as the red-herring was disagreeably high in connection with the false trail which was sought to be brought over this question; for it was really, after all, an attempt to legislate by resolution now, after first of all having been attempted by Order in Council; and it was just as vain for a Minister, by way of resolution, to attempt to alter the Act as it had been for him to attempt to do it by Order in Council. He thought the Minister was probably convinced now that he made a very great mistake in advising His Excellency to put his name to what must admittedly be withdrawn now as a mistake. He was not sure that the House was doing its duty in passing over in silence that attempt at legislation by Order in Council. The words ought to be remembered by members, for it was not, as the Premier and the Minister of Education had said, merely an intimation to the Boards as to the amount of funds that would be available for the future, for that could have been done by circular, but this was an Order in Council: the words were, "It shall not be lawful for any teacher to retain or place on any roll any child of a less age than six years." That was a distinct assumption of legislative power, and no explanation could get rid of it. The position taken up under the Order in Council by the Minister was untenable, and he must retire from it in the same way that he would have to retire from the position in reference to this resolution. He had said he would not have the country schools closed: but he could not keep them open. The vote must be at so much per head, and the administration of it must rest with the Education Boards. There was no safety, therefore, except in voting against the proposal of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE had listened to the various speakers, but it seemed to him that a great many had simply dealt with details. There was a foundation to be considered, and it required far more consideration than had been given to it—namely, the yearly increase in the expenditure which was continually kept up. In 1877 we had 41,700 children at the schools, and nine years later, in 1887, we had 83,500 or something over. The number of scholars increased from three to four thousand every year, and that meant a yearly increase in expenditure of from £16,000 to £20,000. That was the amount with which they ought to deal, and by doing that they would be much nearer doing good than by merely dealing with the question in this small detail manner. Even supposing that they succeeded in saving £50,000 now, the colony would be in just the same position again in three or four years' time. Therefore consideration must be given to something deeper than was now proposed to the House. Another proposition which was made was that payment should only be made to the Fourth Standard, and one honourable gentleman suggested that the parents should pay a fee of 1s. 6d a week for every child above that standard. He thought it would be better to pay for it through the Customs at the rate of seven-twelfths of a penny. If the Government could see their way to postpone this question till next session, it would be more satisfactory to the greater proportion of honourable members, and certainly it would be more satisfactory to the country. He could not shut his eyes to the necessity for retrenchment, and he was afraid that if they went on borrowing, as it was proposed to do, for the next two or three years, they would then have to put a sum on the estimates to pay for finding some of those persons who were going about the world lecturing on the lost ten tribes, for by that time we should have borrowed all the money that the known tribes would lend us, and if we could not find another tribe we should have to go to the wall. We should not be in any better position at the end of the three years, and we should have to pay another £150,000 a year for interest on our national debt. These small propositions with regard to education were simply playing with the question, and if something better could not be done it would be better to leave things as they were until next session.

Mr. MOAT would not have risen to speak but for the statement of the Minister of Education, and which was repeated by other honourable members, that the Auckland Training College was a failure. From that he entirely dissented. The honourable gentleman seemed to have taken, as his ground for making that statement, certain remarks of Mr. Inspector Fidler in his report. No doubt that gentleman thought that if he had been elected Principal of the Training College he would have obtained better results. However, that was not the question. It must be remembered that the students of that college were not always allowed to remain there for two years before being sent to country schools. Some of them only remained for a few months, and those who had only been there for a short time were not likely to turn out as good teachers as those who had had the benefit of the full course. There was no doubt, also, that better results might have been obtained if there had been proper supervision over the Training College; but it must be borne in mind that members of Education Boards were not, as a rule, qualified to supervise institutions of that kind, and it would be better if greater supervision were exercised over them by the central department in Wellington. There was no doubt that sufficient time was not devoted in these training colleges to training students to teach, and it was rather spent in imparting higher education to them, the consequence being that they acted as feeders to the colleges, and very successful they were in that respect. But the operations of the Auckland Training College were not confined to training the twenty pupils of that college to whom reference had been made. For three days in the week the pupil-teachers within reach attended classes at the Training College and were instructed in their duties, and on Saturdays all the uncertificated teachers within reach attended it, and no less than 170 pupils attended those classes. Therefore he thought it would be very hard for any one to say that it had not done satisfactory work. And not only that, but through all the country schools where there were uncertificated teachers working up to pass their examinations they were obliged to correspond with the Principal of the Training College, and he corresponded with them and returned the papers they forwarded to him, after having examined and corrected them. That had been very beneficial in its results. If that college were done away with, where were they to get their teachers from? There were no less than 450 teachers who had not passed their examination at present employed in the schools of the colony, and, of these, no fewer than ninety were in the Auckland District; and unless there was some mode of training them he did not know what they should do for teachers. The Minister said the Government would take care that no country schools were closed, but that uncertificated old women would be sent to teach in these schools; and to that he, as representing a country district, most strongly objected. Instead of doing away with the colleges, they should try and assimilate the instruction with that given at the Training College in Dunedin. That would be a much better course to adopt than to abolish them altogether. The general question had been pretty well threshed out; but, as to the school-age part of it, it was interesting to find that the question engaged the attention of the ancient Greeks as many as two thousand years ago, and opinions on the subject differed then as much as they do now. As Professor Mahaffey justly said in his work on "Old Greek Education,"—

"The disputants never seem to take into consideration the fact that all children are not equally apt, and, while there are many whose education might with advantage commence at five, there are others whom it would be advisable to keep from school till they were a year or two older."

He believed it would be cruel to keep children from school who were in a position to receive education when they were five years old, particularly in country districts, where their services would be required by their parents as soon as they were able to work. He therefore could not consent to the Government proposal to raise the age from five to six. With reference to the strict-average question, he thought it would act very adversely indeed to the country districts, because wet weather and long distances prevented children from attending the country schools regularly. He could not support that proposal, but he could see his way to support the Government in reducing the capitation grant by 4s.

Mr. GOLDIE thought the Auckland people desired their members to come to Wellington pledged to reduce the vote for education by £100,000. He was asked to pledge himself to that reduction, but he could not see his way clear to so large a reduction being made. In connection with this subject he would read the following extract from an address delivered by Sir Hercules Robinson at the opening of the Wellington Normal School seven years ago:—

"I must confess that, when I contemplate the expenditure which primary education will entail on the general revenue so soon as the scheme at present established by law is brought into full operation, the prospect appears to me to be appalling. If the present system be maintained the colony will soon find itself face to face with an annual expenditure from the Public Treasury of from £400,000 to £500,000 upon primary education alone, exclusive of the cost of the Department of Education, and of the sums appropriated annually for higher and secondary education. This appears to me to be really a very serious consideration. The expenditure on primary education will soon amount to nearly £1 per head of the whole population, and the consolidated revenue alone will be quite unable to bear such a charge without considerable additions to the general public burdens. Of course, if the people of New Zealand desire education of this expensive class free, and are prepared to submit to the necessary taxation, there is an end of the matter; but I doubt whether the position we are drifting into in this respect has as yet been generally realised."

That was seven years ago; and to-day they found themselves face to face with the serious difficulty which Sir Hercules Robinson at that time prophesied. It was a very easy matter to talk of economy in the abstract, but it was very difficult to apply it. The Minister of Education had suggested four means by which this could be applied to some extent. On the question of school-age he would read the opinion of Dr. Macarthur, late Principal of the Auckland Training College, who, at a meeting of the Educational Institute held in Auckland on the 26th November last, spoke as follows:—

"Coming to the first question—that of raising the school-age on which capitation was paid—it was well to look to the example of other States. In England and Scotland children over the age of three were allowed to be considered in the returns. This would have been an argument against raising the school-age if the character of the work done excelled that with us; but the work of the New Zealand schools had been pronounced by those who had seen both to be far superior to that of the English primary schools. This showed that the earlier the age the worse the work done; so, on the principle of utility, they should not lower the school-age. In Germany, Belgium, and the United States the age of admission was six years, and in Switzerland six and a quarter; and yet the intelligence of these nations compared favourably with that of any other. If as good and probably better work could be done by those States whose limit of age was six years as by those with a lower limit, then surely the latter were paying for that which profited them not. Taking the last report of the Minister of Education they would find that 20 per cent. of the pupils in our primary schools were between the ages of five and seven years, and over 27 per cent. were in the preparatory classes. The age at which those preparatory children passed the First Standard was close upon nine years: that was, children admitted at five did not, on an average, pass till nine. Knowing the small quantity of work required for the First Standard, and the arduous nature of the teachers' work in these classes, it was plain that something was wrong. Either many did not come at the age of five, or, if they did, they were too young to profit by the tuition imparted. Considering, then, the inferior nature of the work done by those States which admitted at a low age, next the higher character of the work done by those whose limit of age was higher, and lastly the very long period between the age of five years (our admission-age) and nine years (the passing of the First Standard), he could not but come to the conclusion that, from the standpoint of utility and the greatest good to the pupils, the age for admission should be raised to six years."

That statement was verified by the fact that thirty-five teachers out of fifty voted with it.

even although they knew that voting that way meant to them a pecuniary loss. He found that there were 17,800 children between the ages of five and six, and 17,089 between the ages of six and seven, and certainly a considerable saving would be effected if those of the 17,800 who were attending the primary schools were kept out of them; but he thought their first duty was to reduce everywhere but in education, and as soon as reductions had been made to the fullest extent in other directions, but not till then, would he be willing to reduce the education vote. He was not prepared to go with the Minister, and those who were favourable to raising the school-age, and would therefore vote against it. As to the reduction of the capitation, he felt satisfied that £3 15s. would answer all purposes. Then, as to the abolition of Education Boards, he thought those who advocated that made a very serious mistake. If they abolished the Boards they could not do away with the clerks and others employed in that department, because correspondence would have to be answered, and other office-work attended to. If they abolished Boards, they must increase the work in Wellington, and they could not do it as effectively as it was at present performed. There was always a cry for decentralisation and local self-government; and the administration by Education Boards was local self-government of the best kind, because it was administration without local taxation—in all our other local government there was local taxation with it. It would be a very serious mistake to do away with Education Boards, because if they did their work properly they did very good work, and it would be no saving to abolish them. The work was done well, because a number of the School Committees came in contact with members of the Board with their grievances, and had them immediately redressed, whereas if they had to do everything by correspondence with Wellington they would not get their business done or their grievances remedied nearly so quickly or so effectually as at present. The idea that there would be a saving by abolition was a great mistake. He thought it would be wrong to take away capitation as soon as children had passed the Sixth Standard, because many who passed that standard were still very young, and he did not think they could be shut out from the schools legally till they were fifteen. In Auckland, however, there were far more pupil-teachers offering than were wanted—there were sometimes nearly a hundred waiting for engagements; and, to prevent themselves from rusting while waiting, they continued to attend the schools, so that they might be quite fresh for their work when employment came. He did not support the payment of capitation on that class: if they had passed both the Sixth Standard and the age of fifteen, and still wished to attend school, they should pay for themselves. It had been said by some honourable members that one-seventh of the community were suffering great hardship under the present system because their children could not attend our schools, and that an effort should be made to give them some assistance. But he believed that, as a matter of fact, that evil was less by a half than it was said to be, for he was convinced that about ten thousand children of Roman Catholic parents were attending the State schools. He arrived at that in this way: Of the rest of the community the children attending school were 22·73 per cent., while of the Roman Catholics only 10·45 per cent. were attending their own schools; so that, assuming that the proportion of children to adults was the same with Catholics as with Protestants, the rest attended the State schools, and that would be at least ten thousand. He knew a school in the Auckland District in which nearly all the children belonged to Roman Catholic parents, and therefore it could not be truly said that Catholic children were being kept out of our schools. If the Roman Catholics were given capitation allowance they would not be satisfied with that; for the New Zealand Tablet of the 11th November, 1887, says,—

“Mr. Pyke’s Bill does not propose to do us full justice, or place us on a footing of equality with the other taxpayers of the country. The Bill does not propose to give us building-grants or to allow our children to hold scholarships whilst attending Catholic schools. These are serious defects.”

This fact, and the fact that at least half the Catholic children were now attending Government schools, should not be lost sight of in considering this question. He would abolish the training-colleges, and thought it a great mistake that they had ever been established. In Auckland the Board had been receiving £2,000 a year for the college; and last week the Board had decided to ask the Government no longer to pay the £2,000 a year, but to pay £750 instead, to be used in another way. It had been said that these colleges offered facilities for the children of poor parents to get more education; but that was not the experience in Auckland. Dr. Macarthur, the Principal, had stated that during six years he had not received one young lady-pupil who had not passed the E examination and who was not therefore already qualified to be a teacher. Most of the pupils in the college were young ladies, and the college drew to it some of the best of the young teachers who were already teaching, and gave them an amount of theoretical teaching which did not prove of much practical value. He had lately met in Wellington a lady who had passed through the Auckland Training College, who told him that after being there a year, and going back to the school she had been at before, the headmaster told her she was very much worse than before leaving. It was all nonsense to say that the college took the children of poor parents and did them a great benefit: it simply took a number of young ladies and others who had passed the E examination, and gave them further training, at a cost to the State of £40 a year each, in addition to the actual cost of the instruction imparted. As he had said, they were nearly all ladies who passed through the college, and if they received any advantage from attending the college the State got very little benefit from it, for they usually married in a year or two after leaving the college, and left the service. The colleges should certainly be abolished, and, as an argument for this, he might mention that it had been found that those sent from the Auckland College to take charge of schools had worse results than those who had simply been educated in the country schools. Although he believed in raising the school-age, he could not support it at present, because he had pledged himself to support retrenchment in every other direction before this; but as to the other proposals of the Government he should support them.

Mr. MOSS said the real question before the Committee was, whether they should, under the pretext of altering the school-age, make some reduction in the amount voted for the education of the people. Though the Minister of Education had made a clear and interesting statement, going fully into the subject, it was manifest the honourable gentleman would have been more pleased if, instead of asking for authority to make a possibly small saving of a few thousand pounds in the education vote, he could have devoted himself to showing how the system could be improved—that would have been much more congenial to the honourable gentleman. It was unfortunate that at the end of the session they should be hurriedly discussing the education system, not with the view of improving it and putting it on a more solid foundation, but merely with the view of finding a pretext whereby to cut £15,000 off the vote—that was all that would be saved during the remainder of this year. It would be much better to say at once that this sum must be cut off than to waste time in seeking for a pretext under which to do it. He should not vote for the reduction, and he considered the question too large to touch in this way. There were those who had hoped that our education system would one day embrace free tuition not only in the primary schools but in the secondary schools. That was the object many had kept before them in the past, and it was with that object that the secondary-education reserves had been made. They wanted free education for all classes—there should be no talk of rich and poor in this House—first in the common schools, and afterwards in the secondary schools and the universities. Now that idea was going to be abandoned, not because the system of education was too expensive, not because it had proved to be inefficient, but because they had wasted the resources of the colony in other directions, and therefore they were called on to curtail on this pretext the work in which the colony was engaged.

Mr. FISHER.—Last session you said £100,000 or £150,000 could be saved on education.

Mr. MOSS said, to the General Treasury, yes; but not so long as the House takes on itself the education of the whole colony. If they would continue that responsibility, they must find the money to do it properly, and if they found the money they should take control of the whole affair, and abolish the Boards. The present hybrid system was wholly wrong; but the present was not the time to go into that question. As to raising the school-age, some children could very well attend school at five—it depended on the constitution and temperament of the child. In the United States the commencing school-age was in some States four—from four to twenty, starting with the kindergarten and ending at the university—free secondary schools and free universities. There the system was truly national, and that was what we should aim at. It was our first duty to educate the people, and it was shameful to say that we could not afford to educate our people—the first duty of a free State—when we could afford to borrow money for all kinds of luxuries. The training-schools had been said to be useless. If so, it was because we made an improper use of them. The use of these institutions was to train teachers to habits of patience, and to methods of teaching, rather than to impart knowledge. Training-schools were a necessity if we were to have good teaching. As to stopping at the Sixth Standard, he disagreed with that, for if we were to have a truly national system we must look forward to the secondary schools and universities being a continuation of the district schools. With much that the honourable member for Linwood had said he agreed—it was an excellent speech; but, when the honourable gentleman spoke of teachers appointed by the Government being free and independent of the School Committees, he made a mistake. A teacher who did not work with the School Committee would be so worried that he could not retain his position. The School Committees were an essential part of the system. They were the only real element of local government in the whole system. The Boards he had not the same regard for; and if there was to be a central system they were altogether out of place. If consideration of the question were left over until next session, the Minister would have time to go into it fully, and be able to come down with some proposals of a larger character, making, he hoped, the system a really local system, and relieving the General Government of much of the responsibility which now rested upon them; making the School Committees a great fact, and the Education Boards living powers, instead of mere surplusage as they were in present arrangements. The real object of this debate was to enable the General Government to spend less money; and how much did they expect to save this year? £10,000 or £15,000. Was it worth while to derange the whole system for the sake of that sum? Was it worth while to take action which would injure the one great institution upon which the whole future of the country depended? Surely it was better to let the matter stand over till next session, when the Minister would, no doubt, be prepared to come down and make it a matter of larger local responsibility and control.

Mr. MARCHANT said that the general feeling of the country, as expressed at the last election, was that the cost of education was heavier than it could afford, and that the country did not get value for its money; and he contended that the evidence taken by the Committee which had sat on the subject bore out the impression which people generally had formed. He thought that the thanks of the country were due to the Minister of Education for the proposals he had brought down. He could not say that he agreed with every one of the proposals, but he did approve of the economical spirit in which the proposals were framed. He was thoroughly in accord with the proposal to raise the school-age, especially in view of the pledge of the Minister that no country school should be closed. It was nothing but the dread of the country schools being closed that prevented the people from demanding that the school-age should be raised to seven years. As to reducing the capitation allowance by 4s., he had a little doubt as to whether it would be wise to make the reduction all at once. He should prefer to see it made in two instalments, believing that they could avoid embarrassing the Education Boards' finance in that way. He should be well pleased if the Minister of Education could see his way to modify his proposals in that matter. As to normal schools, he could not see why the teacher should be educated and trained at the expense of the State, any more than doctors, dentists, lawyers, or shoemakers. Therefore he was in accord with the proposal. But, as to the proposal to substitute strict average for working average, he must confess that he had some doubts as to its desirableness. He was afraid that in country districts where bad weather and bad roads formed a large factor in regulating the attendance it would have a very prejudicial effect upon the finances of the Board, especially where the Boards had but one borough within their boundaries, and many small schools—such a district as Taranaki, for instance. It would certainly lead to difficulty, and he should feel it to be his duty to vote against that proposal. With that exception he was thoroughly in accord with the proposals of the Minister. He did not think that there was the least fear that the cause of education would suffer by adopting them, and he maintained it was the real friends of education who were in favour of these reductions. He believed the time was not far distant when the Consolidated Fund would not be able to bear the whole of the charges that were cast upon it. Year by year they found the Government trying to relieve the Consolidated Fund. They saw the late Government relieving it of the charge of hospitals and charitable aid; and he found this year that the subsidies to local bodies were to be reduced, while other charges were also to be reduced, making a total reduction of £87,000—all at the expense of the road-making bodies. If the cost of education were not kept within moderate bounds, there would be soon an outcry against the system all over the country, which would imperil its existence. But it was not in regard to primary schools alone that he would like to see a reduction effected, but also in regard to the higher schools. He maintained that these schools were nothing but class schools, and they ought not to be kept up at the expense of the country. He hoped the Minister would during the recess devote his attention to this matter of secondary schools, and see whether he could not devise some plan for nationalising the reserves that were devoted to that purpose and putting the proceeds into a common fund; also for altering the system in such a way that children living in the country should be placed on the same footing as children living in the towns—that was to say, that entrance to these schools should be by scholarships.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES agreed with the honourable member who had just sat down, more particularly in reference to what he had said on the subject of secondary education. He thought that, if they educated children up to the Sixth Standard, that was all that was required to be done by the State. Children who showed an aptitude for the higher classes should receive extra tuition if their parents were able to afford it. He regretted that the honourable gentleman in charge of these estimates could not see his way to withdraw the vote under this head. It seemed to him a farce to attempt to take off £60,000, when at the same time they heard of a sum being proposed for defence amounting to £178,000, which was wholly unnecessary. He should content himself by simply stating that he should be compelled—and he much regretted it—to give his vote against the proposal.

Mr. ROSS said this question had been pretty well threshed out now, and he had been waiting for the last six hours to hear the division-bell. During the late election contest he had occasion to address several meetings, at which there was an expression of opinion by the electors with regard to this subject. The whole of the electors he met were in favour of a reduction in the school-allowance, but that the schools should be kept as they were. Many teachers with whom he had come in contact were quite in favour of reducing the capitation-allowance. He had read all the evidence taken on this subject by the Education Committee, and he had also read several publications on the subject. There was one, which had been published by the Educational Institute of Otago, which was well worthy the attention of every member of the House; but he would not detain the Committee by making any extracts from that work. He suggested the Minister should agree to allow the matter to stand over till next session.

Mr. FISHER said that, late as was the hour and long as had been the discussion, he felt it incumbent upon him to offer a few remarks upon the speeches which had been delivered in the course of the discussion. Many honourable members had been good enough to give their views upon what they believed to be the meaning of the Education Act and the intentions of its framers. It had been his advantage to have had a good deal of communication with those who framed the Education Act, and with those who composed the Ministry that passed it. He was in a position to say, from what they told him, that the original intention was that the State should pay only upon the compulsory ages—namely, from seven to thirteen years. There was a further point he wished to mention, and that was this: that a great deal of credit was given to a gentleman in this colony who was very justly regarded as an educational enthusiast, but who was regarded as the champion of the common-school system of this colony. He thought this an appropriate occasion upon which to mention that the author and champion of our present education system was Mr. Charles Christopher Bowen, the introducer of the Education Act, who had to encounter a good deal of opposition from Mr. Stout, who was a member of the House when the Bill was introduced in 1877. He (Mr. Fisher) claimed, himself, to rank as one of the strongest friends to the common-school system. The honourable member for Dunedin Central said it was premature to propose anything this session. It was open to any one to say that of any proposal. Some honourable members were as tenacious of their own opinions in regard to the particular mode to be adopted as were certain theologians in regard to their particular tenets. They would never recede one step in the attitude they took up. The honourable member for Dunedin Central said it was possible to reduce the cost of the education system by £100,000; but he was careful not to mention how this could be done. That honourable member also made some disparaging remarks in regard to Dr. Brown, who, in addition to being a medical man, was Chairman of the Education Board of Otago. He was bound to say that that gentleman was one of the keenest, ablest, and most powerful reasoners upon this question that he ever had the pleasure of listening to. One honourable member went so far as to say that Dr. Brown was a medical man, it was true, but that he was not an educational expert, and therefore was not a reliable authority. He was a University man, and was Chairman of the Otago Education Board, and, if these two qualifications did not entitle him to express an authoritative opinion upon this question, it was hard to say what would entitle any man to express an opinion. Now, the honourable member for Hawke's Bay had given them a great deal of valuable information in regard to this question, and had shown clearly how the system could be improved there. The only weakness in his whole argument was the statement that he hoped the Seventh Standard would not be done away with. He (Mr. Fisher) would undertake to say that not one man in a thousand in the colony knew anything of the existence of a Seventh Standard. He was the more surprised at the statement of the honourable member for Napier when he remembered that in the Hawke's Bay District, when the return for 1886 was made up, there were only twelve pupils who were in the Seventh Standard; while under the Otago Education Board there were some 221 pupils in the Seventh Standard. He undertook to say that, if the great mass of the people of the colony who had to pay for the maintenance of this system were aware of the fact, strong as they were for the maintenance of the Fifth and Sixth Standards, they would have a very strong objection to pay for the maintenance of the Seventh Standard; for the common impression of the mass of the people was that the State went far enough when it educated children as far as the Sixth Standard. He wished only to touch upon one or two points, notably those raised by the honourable members for Caversham and Dunedin East—of course the remark had been made by other honourable members, but he referred to those honourable gentlemen especially because they were aware of the evidence that had been given before the Committee. Both these honourable gentlemen said that the matter ought to be allowed to stand over till the next session. Now, he asked whether it was fair to the country that a matter like this, in which it was possible to effect great saving, should be allowed to stand over until next session, when three-fourths of the colony had spontaneously said that in this department it was possible for very considerable retrenchment to be made. The Provincial Districts of Auckland, Hawke's Bay, and Otago had said it was possible to carry on the education system, without impairing its efficiency, at a considerable reduction. The Education Board of Otago, before the proposals of the Government had assumed any definite shape, sent to the Government to say that they were prepared to effect reductions to the extent of £8,500 or £9,000. Were they to send back to these three Boards and say that they did not want the Boards to effect these reductions? He thought that to do that would be to put the Parliament, the Government, and the Education Department in a very ridiculous position. He should not reply to the remarks of the honourable member for Kumara. He was not surprised at a ripe and rare old Tory, such as the honourable gentleman was, making the remarks he had made with regard to the Seventh Standard, and the Civil Service being closed against the people. He did not think the Civil Service was a great goal to strive for, and he would take care that none of his boys, at all events, entered the Civil Service. The objection that if the children were not in school they would necessarily be in the gutters was a very strong and unwarrantable reflection upon the parents of the colony. He would not follow the discussion, but would say that, although it had been long, it had been legitimate and profitable. By "profitable," he meant that honourable members who had spoken had spoken with the legitimate object of contributing so far as they could to the stock of information upon the subject.

Mr. TAIWHANGA meant to speak on this question if he stayed a month to do it, as it was a great and important question. He had been concerned over the education question since 1876, when he gave a Bill to amend the Native School Act to Mr. Sheehan, who had probably put it under the table. He had even pleaded with the Governor himself about this question of education, which was the most important thing in the world, the foundation of all nations; but nothing had been done. The education of the Maoris was as nothing; but they should have the administration of their own land, and educate their own children. He did not blame the white people, but he blamed the Maoris themselves, for they had the matter in their own hands. They had the land, but if they let that slip they could do nothing. The Maoris did not get fair-play in this matter of education, and he would like to know what the result must be in fifty years. All the money that was being spent on Maori education was simply wasted. For twenty years money had been expended under the Native Schools Act, but no good had been done; the Maoris had not been educated—not so much as he had been—and he had only learned what he could himself.

Motion negatived. Therefore training colleges to be abolished.

Mr. GUINNESS moved a reduction of £2, as an indication that no more sums were to be placed on the estimates for higher education.

Mr. BRUCE regarded this as the most important motion that had been made that evening. It meant, if carried, that the colony was not prepared to continue this higher education of which so much had been heard. He felt strongly on this question, and he had given expression to that feeling on several occasions during last Parliament, and he was entirely in accord with the motion moved by the honourable member for Greymouth. The honourable member for Parnell, who, he was sorry to notice, was not in his place, had referred to the question of higher education in America. Probably he (Mr. Bruce) knew about as much of the United States as any honourable member in the House, and he knew that American opinion was strongly in favour of primary education, and not of higher education; and the most thoughtful men in America were in favour of abolishing higher education. The honourable member for Dunedin West said "No;" but he would point to a very much higher authority than even his honourable friend—Professor Smith, who thought it necessary to call the attention of the British Association to the American opinion of higher education. He believed the value of education was very much overrated. He believed if they gave children an opportunity of being educated up to the Sixth Standard they placed the key of knowledge in their hands, and any position in the colony was open to them. Some honourable members in Committee had given their own experiences. Let him cite his experience. He was nine years of age when his English education was completed. That was most of the education he had had; and, still, one of the most important constituencies of the colony had thought he was sufficiently educated to represent them in that Chamber. He thought that if they educated their children up to the Sixth Standard they had done all they ought to do.

Dr. FITCHETT asked that the question of higher education should be tested on its merits, which could not be done then, for they must have full information, and a reasonable time to consider it.

Mr. LEVESTAM was surprised at the Minister of Education, who wanted to reduce the expenditure on education, but wished to take it from the poorer classes. If the reduction were to begin with higher education, he would have supported him. He should vote against State support of higher education, as he had always done.

Mr. MCGREGOR moved to reduce the vote by £500.

Mr. ALLEN thought the Committee should pause before striking out this vote. He had been consistent in wishing for the reduction of expenditure; but, if they wished this colony to succeed, they must maintain the higher education. He was perfectly sure that the primary education would be perfectly useless in fitting the people of this colony for competition with the people of other nations, unless they had also the higher education. The tendency of public opinion in other countries was to make the higher as well as the primary education free; and, if we could afford it, he would be glad to see it free in this country also.

Mr. DUNCAN considered the honourable member for Dunedin East had been inconsistent in the votes he had given, because he had voted to reduce the primary education.

Mr. TANNER maintained that the education in the secondary schools, which consisted of instruction in the dead languages, statics, and hydrostatics, was not necessary to a boy who had to earn his livelihood by manual labour.

Mr. LEVESTAM also thought the honourable member for Dunedin East very inconsistent. If they made higher education free to all, he would agree with him; but, as it was at present administered, the system was simply a means of helping the rich at the expense of the poor.

Mr. ALLEN said he had voted in the manner he had done with respect to two of the questions affecting primary education in order to preserve the system, being afraid that public opinion would turn against the system and destroy it if it were too costly. He would be glad to see all education free, so that every child who had sufficient ability could obtain the higher education. It was by the education of the children of the poor—not pauper education, but a thorough education—that we should be enabled to maintain our position as a nation.

Major STEWARD said there would not be a single objection to this vote if the Minister proposed to devote it to scholarships obtainable by competition; and then the reproach, which now had a good deal of force, that money was voted to assist those who did not require it would be taken away.

Mr. DUNCAN thought that the honourable member for Dunedin East should endeavour to save higher education by reducing the expenditure upon it in the way he claimed to be defending the primary system from assault. The expenditure on secondary education was grossly extravagant, and would drag it down.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said there was the High School at Akaroa with ten children attending it, which cost £373 a year, or at the rate of £37 a head, although there was an excellent primary school in the neighbourhood. That was sufficient indication that they should put a stop to this system.

Mr. MARCHANT hoped that every Liberal member would vote for the reduction, not because there was any objection to higher education, but because of the way in which it was administered. These schools were simply class schools, and it was to that that the House and the country objected. If admission to them were by means of scholarships from the primary schools they would be welcome to everybody. If an opportunity were given of voting against the University system, he would vote in the same way as on this question, to show his disapproval of the administration.

Mr. HISLOP could not allow any person to say that he would lower the range of public education, primary or otherwise. The vote on primary education was beside this question, because no person voted on that to take away the advantages of the system from any child. It would have been a sufficient objection to the reduction in the vote had it been proved that it would impair the system; but everybody knew very well that nothing had been raised so much as the cost of primary education above what it was years ago. With regard to secondary education, he could not agree with the honourable member for Rangitikei that the popular opinion was against it in America. Every thoughtful mind there was in favour of it, and the fact of such a number of schools being opened there showed that the people were alive to the advantages of education. Honourable gentlemen quoted Goldwin Smith; but it was not to him they should go, but to the leaders of public opinion, who were advocating a liberal movement in education. If they read the books of Fisk and others of the same class, they would find that the chief way in which the system had grown up was through the idea that higher education should be spread more thoroughly among the people. As to the administration of the high schools, he could only suppose that, if honourable members were not satisfied with the administration, they might with reason change that system, but not take it away altogether. An honourable gentleman gave as one reason for objecting to these schools that they were class schools. Even if they were, he would support them, because there could be nothing worse growing up in the colony than an uneducated wealthy class.

Mr. TURNBULL.—Let them pay for it.

Mr. HISLOP said they were the very persons who would not pay for it; but it was an absurdity to say that secondary-school education was class education. The fees paid in this colony were about one-third of those paid at Home; and honourable members must see that by reducing the fees to a minimum they were opening the system to all classes, besides having a scholarship system which was largely used. Let any one take the list of those who obtained scholarships, and he would find that three out of four of those who were receiving secondary education were those who could not receive it if they had to pay heavily for it. He hoped the Committee would not strike out the vote.

Mr. LEVESTAM was surprised at the speech just delivered. Did the honourable gentleman call any one a Liberal who would tax the many for the benefit of the few, particularly when the many were poor and the few rich? The honourable gentleman said the cost of primary education was higher than it was years ago; but of course it would increase as the number of children increased. As to the cost of secondary education being only one-third of that which it was at Home, that was just what they complained of, inasmuch as those who sent their children to those schools only paid a small amount of the cost, and the poor people had to pay the rest. Although the honourable member for Dunedin East said that the colony could not afford the cost of education, he was ready to vote for higher education and against primary education. And then he said his district did not benefit by this vote as much as others! He was surprised at the honourable gentleman.

Mr. R. THOMPSON thought that this was the most sensible amendment proposed that night, and was surprised at the Colonial Secretary saying that the wealthy people of the colony would not pay for the education of their children. He thought better of them; but he felt satisfied, from the way in which higher schools were conducted, that the primary education was injured by those schools. The colony was not in a position to carry on high schools at present, and therefore he would vote for the amendment.

Mr. Levestam

Mr. SEDDON said he found from the return that there were eighty-three children attending high schools under ten years of age, and 1,191 between the age of ten and fifteen, making 1,274 children under the present school-age attending the secondary schools, which were costing the colony something like £90,000 a year.

Mr. BRUCE did not want to be misunderstood on this question. The colony could not afford to educate children in the way many would wish, and he believed that higher education was given almost entirely to the children of the wealthy classes, and it was given in the towns. To what extent could children of the poor in the country take advantage of these high schools in the towns? He thought that not more than one child in seven ever came to the towns for this education, and they were not the children of poor parents. The consequence was that they were giving the children of the wealthy high education, and the poor were paying for it.

Mr. DUNCAN said on every platform of the colony it had been stated that the higher-education system had been mismanaged. The district he came from furnished a good sample of the mismanagement of the system. The expense of higher education in that district was a shame to them. There was no doubt whatever that the whole thing would be swept away were some alteration not made.

Dr. FITCHETT recognised a great deal of force in the charges levelled against the high schools. They were in a great measure class schools, and children attended them who ought not to be there, but who should be in the primary schools. Did the Committee recognise this: that if it took away this grant it would absolutely shut out higher education from poor children? Let the system be looked into and reformed, but let it not be killed.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the vote, £360,624, be reduced by £2."

Motion agreed to, as indicating the wish of the Committee that the cost of higher education should be reduced.

Mr. FITZHERBERT moved, That the vote for Native schools be reduced by £1, to indicate the desire of the House that the children of both races should be put on an equal footing with regard to education. At present the cost of education in the case of a European child was £4, while a Maori child cost £10.

Major ATKINSON said if these Native schools were to be swept away the Maori children would be deprived of education.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE thought that economy might be exercised in the Native schools. In his own district it had cost £182 to educate six children at the Native school, of whom four had passed. There was a school at Riverton where the education of a child had cost £100.

Mr. KELLY hoped the motion would be withdrawn, and that it would be left to the Government to effect whatever economy they could in this department.

Mr. BUCHANAN said there were three Native schools carried on very successfully in his district, and the children of both races received instruction at these establishments. He hoped the motion would be withdrawn, and that the discussion would be accepted by the Government as an indication that economy should be effected in this and other directions.

Mr. FISH thought it would be quite impossible to put Maori and European children on exactly the same level in the matter of education.

Mr. MOAT would support the vote, because a great deal of good was being done by these schools. The honourable member for the Northern Maori District said the money was being thrown away; but possibly he might have been thinking of past times. At one time that honourable member was a teacher in a Native school at Kaikohe; and in 1879 the report of the Inspector of Schools on that school was as follows:—

"For all practical purposes this school has no existence. I found the teacher absent, and he had been absent for weeks. The school, during his absence, was supposed to be carried on by his wife; but school had not been held for some time. This teacher is in receipt of an allowance for boarders. At present they number only ten, half of whom are his own children. These ten, of whom one was a European boy, mustered, and I found that not one of them could read such words as 'dog,' 'cat,' &c.; nor could they do the simplest sum in addition. The building in which the school is supposed to be held is little better than a ruined shanty, originally belonging to the teacher, since sold. It is now occupied as a schoolhouse only on sufferance. There is a large Native population at Kaikohe, which is a flourishing settlement; and were a school built here, and a competent teacher appointed, the attendance would be numerous. The Natives here, as elsewhere, recognise the necessity of a school, and are willing to grant land for that purpose. In the event of a new school being built, and another teacher being appointed, I should judge the attendance would not be less than forty."

If the money was spent now as it was then, the honourable member might be justified in saying that it was thrown away; but he (Mr. Moat) thought the system had been entirely changed, and knew it was producing good results.

Mr. R. THOMPSON thought these Native schools should be placed under the Education Boards, and then the abuses would soon be got rid of, the abuses now being due to the central management.

Mr. BRUCE would protest in the strongest manner possible against reducing the vote. All the reasons given for educating the youth of the European population applied with even greater force to the Natives. If the Native children were educated, in a few years they would be able to transact their own business, and not be in the future, as unfortunately they had been in the past, at the mercy of a few pakeha-Maoris, who had a monopoly of communication with them. However possible it might be theoretically to place both races on the same footing as to education, it was premature to do so now; but keeping on this vote would hasten the time. He looked forward to the day when all of both races would be placed on the same level; but in many districts now it was impossible to educate both races together, because there were no Europeans there, and therefore it was a matter of necessity to have purely Native schools. He hoped the vote would not be reduced by a penny.

Mr. FITZHERBERT said his object was to give the Maoris a better education. The honourable member for the Eastern Maori District had told them that he had been working for it for years—that he wanted the Maoris to be placed on the same footing and to have as good an education as the Europeans, their present education being very bad. As it was now, the money was nearly all wasted. What he (Mr. Fitzherbert) wished was that the House should convey an intimation to the Government that the Maori children should get a better education at less cost, and that, as far as possible, the Maoris should be placed on the same footing in regard to education as the Europeans. Even in purely Native districts Maori schools could be worked on the same system as the schools for white children. He objected to the waste of money on the present system, and wished the House to show the Government that it desired the matter should be taken into consideration during the recess, and prudently revised.

Major ATKINSON said the honourable gentleman might have known from the promises of the Government that they would carefully deal with this department as with all others. At first the honourable gentleman told them he wanted to strike off the whole vote, but now he said he only wanted to convey an intimation to the Government as to what should be done hereafter.

Mr. CARROLL hoped the proposal for reduction would not be carried. His reason for wishing that was the same as that of the proposer for wishing that it should be carried. That honourable gentleman said the Maoris should be put on the same footing as Europeans. The only way to attain that was by educating the Maoris. There were several districts in the North Island in which there were no European schools or European children, and in such districts schools must be provided for the Native children. Of course the honourable gentleman was perfectly right in speaking about the Hutt or Wellington, or any place where the European population was in excess of the Native population. In all such places the Native children would be much better educated by going to the European schools, which they did in many cases; and he knew also many cases of European children going to Native schools, because there were localities in which there were very few European children and a large number of Natives, and there that was the only means the European children had of being educated. He did not think the proposed reduction would bring about any difference at all, but he would say that it was the duty of the House to let the Maoris have as much education as they possibly could have, considering that the Natives had been very unselfish in the past in the matter of providing for education. In nearly every district in the North Island there were large and valuable reserves given years ago by the Maoris. How they had been administered since was another question, but the Maoris gave them solely for the purpose of education, and now the House should act in the same spirit. He hoped the honourable gentleman would not press his amendment, but that the Government would consider the matter during the recess, as the Premier had promised.

Mr. FITZHERBERT said that, at the request of the representatives of the Native race, in whose interests he had brought this matter forward, he would withdraw the motion, and be content with the assurance that the Government would consider it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. FITZHERBERT would like to draw the attention of the Committee to the industrial schools. They cost the country a great deal of money, and were not conducted in a proper manner. The sentiment was that young criminals should not be sent to gaol, because they would herd with older criminals and learn things which would make them worse instead of better. But, judging by the Kohimarama institution, the schools were not working well. The children there were entirely neglected, received little education and no technical education whatever, and no control was exercised over them. The elder boys went without leave about the streets of Auckland, picked up all kinds of wickedness, and then went back and made the younger children as bad as themselves. The last report of the Inspector showed that twenty-seven boys had been absent without leave, and no doubt they were in the worst dens in Auckland that could be found. The other day, when in Court here, he heard the Resident Magistrate send a couple of little girls and a boy to the industrial school. The children had been brought up respectably, and it struck him what a pity it was to send them to such a place. At these schools the children learned nothing, and when they came out they were worth nothing to society.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN.—No.

Mr. FITZHERBERT said he was speaking specially with reference to Kohimarama. The children there did not make their own beds or wash out their own things. They were kept in perfect idleness. It would be much better to devote a wing of the Central Prison to the purposes of a reformatory, and teach the boys trades. He moved, That the vote be reduced by £1.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN said the honourable member for the Hutt was altogether unacquainted with the position of affairs. When he stated that the industrial schools were a failure he stated what everybody who had studied the subject knew to be thoroughly incorrect. Being well acquainted with the Burnham School and the school in Otago, he could say that no better work could be done than was done there. The children were restrained from vice, and were taught to be useful members of society. The honourable member was wholly misrepresenting the industrial schools.

Mr. FITZHERBERT said he had been talking of the Kohimarama School, where he was two years ago.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that any honourable members who were acquainted with the facts of the case as regards these schools would be aware that the statements of the honourable member were very wide of the mark.

Mr. MARCHANT said that he had been told that destitute children, even if they were not criminals, were sent to these schools to mix with those who had been sent there for their crimes or vice. If this was so he hoped the Government would look into the matter, and apply a remedy to such an undesirable state of affairs.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Minister of Education whether, now that the general average had been reduced to strict average for the purpose of computing capitation, the Government would carry out their pledge that no country school should be closed in consequence of the change. He said that the Premier gave them an assurance that if the proposals were carried there should not be a country school closed.

Mr. FISHER said the position was perfectly clear. The representation was that in consequence of raising the school-age there was a risk of some of the country schools being closed. The school-age had not been raised, and therefore the Government was relieved of all responsibility in connection with the assurance.

Mr. GRAHAM very much regretted the statement of the honourable gentleman. It was distinctly understood that if the proposals of the Government were carried in globo no country schools should be closed, and on the strength of that promise he had voted in a direction which he would not otherwise have voted.

Mr. MARCHANT thought there would not be much risk of any country school being closed.

Mr. SEDDON left it to the Committee to say whether the Minister of Education was keeping faith with them. The Minister gave the Committee the assurance that, no matter what might occur, no country school should be closed.

Mr. FISHER said he had stated nothing of the sort. What he had said was, that if the proposal of the Government were assented to by the Committee they would undertake that no country school should be closed. That proposal had been rejected, and of course that arrangement had been upset.

Mr. FITZHERBERT said, after the first division on the four questions the Minister of Education in the lobby gave him an assurance that the country schools would not suffer.

Mr. FISHER hoped the House would not hold him responsible for the honourable member's romances.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was as much interested in the question of country schools as anybody, and he was quite satisfied that the Government would not see the country schools suffer. The whole point was as to the management of the Education Boards, for the matter would be in the hands of the Boards; and, as a member of an Education Board, he could say that the Boards were in the hands of the country School Committees, for if they chose to exert their power they had the voting-power as against the towns, and in that case could enforce an equal division of the funds at the disposal of the Boards. This being the case, the argument that had been brought forward seemed to entirely fall to the ground.

Mr. DUNCAN said that the honourable member for the Wairapa had just missed the point. In a district like the West Coast they might call all the schools country schools. It was quite different where there were big towns, like Wellington and Christchurch. A district like the West Coast would be very seriously affected by only having strict average, whereas it would not make much difference to the other districts.

Mr. FISHER was very sorry to find that the honourable member had voted under a misapprehension; but he would say this to the honourable gentleman: that in future divisions, if he wanted to understand what effect his vote would have, he should go to the Government and ask them that question.

Mr. ANDERSON thought it was the duty of the Minister in charge to inform him. It was not his place to run after such information.

Mr. SEDDON said he could take the opportunity of reviewing the vote by moving an amendment now, but he did not think that was the proper course. He would rely upon the Ministers considering the situation, and the manner in which the votes had been given. The understanding, even though it might have been a misunderstanding, upon which the votes had been given ought to be considered by the Ministers, and a promise ought to be given that country schools should not suffer.

Mr. FISHER said the Government had given up the reduction which would have affected the country schools.

Dr. FITCHETT was very much surprised to hear this. He understood a pledge had been given to the Committee, and that that pledge was not now to be carried out. Was that so? It seemed to him a most extraordinary thing. When the Minister of Education brought down four specific proposals, he understood the Minister to state that, whatever the result might be, he gave an assurance that the country schools should not suffer.

Mr. FISHER.—The principal one has been defeated.

Dr. FITCHETT said the Minister of Education gave no indication that No. 1 proposal was to be the principal one, or that the country schools depended on No. 1. Each stood on its own bottom.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE said the Minister of Education was perfectly free to carry out what he had indicated. He proposed that £26,000 should be saved by raising the school-age from five to six years. A number of honourable members had voted against that proposal, and now they seemed to be most solicitous that the country schools should not suffer. How could they expect that they would not suffer when the proposal to save that amount had been negatived? He understood the promise that they should not suffer to apply to this proposal, and that the understanding was that no schools should be closed in consequence of the raising of the school-age.

Mr. R. THOMPSON understood that, when the Minister of Education gave the pledge that the schools should not suffer, that pledge had reference to the raising of the school-age; and before voting on the question he had taken the precaution of asking the Minister whether, if he voted to increase the school-age, the Minister would undertake that the country schools should not suffer; and a distinct pledge was given on that.

Mr. FERGUS said that all the reduction the Committee had made amounted to £34,000, and the Otago Education Board in a communication had shown that they would, without closing a single school or reducing the salary of a teacher, be able to strike off one-fourth of that amount.

Mr. LEVESTAM quite understood that in large centres that could be done, but the case was different in the smaller districts.

Mr. KELLY thought they might leave this question to the Minister of Education. He would not be anxious to see the schools closed, and they might vote at once on the question.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN would agree to that, if the Minister would assure them that he would endeavour to prevent any school being closed.

Major ATKINSON thought they might take it for granted that the School Boards would do their duty, as they had always done hitherto. He took it that, if they did not do their duty, the Government would have to come to the House and provide some remedy. He believed the Committees had given the Boards ample means to carry on all the services in connection with education; and, as he had said, he believed that the Boards would do their duty. Honourable members should recollect that the Government were quite as much interested in the education system as were any members of the House. They had made provision which experience told them would be ample, and he thought they might very well close the debate on the clear understanding that the Boards would do their duty. If they did not, it would, of course, be for the Government to step in.

Dr. FITCHETT could not understand the attitude taken up by the Government; and, for one, he must protest against it. During the debate he had raised this objection to each of the proposals of the Government: that, so long as human nature was human nature, so long would the Boards supply the town schools with everything that was requisite, leaving the country schools unprovided for, because the latter could rely on the Government. He ventured to say that few members of the Committee understood, when voting on the second or third amendment, that the country schools were imperilled in any way. He, for his part, fully understood that the Government were pledged that country schools should be maintained. To say now that it was to be left to the Education Boards was little better than a breach of faith.

Major ATKINSON said it was generally agreed that the Boards could effectually carry on their duties with the votes which had been passed, the only exception being the honourable member for Kumara, who thought that it would be better to reduce the school-age than to make an alteration in the average, as this would affect his district most. There was no misunderstanding about the matter at all; but he would point out that, when these resolutions were reported to the House, there would be another opportunity of dealing with them. The Government were of opinion that the capitation given to the Boards was ample to maintain the schools; but, if it should turn out that it was not so, it would be necessary to take some other measures. And honourable members should consider the difference between the position now and that when the resolution was first brought before the Committee. If they had reduced the school-age the country schools no doubt would have lost, and the Government would have had to make up the difference. But now the Education Boards had all they required to carry on their duties, and the House would take care that they managed their affairs properly.

Vote, £360,617, agreed to.

CLASS X.—DEFENCE.

Vote, £178,095.

Mr. SEDDON would ask the Minister of Defence to look very carefully for the torpedoes which had been lost; and it would be well also for him to have an examination made of the fort at Ngauranga. He was given to understand that every time a gun was fired there it was necessary to shut the magazine-door, and there was great danger of the whole fort being shaken to the ground. He had heard also that there had been the greatest mismanagement with regard to the hydraulic gun, and that its range was only about one-third of a circle, so that a shot from it could not hit a vessel coming in from the Heads. Again, he understood that in making the tramway to the magazine the rails were put down at a certain distance apart, but when the carriages came out it was found that the wheels were much wider apart.

Mr. FERGUS said he would look carefully into the whole matter.

Mr. KELLY thought that very large reductions might be made in this vote. The reductions he would suggest were these: There was a sum of £33,533 down for Permanent Militia, and £10,000 might very well come off that; then there was £44,191 for Volunteers, and £10,000 might very well come off that; then there was £101,303 for police, and that might very well be reduced by £20,000. He would therefore move, That the vote be reduced by £40,000.

Mr. FERGUS said the honourable member could not reduce the vote by anything like that amount. Ten months of the year had passed already, and these estimates represented the pay of the police and the Permanent Militia and the capitation to Volunteers, all of which money was absolutely pledged. If the honourable gentleman looked at the first page of the estimates he would see that the Government proposed a reduction of £46,000 in this vote from the previous estimates; and that, surely, was as much as he could expect.

Mr. DUNCAN asked if the Minister would explain in what direction this reduction was to be made.

Mr. FERGUS said the intention was to reduce as gradually as he possibly could the permanent force employed and the older officers in the department. He would also have to reduce the capitation to Volunteers, which vote had doubled itself during the last few years. While recognising the efficiency of the Volunteers, the Government could not close their eyes to the fact that they could not keep up this large expenditure at the present time; and it was also intended to make some change in the police without impairing their efficiency in any shape.

Major STEWARD called attention to a sum for a Rifle Branch of the permanent force. He would like to know whether that was the same thing as the Armed Constabulary.

Mr. FERGUS said it practically was so.

Major STEWARD thought that all the colony needed in the shape of a rifle corps could be supplied by the Volunteers. He could understand the Permanent Artillery and Engineer corps being maintained, but not a permanent rifle corps.

Mr. LEVESTAM would like to know whether it was the intention of the honourable gentleman to keep up the charge of £700 a year for the commanding officer, General Whitmore. Then, there was an Assistant Surgeon to the Permanent Militia. No doubt this gentleman was in private practice, and he would ask whether it would not be cheaper to pay him fees than to keep him on a permanent salary.

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Minister if he would give a little more information with reference to his intention regarding the Volunteers. Was the proposed reduction in the capitation allowance to be a reduction of amount, or was a distinction to be made in favour of corps in the centres of population?

Mr. FERGUS said it was the intention of the Government to reorganize the service. He could not be expected to state what was the intention with reference to one individual officer. In answer to the honourable member for Waitotara, he might say that the whole question of the reorganization of the Volunteer Force was before the Government at the present time, and, while they wished to get rid of all corps so far removed from the centres of population as to be practically valueless, nothing would be done that would impair the efficiency of the Force.

Mr. FITZHERBERT asked if it was the intention to do away with the Rifle Branch of the Force. Really the only useful men in the service were the Permanent Artillery and the Torpedo Corps. The office of Assistant Surgeon at Auckland struck him as being an extravagance.

Mr. WALKER hoped the Minister would not revive the invidious distinction between town and country corps. He trusted, however, the Government would reorganize the service.

Mr. KELLY asked leave to withdraw his amendment. He begged to move in place of that amendment a motion, That the vote be reduced by £5,—as an indication of the wish of the House and the country that a reduction should be made in the large vote for Permanent Militia, Volunteers, and Police.

Mr. FERGUS hoped the honourable gentleman would not press his amendment. The Government had pledged themselves to make reductions, and it was their intention to reduce expenditure largely in this department.

Mr. Kelly's amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Dr. FITCHETT was not satisfied with the assurance of the Minister. He particularly objected to the item, "Assistant Surgeon, £225." That was a purely honorary position. He moved, That the vote be reduced by £225.

Mr. FERGUS said that most of the salary of this officer for the year had been paid. He submitted that the Committee ought to accept the assurance of the Government that they would make reductions in this department.

Dr. Fitchett's amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Vote, £178,095, agreed to.

CLASS VI.—NATIVE AFFAIRS.

Vote, £16,878.

Mr. DUNCAN hoped the Government intended to do away with the Native Affairs Department altogether.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Government would gradually work it right out.

Vote, £16,878, agreed to.

CLASS IX.—PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND DOMAINS.

Vote, £28,109, agreed to.

CLASS XIII.—STATE FORESTS AND AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Vote, £5,611.

Mr. MONK was very glad that the Government had abolished the department in the form in which it previously existed, and he thought the Government had acted very wisely in doing so. Under the new order of things he trusted that the forests of the colony would be preserved in a more satisfactory and efficient manner than had been the case in the past.

Mr. BRUCE thought they ought to look on this question in the first place from a conservation point of view, and that there should also be appointed in connection with it a department that would point out what trees could be introduced from other countries with advantage. Large tracts in the colony were now lying waste, which might be utilised by planting them with trees.

Major ATKINSON said the Government hoped to provide a better plan than the present one for the conservation of forests. The work would be under the Lands and Mines Department, and would not only be better conducted, but would also save expense.

Mr. ANDERSON thought it would be a mistake to abolish the Forest Department wholly, and leave all that was to be done in the matter of forest-planting and -conservation to the local bodies. He knew that in the South many thousands had been spent uselessly owing to want of knowledge in regard to tree-planting. Then, the utmost care was needed to preserve forests from accidental destruction and losing by fire in a few hours what it had taken centuries to produce. In the Wakatipu district last year, for instance, no less than two thousand acres of valuable bush had been destroyed by one fire. It was necessary that those who undertook the work of forest-planting should have the necessary knowledge and proper guidance; and much knowledge was required for proper forest-conservation. He thought that the Government, in the interest of the colony, should be responsible for the requisite measures for forest-conservation, and, though it might not be necessary to continue the Forest Department as it was at present, still he thought the services of a specialist should be continually retained.

Mr. MONK thought the statements of the last speaker were the best evidence of the need for change. That the forests were being destroyed while there was such an expensive Forest Department in existence was sufficient proof that that department was inefficient. As a matter of fact more valuable forests had been destroyed by fire during the last two years, while the Forest Department had been existent, than could be replaced in the next hundred years at the rate we were now going on. Was it not folly to use public money, as was stated in the forestry report, for the purpose of "fadding" over young kauri? Surely they know nothing of kauri-growth who could thus write of a "kauri nursery," thinking it worthy of a place in the national forestry report. Then, there had been great and useless expense gone to over wattle-planting; but if wattle-growing needed to be developed it should be done by encouraging private people to do it. Some preventive measures were required to keep such valuable forests as we possessed from being wantonly or carelessly destroyed, and for replacing such as were destroyed, and he hoped the Government would try to adopt some means by which the forests now growing, the beautiful forests of the country, should be protected from the devastation which was continually wasting them.

Vote, £5,611, agreed to.

First Readings—Third Readings—Land Bill—Standing Orders—T. K. Tairāroa—Government Railways Bill—Otago Central Railway Extension and Construction Bill—Pukekohe Borough Bill—Wairarapa North County Council Empowering Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Fisheries Conservation Bill, Public Reserves Sale Bill, Tamaki West Licensing District Bill.

THIRD READINGS.

Otago Harbour Board Bill, Wairarapa North County Council Empowering Bill.

LAND BILL.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS brought up the following report of the Free Conference on the Land Bill:—

"The Managers of the Free Conference on the Land Act Amendment Bill have the honour to report that they have come to the following agreement: That original clause 33 be erased; that original clause 34 stand part of the Bill; that new clause 34 be erased; that the following new clause be added to the Bill: 'Sections thirty-six to forty-one, both inclusive, of the said Act shall remain in force until the termination of the next session of Parliament, and no longer.'

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I move, That the Council agree with the report. In doing so, I wish to explain that the arrangement come to is this: that the elective clause has been struck out; that clause 34 of the original Bill, limiting travelling-expenses, has been restored; and the Conference also came to the determination to recommend that the existence of the present Boards should be limited to the end of next session of Parliament. I may say that this is a compromise, of course. The House desired the elective principle; but the Council did not. The Council desired to have no Boards at all; and it is considered that, under all the circumstances, the proposals of the Managers are a fair arrangement to come to, and of course they leave the matter in this position: that it is necessary that the subject shall be dealt with before the end of next session. I trust the Council will accede to my motion, and be satisfied with the arrangement made.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he did not know when the Standing Orders under which the business of the Council was conducted were determined upon, but it must have been many years ago, for in the course of time a great many inconsistencies had cropped up in them; and, in fact, in one or two instances some of the Standing Orders themselves had become dead-letters. He need not remark on the fact that the Standing Orders ought never to be allowed to become dead-letters; and that when this was the case they should be removed from the book of Standing Orders. He referred to the Standing Order which related to honourable gentlemen sitting with their hats on. Since the time of Sir John Richardson this had been departed from. This was an illustration of the fact that some alteration of the Standing Orders was absolutely called for. He might also refer to the confusion which existed among the Standing Orders themselves. Any honourable members who were not in the habit of consulting the Standing Orders had no idea of the extent of this confusion. The Hon. the Speaker had himself referred, in a recent ruling, to the confusion which existed in the Standing Orders, and which made a ruling on his part very difficult. It was evident that the Standing Orders should be as clear as possible, and in unison with each other; and it was with that object he brought forward this motion. If the Standing Orders were not clear the matters brought before Parliament for its deliberation could not be properly considered.

Motion made, and question put, "That the Hon. the Speaker be requested, with the assistance of the Clerk of the Council, to pre- pare during the recess such a revision of the Standing Orders as he may deem necessary, with a view to submitting the same for the consideration of the Standing Orders Committee early next session."—(Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.)

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the SPEAKER supposed that he might be allowed to rely on the assistance of the honourable the mover of this resolution in performing the duties which had been placed upon him.

T. K. TAIAROA.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA, in moving the resolution standing in his name, said he need not say very much on the subject, because the report of the Committee spoke for itself.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the report of the Native Affairs Committee upon Petition No. 92, of Tini Kerei Taiaroa, be agreed to."—(Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.)

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER moved, That the debate on the motion be adjourned till next day. He had been very busily engaged, and had not had time to read the report in question.

Debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—When we were discussing this question yesterday the Hon. Mr. Reynolds made a proposition that members of the Legislature should be secured free passes on the railways, and that they should not be asked to trust to the Commissioners to grant them free passes. I was not prepared to accept this proposition, but I said I was content to take the decision of the Committee on the voices, and the Committee decided in favour of the proposition. That being decided, I then promised to draw a proviso to be added to the Bill securing that provision. In pursuance of that promise, I have done so, and I propose now to add a proviso to section 36, providing that every member of the General Assembly shall be entitled to receive from the Commissioners and hold for his own use, so long as he continues a member of the Legislature, a free pass authorising him, but no other person, to travel free on all the railways vested in the Commissioners. I propose, therefore, to move, That the Bill be recommitted, with a view to reconsidering clause 36 and adding a proviso.

The Hon. Mr. LAHMANN.—I would remind honourable gentlemen that hitherto it has also been customary to allow members of the Legislatures of the neighbouring colonies free passes.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER was understood to say that the Commissioners would have power to deal with that matter.

Bill recommitted, reported with amendments, and read a third time.

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY EXTENSION AND CONSTRUCTION BILL.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER moved, That this order of the day be discharged from the Order Paper.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I think it would be interesting to the Council to know the object of the Hon. the Attorney-General in pursuing this course. As we know, there are generally three classes of engineers to whom the construction of railways is intrusted. There is the working engineer, who undertakes the construction of railways; the financial engineer, who undertakes the finances of the railway; and the legislative engineer, who undertakes the legislative conduct of the business. Some of the remarks of the honourable gentleman would probably lead us to believe that my honourable friend had undertaken to discharge the functions of the legislative engineer in connection with this matter. Some understanding, I see, has been arrived at, according to the newspapers, between my honourable friend and the promoters of this work; and I think we are entitled to expect the honourable gentleman to inform us on what grounds it is now intended to withdraw this Bill. We should like to know whether the Hon. Mr. Oliver, who takes such a deep interest in this matter, is supporting the Government in the action they are taking. I hope my honourable friend will accede to my request for some information with respect to the course that has been proposed.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—All the information I possess I shall be happy to give the honourable gentleman. As for the Government, it was an open question with us, and it was understood that Ministers should be at liberty to act on their own opinions. The consequence was that in the other House the Bill was supported by two or three Ministers, and opposed by others; and when it came up here I reserved to myself the right to act as I thought fit, without binding the Government. Therefore it was that I gave notice, on the second reading, to move certain resolutions. No arrangement on the part of the Government has been come to with the promoters of this Bill. All I promised was that, if it was not proceeded with further this session, I would sketch out what my view was of the subject; and I said that, so far as I was concerned, I would support that view, assuming that it was satisfactory to those who were promoting the railway. The Government are not committed in any way whatever to the passing of any measure, and no arrangement has been made between the Government and the promoters.

The Hon. Mr. HART.—The honourable gentleman who moved the second reading of this Bill having made a statement to the effect that the Manawatu Railway Company, at a very small cost, effected the reclamation of very valuable property in the neighbourhood of this city, I thought it desirable to ascertain the facts of the matter, because I am sure my honourable friend would not like an erroneous impression to go abroad. The secretary of the company has furnished me with a statement showing that the company paid for the land over which the railway passes £16,000; they have reclaimed eighteen acres of land, at an expense of £1,400 per acre, or £39,200 in all; so that, in point of fact, the land was not obtained at a nominal price.

Bill discharged.

Hon. Mr. Waterhouse

PUKEKOHE BOROUGH BILL.

The Hon. Mr. DIGNAN moved, That the Hon. the Speaker do leave the chair in order that the Council may go into Committee on the Pukekohe Borough Bill.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR said he should be glad if the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill would give the Council some reason why the Municipal Corporations Act should be departed from in this instance. On the motion for the second reading of the Bill he did not hear what the special reason was for departing from the principle laid down in the Municipal Corporations Act. He thought the Council ought to be careful before taking such a step as was proposed in this Bill. If the law were departed from in this instance the Legislature would have next session a large number of applications from small towns for the power to form themselves into boroughs, and he thought that the effect of that might be disastrous to the country. Parliament had given boroughs large powers of borrowing, and by multiplying the number of these small boroughs they would be running great risks. He thought the honourable member should show some exceptionally good reason why the Council should depart from the principles laid down in the Municipal Corporations Act.

The Hon. Mr. DIGNAN asked that the report of the Local Bills Committee should be read.

The CLERK read the report of the Local Bills Committee on this Bill. The Committee reported that the Standing Orders had been complied with, and recommended that the Bill be allowed to proceed, with certain amendments.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN said that naturally the Committee would allow the Bill to go on, and leave the question of policy to be decided by the Council. In the Municipal Corporations Act Parliament did away with town districts, and when the last amendment of the Counties Act was before the Legislature they took away the power of one portion of a county dividing itself from another. In fact, the Legislature had been going exactly in an opposite direction to that in which this Bill sought to go. If they allowed this Bill to pass they would have a sheaf of Bills next session such as would alarm honourable members; and, if they allowed this Bill to pass, how could they refuse other Bills? He hoped the honourable member would withdraw the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE might state that the Local Bills Committee left—as the Hon. Mr. McLean remarked—the principle of this measure to be decided upon by the Council. They only arrived at the conclusion that, if the principle laid down in the Municipal Corporations Act was to be departed from at all, this was a case in which it might properly be departed from. The village of Pukekohe adjoined a little railway-station on the Waikato Railway-line, and the station was surrounded by a swamp, so that in wet weather it was almost unapproachable, and the inhabitants there felt that, in the interests of travellers, as well as their own interests, it was desirable that they should have the means of improving this part of the township: hence the proposal that this Bill should be introduced. The Local Bills Committee had not authorised such a departure from the Municipal Corporations Act as the Bill contemplated. They had maintained the existing provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act, with the exception of the provision that the number of ratepayers whose adhesion was necessary to the project should be diminished. As regarded the revenue, they proposed that the revenue clauses should remain as they were—that it should be established to the satisfaction of the authorities that there was an average income of at least £250 per annum. The Committee were told by one witness that the income of Pukekohe would be between £400 and £500 per annum—much in excess of what was required by the Act. Honourable members would see that there was a peculiarity about this case which was not likely to occur again for many years. There was a swamp round the railway-station which made it almost unapproachable, and the local body desired to improve that part of the township.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN said he had never noticed any particular swamp there. Could the honourable gentleman inform him what was the width of the swamp?

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE could only state what he had been informed. He had been through that locality in the summer-time. He should imagine that the place was liable to swamp in the winter.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said that if this Bill were passed the Council would probably, in future sessions, learn that many other places found that they were in swamps during the winter. He thought the Council should stand on the sound principle laid down in the Municipal Corporations Act, and not pass this Bill.

The Council divided on the question, "That the Bill be committed."

WAIRARAPA NORTH COUNTY COUNCIL EMPOWERING BILL.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON moved the committal of this Bill, and in doing so wished to make a statement to the Council. When this Bill was under discussion on the second reading, there seemed to be an impression amongst honourable members that there was something very objectionable in the Bill inasmuch as it was a Bill that would affect one person only. How such an idea could have got about he could not possibly understand. He undertook then to make inquiries into the matter, and he had ascertained the circumstances, which he would state to the Council. In the first place, he would read a telegram which had been received from the secretary of the County Council. [Telegram read.] This telegram seemed to establish the fact that there were thirty-five freeholders affected by the provisions of the Bill. The circumstances which led to the introduction of the measure were these: In May a public meeting was held at Eketahuna for the purpose of discussing this question. The meeting was presided over by the representative of the riding in the Council, and resolutions were passed providing for making alterations in the width of the road, and for the price to be given for the land. There were eight persons present who voted for the proposals, and one person who voted against them. Since then, however, the person who had voted against the resolutions had signed a petition to the other branch of the Legislature in favour of this Bill. There was also a petition against the Bill signed by three leaseholders. These were leaseholders whose leases had only a short time to run, and therefore they did not wish to be compelled to move their houses and buildings, while, at the same time, they were afraid that the owner of the land might lease the frontage that he obtained from the road and thereby shut them out entirely. Therefore, as far as they were concerned, they thought that they should be protected. Both of these petitions had been presented to the other branch of the Legislature, and no petition either one way or the other had been presented to the Council. The only part taken in the matter by the person in whose interest it was insinuated that the Bill was promoted related to the price to be paid for the land. He maintained that it should be sold at its present value.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE thought it desirable that, in the interests of the people of Eketahuna, this Bill should not be allowed to pass. In country towns there was an absence of reserves; but, through an accident, the Town of Eketahuna was placed in an exceptional position. It had a fine reserve running through the very heart of the town, capable of being planted out and made a promenade of. Let them imagine what an advantage it would be to the City of Wellington if they had a promenade running through it such as the only one they had—at Fitzherbert Terrace. It would be a source of gratification to the inhabitants for all time to come. He had travelled a good deal in foreign parts, and one of the great attractions of Continental cities and villages was that open places were set apart where the inhabitants could gather together of an evening and amuse themselves. It was very pleasant to see them gather in those open areas and amuse themselves. By a fortunate accident the inhabitants of Eketahuna had been placed in possession of a strip of land running through the town of three chains width. This would be eligible for a promenade or other place of amusement. It was now proposed to deprive the people of Eketahuna of that privilege. The township had been laid out by some private person; and generally private persons, in laying out townships, did not make adequate provision for public reserves. The land was sold under the Land Regulations of the time, and he did not know whether it was sold for 10s. or £1 per acre. The place was laid out as a town, and would soon become a railway town; and it was proposed that the persons whose land abutted on the railway reserve should be entitled to increase their holdings to the extent of 44ft. at the cost of 10s. or 20s. per acre. The price fixed was simply absurd. If anything, the land was worth £50 per acre; and he asked why these persons should be allowed to increase their holdings at the maximum price mentioned. He did not think the Council could for one moment sanction such a proceeding, and he hoped, in the interests of Eketahuna, the Bill would not be passed.

The Hon. Mr. HART, as a member of the Local Bills Committee to which the Bill had been referred, said that these lands were of no value, but at present were a great nuisance to the owners of land adjoining, because weeds grew there abundantly; and, unless the owners of adjoining land went to the expense of constantly clearing the weeds, the nuisance would continue and spread to the surrounding property.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT thought that if the people of Wellington could have a reserve three chains wide running right through the town it would be a great boon indeed; but in the case of Eketahuna this would be a nuisance. The reserve would be a nest for all sorts of weeds and briars, thorns and thistles, and would become a nuisance. He thought there was reason to accede to the desire of the Eketahuna people, and he supported the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN said the arguments of the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had quite convinced him as to the propriety of opposing the Bill. It appeared to him that wide streets were most desirable in a climate like this; and, as to their being a nuisance owing to weeds growing in them, that objection would just as well apply to narrow streets as to broad streets. There could be no doubt that wide streets were an advantage, and, instead of their being unhealthy, they had a sanitary effect. The waste ground absorbed the odours that emanated from bad drainage, and in other ways they were most desirable to have for the comfort of the people and for sanitary purposes. He thought it would be a very great mistake to prevent the future inhabitants or the unborn millions from having the advantage which had been conferred upon them, and he voted in favour of retaining the land, so that there should be a wide street which might in time be called a "boulevard." He would certainly oppose the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPARD said the question seemed to him to affect the preservation of this large open space. What he would like to know was, Who was to keep this in order, and where was the money to come from to keep it in order? It did not appear to him that there was any power given to the local body to keep it in order. The road was three chains wide, and nothing could be worse than to have such an enormous width, because it would be impossible to keep it in repair and order. The inhabitants of the district would be glad to get rid of what would undoubtedly be a serious burden to them. It was proposed to omit the proviso with regard to the price, and leave the County Council to arrange the price.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON said it must not be forgotten that the great width of road was reserved for the purpose of carrying the railway there. The sections of land, he understood, were taken up on the understanding that the railway was to go there. The railway, however, had been diverted. If it had not been intended that the railway should go there the road would not have been laid off to such a great width.

Bill committed, read a third time, and passed.

The Council adjourned at ten minutes to eight o'clock p.m.

THIRD READINGS.

Building Societies Bill, Tamaki West Licensing District Bill, Sounds County Hospital Representation Bill, Public Reserves Sale Bill, Municipal Corporations Bill (No. 2).

CROWN AND NATIVE LANDS RATING ACT REPEAL BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, as honourable members are probably anxious to know what business remains to be done, with a view to making arrangements for leaving, I may say that, though there are apparently a good many Bills on the Order Paper that the Government consider necessary, still the majority of them are Bills which I think the House will assist the Government to pass. There is only one Bill that would cause a great deal of discussion—though, of course, there may be differences of opinion about others, such as the Loan Bill—and that is the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act Repeal Bill, to which there is a great deal of opposition. The Government think the Act must be repealed; but, looking at the late period of the session, and knowing that some honourable gentlemen feel strongly about it, we are prepared for this session to abandon it, only on the distinct understanding that the Government consider any obligations under it must not extend beyond the beginning of next session; and they will ask the House at the beginning of next session to repeal the Act. We wish the local bodies to distinctly understand that, so far as the Government can say so, no obligations will be incurred under it next year. I hope, that Bill being removed, we may be able to set to work on the others, and if there is only a reasonable amount of fair discussion on them I can see no reason why we should not get through them by to-morrow evening. As to the Municipal Corporations Bill, we propose to pass only such clauses of it as are absolutely necessary to put matters right, and I think with that understanding we shall be able to pass that Bill. We propose to pass the three Bills from the other House relating to Native lands.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Will the Premier promise to bring in the substituting measure to replace the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act next session, its operation to begin from the repeal of the Act? That measure was promised in the Financial Statement.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; I shall do that, undoubtedly. One reason why I do not propose to go on with the repeal of the Act this year is that it would be impossible to bring in and pass the substituting measure, though I have got it prepared.

LAND BILL.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON brought up the report of the Free Conference on the Land Bill, to the effect that Land Boards were to be retained as at present until the end of next session; but payment to be at the reduced fees recommended by the Government. He moved, That the report be agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

WEST COAST SETTLEMENT RESERVES BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. The Bill has already been three times before the House, and every honourable member, I venture to suggest, knows about it. Last year a compromise was come to with the Natives; but the clause was very clumsy, very unsatisfactory, and very expensive, and I hope to be able, when the Bill is committed presently, to amend it so as to remove these objections. If I cannot do that, I shall be willing to accept the Bill as it is in order to get it, so as to do justice to a very considerable number of settlers on the West Coast.

Mr. TAIPUA.—I should like to speak upon this Bill before its committal. There was a great deal of discussion upon it when it was last before the House, on account of the Premier's opposition to the Bill. On the last occasion some amendments were made in the direction of improving it, and it was then referred to the Upper House. Further amendments were there made in it, and the result was that it was not passed. I objected to the Bill when it was last before the House. It was brought up by the late Government, and the present Government revived it. Now, this is a measure which requires deeper consideration on the part of the Maori people, and I regret that the Native people have not had an opportunity of studying its provisions. This is a very important measure, and I regret very much that there is so little time for the House to consider it fully. There are a great number of Native chiefs in Wellington who had something to say upon this measure; but, owing to the press of business, the Premier was unable to meet the Natives and discuss it. I had hoped, from the statement made by the Premier at the commencement of this session, that legislation beneficial to the Natives would be introduced during the present session, but I am now become aware that there is no amendment likely to result in benefit to the Natives. As honourable members know, a number of petitions have been received from Natives resident on the West Coast. The petitioners take the strongest objection to the appointment of Assessors as valuers, and also ask that at the expiration of the leases the land should revert to the Native owners. These petitions were very carefully considered by both the European and Native members of the Native Affairs Committee. Full evidence was taken. Some of the petitioners appeared before the Committee; and the Committee considered the advisability or otherwise of returning the land to the Natives at the expiration of the present leases. The question, also, of appointing Native Assessors was considered by them in all its bearings. Mr. Ballance, the late Native Minister, supported the petitioners in the statements he made, and expressed his desire to grant their wish. The Public Trustee was requested to attend the Committee, and did so, and gave evidence with respect to these lands. The question was put to him, "In your opinion, what should be done with these lands when the present leases fall in?" He answered at once, "In my opinion they should revert to the Native owners. It is the best thing to let the Natives have the land back." I was in hope, from what took place at that Committee, and from the report adopted, that the prayer of the petitioners would be granted. Now, however, I find it is not proposed to give the Natives any relief in the direction indicated by the Committee. Last evening I met the Premier, and we had a long consultation respecting this Bill. I could not see my way to support it, and I said the responsibility for this measure must rest with the House: if I was unable to prevent its being adopted by the House, I could not help it. We considered this matter, and it was proposed to postpone it until to-day, to have another opportunity of considering what could be done. What I have to complain of is this: that legislation affecting the Native people is postponed until the last days of the session, and then brought in with a rush. How is it that legislation affecting Europeans is dealt with at the commencement of the session, whilst matters relating to the Native people are put off to the very end? The same course was adopted last session. This Bill was brought in just at the close, and I then prayed the House to postpone it until this session, thinking that it would be introduced at the beginning of the session, and that full consideration would be given to it. However, the same course is now pursued. The matter which causes me the greatest regret is this: Native petitioners have come before the Native Affairs Committee, and we have adopted reports which, if carried out, would give them relief. This Bill goes in an entirely opposite direction, so that the work we have done in the Native Affairs Committee is labour in vain. If this Bill passes in its present state those petitioners who have been before the Native Affairs Committee will say that they have been deceived. I regret that I am unable to approve of this measure. I know the reason this Bill is being brought in: it is being brought in in the interests of the European constituents on the West Coast. It may be that the European members of this House, during the late electioneering canvass, had this matter brought before them by their constituents, and I suppose that is the reason why this Bill has been introduced. The Europeans on the West Coast have asked that this Bill be passed. On the other hand, my Native constituents in the district have asked me to oppose it and prevent its being passed. The objectionable features in this Bill are these: First, the proposal to give power to Natives to sign leases on behalf of other Natives. When I visited the Natives in one district they made a strong point of this—they objected to this proposal. They asked me if such a plan as this was in conformity with English law—to delegate to one man the power of disposing of land belonging to another. I told them it was not; that I had never heard of such a proposal before. I told them that the only parallel cases were the cases of minors or persons under disability, where trustees were appointed to administer for them.

Mr. CARROLL.—I quite agree with all the arguments used by the honourable gentleman who has just sat down. I am rather in favour of this Bill being postponed until next session. I think the question involved is a very large one, and, as the recess will probably be a short one, there would not be much harm done by the postponement of this measure until next session. It will also give time to the honourable member who last spoke to see his constituents residing in that particular district, and who will be affected by this measure. I suggest this because I do really wish that legislation affecting Native matters should be carried on harmoniously between the two races. It should not be altogether one-sided. I am afraid this goes in the direction of one-sidedness, from what I can see of it. It is true the European lessees in that district are labouring under a hardship, certain promises of renewals having been made to them by the Public Trustee or the Commissioner—I do not know which. They have been building their hope upon these promises of renewal, and no doubt have gone into extensive improvements. I would propose in any case that the Natives should be prepared to protect the improvements of these European lessees, no matter how or in what form this measure goes through. I believe the Natives are always willing to protect the Europeans so far as their improvements are concerned. But the great point is, whether those lands should revert to the Natives to deal with as they like, or continue to be managed for them by the Public Trustee. That is the great point involved, in my idea. We have had petitions before the Native Affairs Committee from Natives owning this land, asking that this land, as soon as the leases are expired, should be returned to them, that they should be allowed to re-lease to Europeans or occupy and utilise the properties as they will. As owners, and considering that they leased the land to Europeans, I think their request should receive some consideration; and I hope the Premier will consider their petitions in some way or other. I ask him to postpone this measure until next session, so that every opportunity may be given for something fair being done between the two races. Hasty legislation, as a rule, has very bad effects, and no doubt the faulty legislation we have complained of in connection with Native matters in the past has been owing to the haste with which Native measures have been passed through this House; and I think the Premier is aware of that. And not only that: a Bill has just been discharged from the Order Paper—the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act Repeal Bill. It is a Bill in which the Natives have a considerable interest, every bit as much as in this—even more so; but by the discharging of that, and attempting to force this one through, the Natives will get an idea that the Government are one-sided altogether. There was no occasion for that, unless pressure had been brought to bear on the Premier from his European friends. He need not have dropped the Crown and Native Lands Rating Bill. However, I wish to say nothing more about it. But I ask the Premier to pause and reconsider the matter, and to think whether it is advisable to go on now with this Bill or leave it alone till next session. I can assure him that, if he leaves it over, we, representing the Maoris in this House, will give him every assistance to pass such a measure as will suit both sides. This measure may suit both sides, but I cannot say whether that is the case or not, having had no time to consider that. The clauses to which I have referred particularly are those dealing with what are called the confirmed leases. There are two classes of land under the operation of this Act. The confirmed leases are those which the Natives themselves made to Europeans before "The West Coast Settlements Act, 1884," was passed. The terms were arranged between the Maoris and the Europeans, and they entered into contracts and signed the deeds. Then, after a time, the West Coast Settlements Act came into force, and these leases were brought under the operation of that Act and were confirmed by it, and therefore were called confirmed leases. The other leases relate to lands dealt with directly under the Act, and leased by the Public Trustee. I do not want to refer to them at all. I think that it is advisable at the present time that these leases should still remain under the administration of the Public Trustee, because they are owned more or less by Te-Whitiites, who are fanatics. But in the case of confirmed leases there is no reason whatever for taking them away from the control of the Natives, because they were leased by themselves to the Europeans, and when the leases fall in they only wish to have the releasing of them again, or the occupation for themselves. These lands lie between Pateta and Waitotara, within a certain district there; and I think it would be holding out very strong inducements to these Natives living near Pateta to sever themselves from Te Whiti and to come in more closely with Europeans, and act as Europeans. But what effect will this Bill have upon these people? It will have a most discouraging effect upon the Natives, for it will make them think that you will not allow them to have the control of their lands or the power to lease those lands, for you do not allow them to act as Europeans, which is what they ask for. There was a Native sent in a petition, which was referred to the Native Affairs Committee the other day, in regard to this matter, and there was some important evidence taken before the Committee. The Public Trustee, who is the head of the department through which these lands are administered, gave evidence before the Committee; and this is the way in which he describes the difference between the two classes of land:—

"I should state that there are two distinct systems as regards the reserves: one, a very large area, has been leased by the Public Trustee; the other is a large area, but much smaller, and was originally leased by the Natives, but under the Act of 1884 the rents under the leases are payable to the Public Trustee."

Now, the smaller area is the area of which I am speaking; and the Natives expect that when the leases fall in the land will be returned to them, so that they can deal with the Europeans themselves. Then, again, we ascertained from the Public Trustee that the cost of management of these lands was something very great. First of all, the Natives were charged  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. for the administration of the land, and then, he said, the whole thing was unprofitable. Everything was thrown into a state of confusion. There was a difficulty in collecting the rents which were not paid, and in entertaining a number of applications and requests which were sent in; and he finished up by saying that he thought it would be far better if the control of these lands were taken away from him and given back to the Natives. Those are the opinions of the Public Trustee, the gentleman who has the administration of these lands; and surely he ought to know more about it than anybody else. Then we come to the promise of the Premier. The Public Trustee was asked whether any promise had been made to the tenants of a renewal of their leases, and he said,—

"I think there is an implied promise. I should explain that when the Act of 1884 passed there was a provision in it that these confirmed leases should come under the Act and be renewed. I think, if the Act is referred to, you will find some such provision. In accordance with that Act Mr. Thomas Mackay, who was then on the West Coast acting for the Trustee, held a meeting of these confirmed-lease holders. I believe it will be found that he made a promise to them that their leases, having come under the Act, would be renewed for thirty years at a rental to be determined by valuation."

Then he was asked whether Mr. Mackay was acting for the Natives, and he replied, "No, not for the Natives." You can see, therefore, that the Natives were not represented at all, and that there was only one side considered right through, and that was the European side, the Natives being totally ignored. That may be right; I do not say it is wrong. I only wish to do what is fair to both sides, because, although I represent the Natives in this House, I also represent the country and the Europeans just as much, and anything I can do to benefit both sides without injuring one I shall be most happy to do. I only ask for a little time, to see if we cannot in some way put in a provision or impose a condition to satisfy the Natives that at some time or other they will have these leases given back into their own hands. The principle I would adopt with all these lands would be to individualise them. So long as you have people holding lands as tenants in common there will be difficulty. But I would make each of them individualise his property, and place him in the position of a European. I will say no more. I only ask the Premier to consider the remarks of the honourable member for the West Coast, whose district this measure more affects than it does mine, although I could not help saying these few words on the subject.

Major ATKINSON.—There is no hasty legislation in this matter. This Bill is simply intended to fulfil certain engagements which were entered into in 1881, again dealt with in 1884, and again in two successive sessions. The Natives know of this Bill, and I venture to say that a large majority of them approve of it, because they know that a great injustice will be done to the Europeans if it is not passed. I can understand the honourable member for the district being in doubt as to the meaning of the Bill, not seeing how unfair it would be not to pass it, and that he should therefore ask for time; but I can assure him that it would be doing the greatest injustice to a large number of people not to pass it. One word with regard to the disappointment expressed by the honourable member for the East Coast. It should not cause the Natives any disappointment at all, because this Bill does not in any way deal with their lands. It is only intended to fulfil engagements entered into long ago, and which the Government have always said that they would fulfil before handing the lands back to the Natives. I believe it ought to be handed back to them, and nothing but the lateness of the session has prevented the Government from bringing in a measure to deal with that matter. We shall, however, after the session is over, have time to consult the Natives; and I have no doubt that when they have carefully considered the matter they will entirely approve of our proposals. I hope the honourable member for the East Coast will let us get the Bill through, as it will be just both to Natives and to Europeans.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

On the motion, That the Bill be read a third time,

Mr. TAIPUA said,—Before the Bill is passed I wish to say this: The reason why I withdrew my opposition to the Bill was because the Premier made a statement to the Native members assuring them that next session he will introduce a Bill giving the Natives full power to deal with their lands. Owing to that promise, and in the hope that some measure beneficial to the Natives may be introduced, I did not on this occasion oppose the Bill.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I have had a Bill before the House this session which the Native chiefs of the Auckland District wished to see passed. They asked the Government to pass it, and the Government refused. That was the only Bill which they thought would, if passed, relieve the minds of the Maoris, because it would have given them the control of their property. That is the only Bill really for the benefit of the Maoris which has been introduced this session, and it has not been passed. In bringing in that Bill I was acting in the interests of the whole Native population in New Zealand. I sincerely hope, however, that the Government will keep their promise and give us a law which will give us the management of our own lands in the future.

Bill read a third time.

SOUTH ISLAND (WESTLAND AND NELSON) NATIVE RESERVES BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—I beg to move the second reading of this Bill, which is somewhat of the same nature as the last, and is intended to do justice to the tenants of these reserves. The Bill passed through this House last session. I may say that I have seen the Natives most interested — one an honourable member of another place, and the other the honourable member for the Southern Maori District—who have gone carefully through the Bill and agree with the principle, suggesting that some slight amendments be made in Committee. Under these circumstances I do not think I need detain the House further by explaining the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. PARATA.—When this measure was before the House last session there was very strong opposition to it on the part of the Native members, because it was attempted to be forced through at a late period of the session. I am happy to say it will not be necessary for me to offer any factious opposition to it now, because, with certain amendments which have been suggested to the Premier, and which he has accepted, I think it may be a desirable measure. I shall carefully examine the Bill at the third reading, and if those amendments are made there will be no reason for me to oppose it. Many of the Natives interested in the reserves in the South Island have petitioned the House, and have sent letters to me, asking that the lands shall revert to them at the expiration of the present leases. I wish to say a word or two in regard to that. In the proposal as to compensation for improvements, the objection I have to the proposed arrangement about the valuations is this: Under the old Act the Europeans will have the whole benefit of their improvements; no benefit whatever will result to the Natives—all they will get will be their rent. There is another objection I have, which is this: The trustees, those administering the lands in the past, took upon themselves, without any authority in law, to make a promise that the present tenants should have renewals of their leases. That was an illegal proceeding of theirs, and it has been a fruitful source of trouble. Had they taken the Natives into their confidence before making these rash promises it would have been different; but, as it was, they acted without the cognisance of the Natives, and quite without their consent. These promises were made in the interests of the European settlers, and the Natives were not consulted, and had no voice in it at all. I will not go into the question of the reserves at Arowhenua, Mawhera, and Greymouth, because there is an honourable gentleman in Wellington who knows all about these reserves, and no doubt he will take advantage of the opportunity and, if necessary, he will improve the measure so far as it relates to these reserves, and, if any necessary amendments are needed, will see they are inserted. I hope the House will not consider that I wish to act prejudicially to the interests of the Europeans. I wish to see justice meted out equally both to the Europeans and to the Natives, and I say that the Natives should have a voice in the settlement of this matter. But what I do insist upon is this: that before any fresh leases are granted the consent of the Maoris should be obtained, and I do not think any renewals of leases should be granted without their knowledge or consent. The Natives are on friendly terms with the European lessees; and it is only fair to the Maoris, seeing that they are the owners of the land, that they should know if renewals are to be granted, and what the price and other arrangements are to be. I will not allude further to these lands, but I will speak now, briefly, about the reserves in Motueka, in the Nelson Provincial District. Petitions have been sent to the House by the Natives interested in these lands, in which they ask that those lands which have not houses upon them or any valuable improvements should be given back to them at the expiration of the present leases, in order that they may cultivate them themselves, because they at present have not sufficient lands for their own sustenance. The Natives are actuated by a very praiseworthy object: they wish to emulate their European neighbours, and show that they are capable of following their example and cultivating these lands, and acting in every respect like Europeans. I think it would be a very good method of encouraging local industry to let the Natives have the lands back for that purpose. I would not ask that lands should be given back that have houses or other valuable improvements on them; but I think it only reasonable to give them for their support a small portion of the reserves adjoining their present holdings. I have interested myself in this matter, and I know it is their earnest wish to get back some of these lands, so as to be placed on the same footing as the Europeans. I do hope the Premier will give me an assurance that he will insert a clause giving the Public Trustee power, if it prove desirable, in the interests of both the Natives and the Europeans, to give back certain portions of these lands to the Natives at the expiration of the present leases—that is, unless it could be shown that it would inflict any injustice on the Europeans or the Natives. I think the honourable member for Motueka will bear me out in what I have said, because he is acquainted with the Natives there, and he is able to say that they are actuated by a desire to cultivate the land themselves. I hope the House and the Government will agree with me that this is only a reasonable request to make, and I trust it will be given effect to. I ask the Premier to strike out from the Bill the references to the Wakamui lands in the South Island, so that it may be quite clear that this measure will apply to reserves on the west coast of the South Island. That would distinguish the land to which it is to apply from the other part. While asking for this amendment, I support the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. W. D. STEWART said he had been communicated with on this matter by persons who pointed out that the time had arrived when the Natives of the South Island should have an independent power over their reserves. That power had been given to Mr. Taiaroa; and there was a general desire among Natives of the South Island that a similar power should be given to them. He mentioned the matter now so that the Premier might consider it before the Bill should come into Committee.

Major ATKINSON.—I shall be glad to consider the question raised by the honourable member for the Southern Maori District, and, if his wish can be given effect to without injustice being done to any one, I shall be happy to comply with it. I will therefore introduce a clause giving the Governor in Council power to deal with the matter if he is satisfied that no injustice will be done. With regard to what fell from the honourable member for Dunedin West, I do not think it would be desirable to introduce such a clause into this Bill; but I hope next session to bring down a Bill which will give the Natives such a right as he speaks of wherever they are fit to exercise the power.

Bill read a second and a third time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

On the question, That the amendments made by the Legislative Council in this Bill be agreed to,

Mr. GOLDIE said he observed that the Council had struck out the provision which made the granting of licenses to sell liquor at railway-stations subject to the consent of the Licensing Committee of the district. That was an important amendment, which he did not agree with.

Amendments agreed to.

LOCAL BODIES' FINANCE AND POWERS BILL.

Major ATKINSON moved, That this Bill be read a second time. Its object was simply to reduce the subsidies, as laid down in the Financial Statement.

Sir J. VOGEL was understood to say that the figures in the Financial Statement and in the Public Works Statement on this subject did not tally; and the intentions of the Government appeared rather vague. The late Government proposed to pay half subsidies for this year. The present Government proposed to do likewise for this year, but he was not clear as to their intentions next year. Part I. of the Public Works Fund would be exhausted about May next—there would be only £60,000 or £70,000 at the end of March next; and if it was intended to find the subsidies out of the Public Works Fund he did not see where the money was to come from as soon as that Fund was exhausted, for there was no provision made for subsidies in the new loan. He merely pointed these matters out so that the honourable gentleman should look into them if necessary; but perhaps the honourable gentleman would give an indication of the intentions of the Government. He was not quite clear on the point. Was it intended that the subsidies should be the same as proposed by the late Government for this year, and the same next year, or half that?

Major ATKINSON said it was proposed to give the same this year and next. It was left open to the Government to make other provision to carry on at the same rate next year. The Government thought it a bad plan to pay subsidies out of loans, and they hoped next year to make other provision. It was the intention of the Government to pay next year on the same amount.

Mr. WARD asked if it was the intention of the Government to withdraw these subsidies absolutely from the local bodies without making other provision.

Major ATKINSON replied that the Government had no intention of doing that. Certainly some provision must be made. They did not see their way now to make any other proposal, but they would make a proposal next year.

Bill read a second and a third time.

NAVAL AND MILITARY SETTLERS' AND VOLUNTEERS' LAND BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be read a second time.

Mr. T. THOMPSON said there was a matter in connection with this Bill that he wished to draw attention to. He would ask the Premier if he considered it desirable to introduce a clause so that men who were entitled to certificates for land should have the alternative of taking a money payment. His reason for suggesting that course was this: that many of these men had now grown old, before their claims were recognised, and they were not in a position to settle on land. If such a clause as the one suggested was not introduced into the Bill the consequence would be that their scrip would get into the hands of persons who dealt in land, and would probably be bought for £4 or £5, as had been done in the past, so that they would receive very little benefit.

Major ATKINSON would be very happy to consider such a clause in Committee. He had thought over the matter, and he saw considerable difficulty in the way. What the honourable gentleman had said was quite true; but he was afraid there was no way of avoiding that difficulty. The Provincial Government of Taranaki had issued certificates of land for Militia and Volunteers' services; but land which was confiscated could not be taken up under these certificates, and, as the whole of the province was confiscated territory, the Provincial Government bought up these certificates for 10s. in the pound. It would therefore be rather hard to give other claimants a higher money-compensation for land than this. These men were entitled to land valued at £30, and for their certificates they received £15.

Mr. T. THOMPSON would be satisfied if that course could be adopted in the present case.

Dr. NEWMAN would like to know, on behalf of a great number of persons, whether this Bill would meet the vast majority of cases where claimants had been shut out through legal technicalities. Some who had not legal claims had equitable claims, and he wished to know if this Bill would meet their cases.

Major ATKINSON said he had endeavoured to give to the Commissioners full power to deal with cases on an equitable basis, and, further, intended that, if a man had left the province for which the grant could be issued, but had remained in New Zealand, his claim should still be good. It seemed to him that, as the General Government had taken over the land, and as the colony had had the benefit of these men's services somewhere, they should not lose their claim because they had left the province in which they were entitled to the land. He had also given soldiers who were discharged abroad one year to learn of the existence of the Act; and he hoped that the Bill would cover all equitable claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN would strongly urge the Government to accede to the request of the honourable member for Auckland North. He knew of several cases in his own district where men had grown old, and were exactly in the position that the honourable member had described; and he was satisfied it would only be fair justice that the suggestion the honourable member had made should be given effect to.

Mr. BRUCE would like to ask if the Premier intended appointing these Commissioners during the recess; and, if so, if he would advertise the fact: because when the last Commissioners sat there were numbers of men who lived away in the back-country who never heard of the sittings at all, and had never preferred their claims. There was a strong feeling among the old soldiers in the back-districts that they had scarcely received sufficient notice with respect to this matter.

Mr. ANDERSON asked if he was to understand from the Colonial Treasurer that the claims of persons whose names did not appear on this schedule would receive consideration from the Government. Some time ago he presented a petition from a person whose name he did not see on either schedule; therefore he asked the question.

Major ATKINSON said that, as to advertising, he should propose to give considerable notice. He would keep the Commission sitting for a considerable time, so that everybody should have an opportunity of being heard. The schedule to the Bill only contained the names of persons who had already been reported as persons entitled to grants. He had no doubt there were many hundreds who would come in under the new Commission.

Mr. GUINNESS hoped the Premier would also direct the Commission to sit in different parts of the colony, because the last Commission only sat in certain portions of the colony, and did not visit other portions. On the West Coast there were a number of those old military settlers who were claimants for land, and their cases had never been heard. He trusted the Commissioners would visit each district, or the centre of each district.

Major ATKINSON said letters had been received from all parts of the colony complaining of the writers' cases not being heard. He would endeavour to give every facility and sufficient time for the hearing of all cases.

Major STEWARD wished to state that the last Commission did not sit at Waimate, where there were several of these cases; and he hoped the new Commission would hold a sitting there.

Mr. SAMUEL said this Bill would give a great deal of satisfaction throughout the country; and he had no doubt the Commissioners would give the fullest opportunity for all cases to be brought forward in different parts of the colony.

MINING BILL.

On the motion for the committal of this Bill,

Mr. PEACOCK said it appeared to him that this Bill interfered with private rights in a very undesirable manner—that rights were being taken away from private individuals without anything of that being apparent in the Bill itself. He referred particularly to clause 2, which provided that “the taking of land for the deposit of tailings or for the construction of sludge-channels or tailing-channels” should be “deemed to be taking of land for a public work within the meaning of ‘The Public Works Act, 1882;’ and the Governor may accordingly take land under such Act for the aforesaid purposes.” Now, in “The Resumption of Land for Mining Purposes Act, 1873,” and also in the 40th section of “The Mining Act, 1886,” it was set forth that “mining purposes” conferred the right “to resume land which may be required for or intended to be used as a site for a tail-race, water-race, dam, reservoir, sludge-channel, machine-site, or for any other purpose connected with mining for gold or silver.” In the same section it was distinctly laid down that “all lands which, since the twenty-ninth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, have been or may be alienated or agreed to be alienated from the Crown, whether by way of absolute sale or lease or for any lesser interest, and all lands which had been so alienated at any time previous to the above-mentioned date, with the consent of the owners thereof respectively, shall be liable to be resumed for mining purposes” on payment of compensation, &c. That was the point to which he wished to direct attention. Those who had obtained land prior to the passing of the Act of 1873 were not liable to have it taken, and under the Act of 1886 the consent of the owners was necessary for taking lands for sludge-channels, tail-races, &c.; but in this Bill it was provided that the land might be taken on payment of compensation granted, but still without requiring the consent of the owner, as provided for in the Act of 1886. He thought it improper that they should in this way pass legislation retrospectively affecting private rights. He should like to hear what the Minister had to say on the subject.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON would like the honourable gentleman to observe that this was not taking land for mining purposes. It was only taking land for two specific purposes—the making of sludge-channels and tailing-races—and compensation must be paid.

Mr. PEACOCK admitted that; but it did not touch the point he had raised, for these works were included in the general definition of “mining purposes,” which were subject to the restriction he had mentioned.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said it was very desirable this alteration should be made in the law, but he had no objection to making the clause permissive. There were cases in which it was desirable that there should be a power to take land on full compensation being paid.

Mr. PEACOCK said that the rights of the people who had obtained land prior to 1873 should certainly be conserved.

Bill committed.

STATE'S PROPERTY IN RUNNING WATER.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he wished to bring this question under the consideration of the Council not with any desire that they should express an opinion on it at present, either one way or the other—either to indorse the view that he had embodied in the resolution or to negative it. But he thought that the question deserved to be ventilated, and that it was one that had very important bearings on the interests of the country. What the colony wanted was population—population of the right kind—and that, he thought, would be found to be a large agricultural population, which would develop the resources of the Crown lands, which they still had in abundance in all parts of the colony. One of the first essentials to secure this object was that the settlers should have all the necessaries of life; and there was not one necessary of life more essential than that of an abundant supply of fresh water. This supply would be short in parts of the country; it was absorbed by certain classes, who occupied the country for a time, and whose occupation was likely to wear out after a time, but who, in the event of their absorbing this great necessary of life, would preclude the possible settlement of the country by a class which would raise the country to permanent prosperity. He had not yet referred to the views he held on the rights affecting this property. The differences in laws in regard to these rights were very extreme even in the Mother-country. In the Californian goldfields they found that the titles continued very much what they were amongst our own honest ancestors when might was right. At the same time, the principle which had been recognised in those States in which legislation on this subject had begun earlier than in many other States, and where every point of detail had been provided for—as in the Italian States, where water for the purposes of irrigation was of very great consequence—was one which they could not do better than consider. He did not wish to detain the Council by many remarks. He thought what he had already stated indicated what he desired to say on this subject. The course which he would be most gratified to see adopted in considering this motion was, that the motion should undergo discussion, and that then it should be adjourned till a future opportunity.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the Government be requested to consider the propriety of preparing a Bill, to be introduced in next session of Parliament, declaratory of the property of the State in running water; and providing that running water shall not be withdrawn from its natural channel otherwise than temporarily, and by way of a lease from the Crown, revocable if other interests should become injuriously affected."—(Hon. Mr. MENZIES.)

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND said, whatever the value of riparian rights might be at Home, they had led to great inconvenience in a country like ours. As he understood it, the present state of the law was that persons having land bordering on one of these large rivers were entitled to the water alongside. He knew of one case in which a road was given upon a piece of the bed, without the legal sanction of the Land Board, which road had been absolutely stopped on the ground that this was a part of the river, and the proprietors on the two sides had the right to occupy it. However, the question was in an uncertain condition. He did not pretend to have a clear and accurate knowledge of the matter, but he believed it was a subject that was worthy of attention, and he hoped the Government would look into this question.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said the passing of this resolution was quite unnecessary if its object was to induce the Government to consider the question, as it had been a subject of great difficulty from the very first day on which they took office this session. The question was constantly cropping up, and the difficulty was that there were two irreconcilable interests which had to be dealt with—the goldfields interest and the agricultural and pastoral interest; and he did not know of any mode by which these interests could be reconciled to the satisfaction of both. If the honourable gentleman during the recess would consider the question from that point of view, and suggest something which would solve the difficulty, he would be exceedingly thankful; for, as he had said, there had been a great deal of difficulty about it. With regard to these two interests which had to be considered, the one polluted the water which the other wanted clear and pure, and they derived the water from the same source. That was a serious difficulty. The Government had no objection to the passing of the resolution, but he could say that the resolution would add nothing to enable the Government to do more than they had already done, because they had done all they could do up to the present time to find out some mode by which this difficulty could be solved.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE said that, as the question was one of considerable importance, and as they had not sufficient time to consider it properly during the present session, he would move, That the debate be adjourned for one week.

The Hon. Mr. SWANSON said the honourable gentleman who introduced this subject had mentioned two industries which were involved in the consideration of the question—namely, the mining and pastoral industries.

But he would mention another industry which was largely dependent on a clear water-channel, and that was the timber industry; and if the bottoms of the streams were filled up with sludge and other things there would be an end to this industry at once. He hoped the Government would not forget to take that point into consideration.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR was of opinion that the matter was one which required a great deal of consideration; and what had just fallen from the Hon. Sir Frederick Whitaker corroborated that opinion. With respect to the contending interests, there was no doubt that if they allowed one to get the predominance it would have the effect of completely stopping all operations in connection with the other. He was sorry to hear his honourable friend, in introducing the motion, refer to the mining industry as one not likely to be a permanent industry. He thought they need only look at the last Statement of the Minister of Mines to see that it was not a temporary industry—not an industry which was wearing away; that it had assumed such dimensions that it was likely to last at least the rest of their lives. The goldfields would retain a population in this country and would be a source of wealth to the country for many—well, he might say, centuries. He would just point out in a few words that already in connection with this industry there were companies having a paid-up capital of £2,917,000; that there had already been expended on gold-mining plant—machinery and water-races—£1,745,000; and that £2,521,000 had been received as revenue from the mining community; and in the case of the West Coast, to which this resolution specially applied, there had been produced gold worth £18,789,000, being half the total quantity of gold produced in the colony. He would say, therefore, that this was not an industry which was likely to pass away, nor was it an industry whose rights should be sacrificed to another industry which could not exist without having this mining industry alongside of it. And he trusted that, if any Bill of this kind were brought in, due care would be taken that the rights of the mining industry would not be destroyed. This industry had given employment to a large population, and was bringing into use a very large area of land in the colony which would have otherwise remained idle. He would not have referred to this but for the remarks of the honourable gentleman, which seemed to him to imply that the mining industry was not an industry to be fostered, and that it ought to be sacrificed to the agricultural industry. For his part, he thought that both should be allowed to live. The riparian rights could be easily ascertained by reference to the common law. He should vote for the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS could not see any necessity for continuing this debate. The resolution simply expressed a desire that the Government should consider the propriety of preparing a Bill to deal with this question.

Hon. Mr. Swanson

When that Bill came down that would be the time to consider the subject. Therefore they were only wasting time by going on with the debate, while there were other things to consider.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said that, notwithstanding what had been said by the Hon. Mr. Bonar, he still thought that the mining industry was only a temporary one. They had an example in California as to what happened in regard to that point; and he referred them to the account given by Captain Morgan, which showed that millions of dollars had been spent on water-races, but, when the gold was sluiced out of the land, the right to the water still continued, although it would be of no further use for mining.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY said the gold was not exhausted, but they stopped the money.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES said it was of no use working it further. It was quite true, as the Attorney-General had said, that, unless there was some security given that in a mining district the agricultural settlers should have a supply of pure water, there would be no permanent agricultural settlement there. If settlement of agriculturists took place in a mining district, they could not be regarded in the light of permanent settlers, but rather in the light of camp-followers. He was glad to hear the assurance of the Attorney-General that this subject was receiving the attention of the Government. It might be that he should have occasion to refer to it at a future time; but he was glad to hear that the subject had not been overlooked. He should concur in the amendment which had been proposed for the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN understood that the adjournment of the debate in this particular case would have the same effect as carrying "the previous question." To his thinking, that was perhaps rather an advantage; but it was quite clear that the question was a very much larger one than some honourable members seemed to imagine. That was to some extent indicated by the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Swanson, who had brought under the notice of the Council the extreme importance of this question in relation to the timber industry. Apart from that industry, there were a number of other industries which were affected by this question of water-supply; and, in his opinion, it was one which ought to be considered on very much wider grounds than the interests of the agricultural and mining industries merely. The interference with a large number of vested interests consequent on the conferring of special water-rights was a question which demanded the attention of the Government. He should therefore support the adjournment.

Debate adjourned.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved, That the amendments made by the House of Representatives in this Bill be agreed to. The House of Representatives had struck out the greater number of the clauses of the Bill, and, as it appeared that sufficient time would not be given to go further into the matter this session, he thought it would be better to accept the clauses which had been retained. The clauses retained authorised the passing of certain expenditure in connection with the Jubilee; also expenditure of money not by Councillors visiting Wellington, but in connection with the passage through the Legislature of any measure affecting the Corporation; and the other clauses retained were those dealing with the electric light. He thought, under the circumstances, they had better agree to the amendments, leaving over the question of all the clauses which had been struck out till next session.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY asked what was the position of this Bill. He understood the Council had passed a Municipal Corporations Bill No. 2, and he remembered that there was another Municipal Corporations Bill in the other House. He wished to know which of these the Council was now dealing with.

The Hon. the SPEAKER said the Bill at present being dealt with was the one which had been passed by the Legislative Council and sent on to the House of Representatives. It had now come back to them, he understood, with certain clauses struck out.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE pointed out that there was no new matter introduced into this Bill by the House of Representatives, but a number of clauses had been struck out.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said the Bill that had been referred to by the Hon. Mr. Buckley never proceeded further than the Order Paper of the House of Representatives, and the Bill had practically no existence. The one before them at that moment was the one they had passed in the Council.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS thought it was to be objected to that they should be called upon at a moment's notice to agree to amendments which had been made by the other branch of the Legislature. So far as he could see, there had been clauses left out dealing with matters that were of the utmost importance to corporate bodies. For example, there was the provision relating to taking over certain streets, and the width of streets. In his opinion, it would be the fairest course to defer the whole Bill till next session.

The Hon. Dr. GRACE pointed out that the honourable gentleman merely proposed that they should accept the provisions which had been agreed to without difference of opinion between the two Houses. It was simply a question whether they should not accept the clauses which had been left in the Bill, and wait for the others till another opportunity.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER thought it would be unwise to allow this Bill to drop, especially as the whole subject had been so carefully considered by the Council. On the principle that half a loaf was better than no bread, he thought the Council ought to accept what remained of this Bill rather than reject it entirely. It still contained certain provisions which ought to be enacted, and he hoped, therefore, the Council would agree to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES CONSERVATION BILL.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said the necessity for this Bill lay in the fact that there were at present insufficient penalties and powers to prevent the destruction of seals during the close season. The maximum penalty at present was £50, and that was found to be quite inadequate to give effect to the conservation of seals. It would be seen that the powers given in the Bill were very stringent, and he might say that it was considered that nothing short of the most stringent provisions would be at all equal to the necessities of the case. The provision with regard to the seizure of the vessel was very necessary, for this reason: that the penalty for the offence of killing seals did not in the least affect the owner of the vessel, and it really was the owner of the vessel who was the person who might be considered most to blame, or, at all events, quite as much as any one else. Recent events had convinced the Government that strong measures would have to be taken to prevent the entire destruction of seals. In Committee he would propose the addition of words at the end of clause 6 to the effect that the provision shall apply only to vessels if found within the jurisdiction of the colony. That, of course, was absolutely necessary. He moved, That the Bill be read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN did not know that it was desirable to go on with that sort of panic legislation, although no doubt the action taken by a sealing vessel latterly was very bad. If they passed panic legislation they would soon get back to the old times when people were hung for stealing a sheep. Even if such a prohibitory law as was proposed were passed, that would not prevent American boats coming and taking away seals. Perhaps some method could be devised for preserving the seals on the islands during the close season. If that could be done it would be far better than passing panic legislation, which would not effect the object in view. The Governor at present had power to make regulations, and probably under those regulations a fine could be imposed for each seal taken in the close season. If that could be done, he did not think there was any necessity for this Bill. He thought it would be just as well to let the Bill stand over.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE thought the Hon. Mr. McLean laboured under a misapprehension with reference to foreign vessels being able to kill seals during the close season and escape the penalties. Foreign vessels would be open to seizure. Foreign vessels had lately been seized at Alaska for breaking the fishery laws. The islands referred to in the Bill were within our own territory, and if any foreign vessel violated the law it would be liable to seizure. He was not prepared to say that this could be regarded as panic legislation. It must have been evident to all thoughtful observers for some time past that some legislation of the kind now proposed was absolutely necessary. He remembered the time when Kangaroo Island, off South Australia, was a large fishing resort for fur-seals, and a large population was continuously maintained on that island, and they derived a profitable living by catching fur-seals. No provision was made to protect these seals; and now the seals had disappeared altogether, and what might have been a permanent source of wealth to the colony had been entirely lost. A similar course of events had occurred elsewhere. Under the 2nd clause it was clear that any vessel having on board seals outside the open season would be liable to a penalty. Sealing vessels did not return to port until nearly the close of the season, and if they happened to have any seals or sealskins on board after the actual close of the open season they would be liable to a severe penalty. That, however, was a point which might be easily remedied in Committee.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said it appeared to him that clause 5 went further than possibly was intended. It provided that vessels engaged in illegally taking seals were to be forfeited. Under that provision the rights of entirely innocent persons who had lent money on vessels might be jeopardized. If the Commissioner could dispose of forfeited vessels, and, if necessary, return the proceeds, or a portion of them, to the persons justly entitled to them, then the clause would be all right. He thought that a similar provision to that which he had suggested existed in the case of property on which it was discovered that illegal distillation was carried on. It seemed to him that some provision ought to be made in this Bill with the view of protecting innocent persons who might have lent money on forfeited vessels.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said this measure was not panic legislation. Unless more legal power were given than existed at present there would be most serious results. As had been pointed out, foreign vessels would be within the jurisdiction of the colony. It was in order to make that quite clear that he proposed to amend the Bill in Committee. He would make inquiries with regard to the point raised by the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn.

Bill read a second and a third time.

PUBLIC RESERVES SALE BILL.

On the motion for the second reading of this Bill,

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said he would like to know what course it was proposed to adopt with reference to this Bill—whether, after the second reading, it would be referred to the Waste Lands Committee, or whether it would be discussed forthwith. According to the Standing Orders the Bill should be referred to the Waste Lands Committee. There were something like sixty or seventy reserves mentioned in the Bill, and it was utterly impossible, in Committee of the Council, that the matter could be dealt with as a matter of that importance deserved. On looking cursorily through the Bill it did not appear to him that any of the matters contained in it were of pressing importance, and he did not know that, under those circumstances, at that very late period of the session, the Council would be justified in passing the Bill at all. They would certainly not be justified in passing it without some closer investigation of the circumstances of the case than could possibly be given in Committee of the whole House. Reserves should not be lightly dealt with, and the Council had always expressed a disposition to look closely into any tampering with or alterations of public reserves. He was certain that unless the matter was one of pressing importance the Council would feel that the Bill, which affected such a large number of reserves, should not be passed without more consideration.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said his intention was to have the Bill read a second time, and then move that it be referred to the Waste Lands Committee.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said there was no time for the Waste Lands Committee to meet. A number of members were leaving that day, and it would be impossible to get the Waste Lands Committee together. He did not think there could be any hurry for passing the Bill. There was one reserve that he knew of which it would be most objectionable to dispose of.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said the object of the Bill was to make available a large number of reserves. These reserves were all, except four, in the Canterbury Provincial District. The Bill provided that the Minister should have power to make arrangements for disposing of these reserves, which were of no use for any public purpose. Great numbers of reserves were formerly made, and many of them were of no use whatever for the purpose for which they were originally made, and they were not required, many of them, to be retained for any purpose at all. The Bill did not by any means imply that all the reserves mentioned would be turned into money; but it was desired to free the hands of the Government with regard to dealing with them, and making them apply, where necessary, to any other purpose of a public character than that for which they were originally reserved. It appeared to him that there could be no objection to such a course as that. It was useless to keep large quantities of land lying idle, as had been done for years; it would be very much better to make use of it for public purposes or for revenue purposes. He intended that the Bill should go before the Waste Lands Committee.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY hoped the honourable gentleman would not press this Bill any further. These reserves had been made a long time ago, and therefore the matter might very well stand over till next session. He saw in the schedule that the reserves proposed to be dealt with were reserves for police; railway; timber dépôt and railway; railway-station, Winchester; Mount Somers tramway; and there was a part of a cemetery reserve. Seeing the late period of the session, and looking at the fact that the Bill must go before the Waste Lands Committee, he thought the honourable gentleman would probably be consulting the wishes of the Committee if he would not press the Bill further.

The Hon. Mr. HART noticed that it was proposed to dispose of a reserve in the Town of Napier. Surely any reserve in that town ought not to be sold by the Government. There were not enough public reserves in the towns of New Zealand.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN said it was clear that the Government had not had time to give that attention to this matter which it deserved. Unless the Government could assure the Council that it had really considered the matter carefully, he questioned whether it would be wise to proceed further with the matter. It did not seem to him to be a question which required immediate action. There did not seem to be any immediate necessity for carrying such a Bill as this.

The Hon. Mr. CHAMBERLIN wished to protest against this sort of legislation. He saw no reason why a Bill of this character could not have been brought in at an earlier period of the session, as the Government had the same information on the subject then as they had now. He moved, That the Bill be read the second time that day week.

The Council divided on the question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said this matter had been called on on the previous day, when he asked for an adjournment of the question so that he might be allowed an opportunity of reading the report of the Committee. Since then he had read the report, and he was glad he had read it before the motion had been decided upon. The report was as follows:—

"That this petition complains that, although the names of three Maori women—namely, Iwa, Pukio, and Hinewetee—were included in the list of names taken down by Mr. Commissioner Mantell in 1848 as being entitled to the Moeraki and Kaiapoi reserves, their descendants have been excluded by the Native Land Court from participating in these reserves, and further complains that no reply has been received to the application for rehearing. There seems no doubt that the persons named were living in Moeraki in 1848, and were entitled to shares in the reserves at Moeraki and Kaiapoi. Your Committee recommend that a rehearing should be granted, in order that petitioners may have a further opportunity of proving the identity of the persons through whom they claim, and their own right to succeed to such interests."

The Council had nothing before it to show whether the time for a rehearing was passed, or whether a rehearing had been refused, or what had been done in connection with the matter. Then, he would ask, whom was the Council to ask to decree a rehearing? That was a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the Court. If a rehearing was improperly refused, at a future time it might be within the rights of the petitioner to make application to the Legislature to set it right; but it was premature altogether to take any steps now in this matter. If they were to recommend the Judge of the Native Land Court to grant a rehearing they might as well recommend other Courts to do the same sort of thing. He thought that would be a false position to take up. He was of opinion that the subject should be allowed to stand over for the present; there might be something more in it than they knew of at present. He, for one, could not agree to the motion.

The Hon. Mr. MANT'ELL hardly thought that the course recommended by the Committee would give the relief the petitioners desired. If it should be found, on further investigation, that they had claims which had been overlooked in the partition of the reserves, and so on, it appeared to him that it would be a case for the consideration of the Government, who, he thought, should give them relief in some other place. In regard to the Moeraki and Kaiapoi reserves, he fancied that any claim that might be made in regard to these could only be given effect to by successional orders of the Court; and he therefore asked the honourable member to withdraw his proposal, and let a further investigation take place, with a view to action being taken on a future occasion.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN said it was a fact that the Land Court sat last year and apportioned all the lands at Waikouaiti, and all the land in the reserves in the South Island, and, in fact, individualised the titles; so that he could not see how this case could be reheard, if the land had been divided among the people. If there had been any injustice done, the persons aggrieved must get relief by some other process, as they would not get it by this resolution. He saw the Natives at the Court last year himself, and he believed that the whole of the titles down there had been individualised. He would say, in reference to the Natives at Waikouaiti, that there were no more deserving settlers than these, and it was a pity that they had not their own land to support themselves on. They took round a large threshing-machine during the season, and went threshing for Europeans. They also took contracts for ploughing and shearing; and they were a very energetic lot of people, and were worthy of some consideration: He thought they ought to be given their own land, which would enable them to make homes for themselves, and carry on a system of soil-cultivation.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND agreed with the Hon. Mr. Mantell that there was no possibility of reconsidering any award that might have been made by the Court in this case. As Chairman of the Committee to which this petition had been referred, he did not agree to the report himself, and he pointed out the necessity of allotting more land in the South Island to the Natives. There was nothing to satisfy these claims, as to the justice of which there appeared to him to be a very high degree of probability, if not of certainty.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA would like to give some explanation as to the motion he had moved. The application for a rehearing was made within the three months specified by the regulations of the Native Land Courts. But no reply had even been received to that application. If the Council were to see a copy of the evidence taken in the Court it would be found that the evidence given by witnesses was accepted as being correct, and that some of the principal owners of that land gave written promises and invitations to the petitioners to participate in these reserves; and the owners of that land had asked outside Natives, such as the petitioners, to contribute funds towards the improvement of these reserves. Under the Act of 1865 these reserves were made for only ten persons or less, and it was given to them and their heirs; and an Act was passed in 1868 enabling these lands to be dealt with, in order that the people might be allowed to have shares in these reserves. And if honourable members would look at clause 9 of "The Native Equitable Owners Act, 1886," it would be seen that the Court had not dealt correctly with these reserves. It was there stated that promises made by the Natives entitled to these reserves should be carried out; but that had not been done by the Court. And the persons for whom these reserves were set apart had not been receiving any of the rent during the last thirty years, the other persons having been receiving it all. Natives from different parts had been admitted into these reserves, whereas those Natives who were found on the place when the Hon. Mr. Mantell made his list had been excluded. He thought perhaps he had better withdraw the motion, out of pure shame, for the Government had made such small reserves there that he did not think they would now amount to seven acres per individual. In withdrawing this motion, he trusted to the Government to take some steps with regard to the question.

Motion withdrawn.

PARLIAMENTARY HONORARIUM AND PRIVILEGES ACT.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS desired to ask the Hon. the Attorney-General a question without notice. He noticed in the Parliamentary Honorarium and Privileges Act, passed this session, clause 2, subsection (2), the following proviso: "Provided that in the case of any members of the General Assembly residing within three miles of the building wherein the General Assembly is assembled the expenses allowed shall only be twenty-five pounds." He would like to know whether this applied to members of both Houses, or whether it only applied to members of the House of Representatives.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER replied that that was not a clause that he could give an interpretation of. It was a clause which would have to be interpreted by the Court or by the Hon. the Speaker. His opinion on the point would not determine the matter one way or the other.

PUBLIC BODIES' POWERS BILL.

This Bill was read a first time.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS, in moving the second reading of the Bill, might say that it had been introduced in fulfilment of a promise that he gave to the Council that the best the Government could do in this matter would be done this session. The principal object of the Bill was to do what they engaged to attempt to do—namely, to place the lessors and lessees in the case of lands in the hands of public bodies in the same position as private landlords and private lessees were in. It would be seen, in reference to the Bill, that effect was given to this object by the 5th and 10th clauses, and the 5th clause gave power to grant leases and renew leases upon such terms as might appear reasonable; and there was also power, in the 5th clause, to provide for payment upon valuation by the incoming tenant for improvements. This provision was no doubt familiar to honourable gentlemen, and it had been considered advisable to introduce it into this Bill. In the 6th clause the same provisions as were contained in the Act of 1886, which was to be repealed by this Bill, were preserved, with the addition that the principle of tender was introduced. The other clauses were mostly the same as in the Act of 1886; but in clause 8 there was provision for granting yearly tenancy by public tender, or by auction, or by private contract. The term "private contract" was a new term; but, as it only applied to yearly tenancies, it did not seem to be open to any objection. The 10th clause was a very important provision, inasmuch as it gave power to make allowances to tenants for rent due, and to reduce the rent; and he looked upon this as being, in fact, one of the most important provisions of the Bill, because the whole object of it was to give relief. The rest of the Bill was mostly the Act of 1886 re-enacted; and there was a provision in clause 15 limiting the length of time for which a lease, under certain circumstances, might be given to twenty-one years, instead of fifty years as provided in the existing Act. Fifty years was considered too long, and twenty-one years was considered sufficient, and reasonable, and satisfactory. There was one new provision to which he must call the attention of honourable members. In the Harbours Act of last year a piece of what was really retrospective legislation was given effect to. Certain overdrafts existed at the time the Act was passed, and the Act imposed heavy penalties on those Boards which continued to make overdrafts. It was not intended, however, that public bodies with overdrafts prior to the passing of the Act should be liable to those penalties, and this was merely to put them in a fair position in regard to those overdrafts, in order that they might not be proceeded against by the Audit Department for not complying with the provisions of the Harbours Act of last year. There was in clause 17 a new provision, but it was one which proceeded from the nature of the Bill, being a provision for making allowances to any mortgager who might have purchased any land from a public authority and have executed a mortgage to such authority for any part of the purchase-money: so that, in point of fact, so far as he understood that clause, it was simply to put them in the same position which they had previously occupied. He believed he had explained the intention of the Bill, and he therefore moved, That the Bill be read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE thought clause 5 provided for the indefinite renewal of leases, though he did not know whether it was intended to do this. This might lead to the nature of a permanent lease, the terms of renewal of which were to be decided every twenty-one years. Now, his honourable friend, he believed—though he did not catch his words very well—did not refer to a clause which had led to a change in the definition of “leasing authority.” He noticed that the term “leasing authority” in this Bill was of a wider scope than the term “leasing authority” as used in the Act repealed. In the Act of 1886 “leasing authority” was confined to what might be called the local bodies. It was defined to mean,—

“... the Council of a borough or county, a Road Board, Town Board, Harbour Board, respectively, in whom the management or control of any lands are vested for or on behalf of any of the corporate bodies such Councils or Boards represent; and also any authority (howsoever named) in whom any lands are vested for general educational purposes, or for the purposes of any public college or school, with power to dispose of such lands by way of lease.”

Here the definition went beyond that, and it extended the provisions of this measure to bodies intrusted with purposes of a public nature. He did not know what the effect of that would be as regards various reserves which they had set aside in different parts of the colony—what would be the result of these two clauses: the 5th clause and the “leasing authority” definition. He thought there were some reserves in the neighbourhood of Oamaru, for instance, of a pastoral character, and he asked if it was intended by the operation of these two clauses that tenants in those cases might have indefinite or perpetual leases of all those large tracts of country, subject simply to renewal for twenty-one years. There were reserves of an extensive character in other parts of the country—university reserves and educational reserves of a very extensive character in the Province of Otago; likewise educational reserves in the North Island. He very much doubted the propriety in many instances of giving these permanent leases over reserves of such an extensive character. Perhaps his honourable friend would be able to show, in Committee, that such powers might safely be intrusted to the leasing authorities.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS did not think there was any fear of these powers being abused. He pointed to the Otago reserves, and said it had been a rule always to let at the end of twenty-one years, when all the improvements were valued, and the land was also valued; the rental of the land was then put up to auction, and the incoming tenant had to pay for the improvements. There could be no great difficulty—

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said that provision was overridden in the present Bill.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said he did not understand it in that way. The result was that all the Corporation leases, the Church Board property leases, and even private leases, were granted in the same way; and there had never been the least difficulty in regard to the renewal of the leases. If the property was more valuable than it was when the original lease was granted, the ground-rent might be raised to four or five times the amount at which it was previously let. There had been many cases where this had happened. After valuation the property was put up to auction, and the highest bidder got the new lease for twenty-one years.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE said his honourable friend was mistaken upon that point.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said he was very much mistaken if the Act did not provide as he had stated. The honourable gentleman had referred to the words of the 5th section,— of leasing. He did not think there could be any objection to granting leases in perpetuity, provided that the land was valued every twenty-one years. He did not think there could be any difficulty at all in doing so. Some leases were granted for fourteen years, others for twenty-one years, and others for forty years. There was a very large portion of this colony affected by this measure, and if the Legislature was to give public bodies the principle of local government those bodies should be allowed to carry that out to the fullest extent they desired to do.

“A leasing authority may let any lands vested in it, or any part thereof, and which it is empowered to let on lease, for any term not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession within six months from the making of the lease without any fine, premium, or foregift, and may in such lease covenant to grant renewals from time to time for a period not exceeding twenty-one years, but at a rent to be fixed by the leasing authority by a special resolution, or by valuation, or by arbitration. Any such lease may provide for the payment of valuation by the incoming tenant for improvements made upon the land by any outgoing tenant.”

That carried out the leasing regulations in the Provincial District of Otago, and he believed it was a most satisfactory provision, and as applicable to public bodies as it was to private individuals. He always preferred letting his own land in that way. He found it was a general rule so to grant leases in Otago, and he believed it would be adopted by the rest of the colony when they came to know the advantage to be derived from such a system.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES thought the leasing authorities should have power, in dealing with public reserves, to relax the conditions from time to time when those conditions were so stringent that the tenants could not comply with them. He had had occasion to say before that agriculture was not the same as it was four or five years ago, and that it was not possible to obtain the same results from the cultivation of the land as it was then; therefore it was quite right that the leasing authorities should be in a position to give the tenants some relief. The Public Bodies' Leaseholds Act was framed in a great measure on the same lines as this Bill, but it had some objectionable features in it which precluded it from being brought extensively into operation or being acted upon as it would have been had it all the advantages which this Bill had. In fact, it had not the same capacity as this Bill, and leasing bodies desirous of acting under it were unable to give that full measure of relief which in many cases they were quite satisfied ought to be given. Now, he thought it was quite right that a measure with such an object as this should have a wider extension than the Public Bodies' Leaseholds Act. In reference to the definition of "leasing authority," he thought it meant all public bodies having the control of public reserves. Then, clause 5 was one of the clauses which had survived, with some slight alteration, from the other Bill. It provided that a leasing authority might lease for a term of twenty-one years, and that at the end of that period the improvements which had been made by the tenant should be valued when the land was relet, the incoming tenant, if it should be another tenant, taking the improvements at a valuation. This was a common practice, and did not appear to be open to objection; but some honourable members seemed to think that the clause gave a sort of claim to the tenant for a re-lease of the property. But if honourable members would read clause 6 they would see that the Bill provided that that should not take place. It provided that the lease might be sold by auction or tender, but it was to be sold publicly, and consequently it was open to any one to bid, and the occupant was no more entitled to a re-lease than any one else, and would not be able to secure a fresh lease unless he was prepared to give increased rent. That was the principle laid down—that, in reletting the land, it should be done publicly. His honourable friend Mr. Mantell had drawn his attention to clause 7, and he thought that if the honourable gentleman had carefully read that clause he would have seen that every lease must be offered to the public; but, in the event of any land being offered by public auction or public tender and no one taking it up at the upset price, then it would be possible to sell it by private contract; but in every case the land must be first offered to the public. The provision for reletting by private contract was necessary in the interests of the lessor, in order that the land should not remain unoccupied until every effort had been made to let it publicly. The Bill was a very great improvement upon the existing Act, and gave far greater advantages to leasing authorities, and enabled them to relax the conditions of the leases when the tenants were unable to comply with them. There were one or two things in the Bill which he would like to see amended; but, from communications he had had with the framer of the Bill, the amendments he desired to see could be proposed in Committee. There was one clause to which he took very great exception, and that was the last clause; but, seeing this was matter of detail, it could be referred to in Committee. He intended to support the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN thought this measure was a measure of necessity just now. The Government, like public bodies and private bodies, must be compelled to take a lower rental, under the altered circumstances of the colony, than was formerly paid. Somehow or other, public bodies did not seem to have that full sense of responsibility in dealing with these matters which, as a rule, appertained to them; and he would like to see in this Bill something which was not provided in it, and that was that the resolutions of these bodies should get publicity. So long as publicity was given to their intention to take certain action in regard to certain leases, it would then be open to the public to object to their proposals before they were carried out.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS said these Boards were always open to the public, and that the proceedings in Otago were always reported in the newspapers.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN had not noticed it, and he had watched the papers as much as any one. He thought the omission of a provision as to publicity was a defect in the Bill. As to the clause of the Bill to which the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse took particular objection, that provision was in force in the South in connection with the Harbour Boards and City Councils, and it had worked particularly well. As the Hon. Mr. Reynolds had explained, it was purely a lease for twenty-one years, with valuation for improvements. At the end of twenty-one years the improvements were valued, the property was then put up to auction, and every one had a right to bid for it. The only thing was that if a new tenant came in he had to pay for the improvements. He thought it was a very fair way of dealing with these leases: at all events, it had worked particularly well in the South, and he did not see why it should not work as well in one place as in another. As to the objection taken to clause 7, this clause was the usual provision which was put in such Bills. If his honourable friend would consider how publicity could best be given to the proceedings, and would make provision in that direction, he thought the Bill would be a very good measure, and that it was absolutely necessary in the present circumstances of the colony.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK did not think there was any special occasion to have publicity given to these proceedings. He had had some experience of local institutions, and he thought they were just as careful as the Legislative Council. As to publicity, the newspaper reporters had access to the meetings of these institutions.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN had not such implicit confidence in the wisdom and, possibly, the entire honesty of these institutions as his honourable friend had. His experience was that if local bodies were given the power of "jobbing" they would "job." He thought the Bill contained several exceedingly objectionable principles. No doubt it gave to local bodies the power to reduce their rents; but sections 9, 10, and 17 all went in the direction of allowing the local body to make any arrangements it chose with the persons who were taking the land from it. In the case of private owners it was no doubt sometimes found necessary and advisable to reduce rents; but a private owner first said to his tenant, "If you do not choose to pay this rent, somebody else will." A private owner looked about, and if he found anybody equally acceptable who would give a better rent he immediately made terms with the tenant who would pay the better rent. He thought the fair-lease system was one of the most detestable things which had ever been introduced. As far as this system of fair-leasing had been introduced in the Bill, he thought it was so objectionable that he felt he could hardly support the Bill. Perhaps the objections he had indicated could be removed, but, unless that were done, he would certainly be prepared to see the Bill read a second time that day three months. The principle of fair-leasing was simply attempting to regulate the price of a thing by Act of Parliament, and as long as the laws of political economy lasted it was absolutely impossible that they could fix, by legislation, rent or anything else. They were allowing all sorts of local bodies, subject to all sorts of local influences, just to make any pleasing little bargain they might choose. Unless the honourable member could show that the objectionable clauses would be modified in the direction he had pointed out, he (Mr. Pharazyn) would certainly oppose the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said the provision mentioned by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse in the 3rd clause—namely, "or for any other purpose of a public nature"—was intended to be wide and to include all lands in which there could be public interest. It was considered that the provisions of this Bill might be beneficially applied to all the interests concerned in those lands; and that, as there was a provision in the Bill leaving it with the Governor—that was, of course, the Ministry of the day—to say to what cases the Act should apply, there could be no possible injury in this respect. The Hon. Mr. McLean had spoken of the necessity of publicity being given to all the operations of the governing body; and the honourable gentleman stated that, amongst other cases, wherever they reduced rents public notice should be given of it. He (Mr. Stevens) could hardly conceive a more extraordinary proceeding than this: that there should be a public notification, say, by the Board of Governors of some high school, of their intention to reduce the rent of Mr. A. B. on such-and-such a day. The honourable member was good enough to suggest that this would give the public an opportunity of coming in and objecting. He did not know who the public would be in those circumstances, but it appeared to him that the proper persons, in such a case, would be those who were the landlords, and he believed they would exercise a reasonable discretion in the matter. But to have the public protesting against the granting of the renewal of a lease or the modification of the terms of a lease did not appear to him to be quite admissible. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse spoke of the provisions for granting leases by way of renewal from time to time. There was in the 5th clause of the existing Act power to grant renewals from time to time—that was, after the expiration of twenty-one years, for a similar period—and provision was made for payment for improvements. The Bill was rather wide in its terms, and it was intended to be so: at all events, it expressed more clearly that intention. His honourable friend was probably familiar with what was termed "a Glasgow lease:" that was, to put it briefly, a lease in which the land was periodically revalued separately from the improvements. The improvements were separately valued, and the existing lessee, if he chose to give the rent at which it was valued by arbitration, had the right of continuing his tenancy; and, if he did not, the incoming tenant paid the outgoing tenant for the improvements. That system had been adopted in many parts of the colony by local bodies, and, he believed, with great advantage. The intention was that something of that kind should be left in the hands of the leasing body to adopt if they thought it was in the interest of the estate. It was not intended to tie up local bodies in such a manner that they could do nothing. It was intended that they should be able to make arrangements for the benefit of the estate generally, and not do what the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn suggested—seek for the very best rent, no matter whether the existing lessee was turned into the street. That was what the honourable gentleman meant by his remarks—that it was the duty of the local governing body, if it could possibly get a better rent from somebody else, to evict the existing tenant, no matter what the hardship or the circumstances might be. He hardly thought it likely that his honourable friend's view would be generally adopted. If he thought it would be generally adopted then he should altogether refuse to entertain the opinion expressed by the Council about two weeks before, when he was begged to get a measure introduced which would enable these governing bodies to deal with their tenants in a fair spirit and relieve them from very serious difficulties. That was, in the main, the object of the introduction of this Bill, and he understood that that view was assented to by the Council. If he had not thought so he should never have given any encouragement to his colleagues in another Chamber to take a great deal of trouble and pains to have this measure introduced and to carry it; nor should he have thought of presenting it to the notice of the Council. It had come to him as a great surprise to find that they were to go back entirely to the old position, in which they were to do nothing to relieve these tenants, but absolutely to leave the governing bodies, which were anxious to give relief to their tenants, without power to give fair and reasonable terms, in times of great difficulty. He was not prepared to adopt that view, nor did he think the Council was prepared to do so. Hence the Bill, which he trusted the Council would now read a second time.

Bill read a second time.

SOUTH ISLAND (WESTLAND AND NELSON) NATIVE RESERVES BILL.

This Bill was read a first time.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER, in moving the second reading, said,—Honourable members will no doubt remember that this Bill has been more than once before the Council, and that the last time it unfortunately got into the same position in which it is now, to a certain extent—that is, it came on very late in the session, when there was no time to deal with it satisfactorily. The object of the Bill is to make provisions in conformity with the wishes of the Natives and Europeans. I do not think I need go through clause after clause. If the Council will allow it to go into Committee, we shall be able to consider the clauses; and explanations, if any are required, will be afforded.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.—Sir, I am surprised to find that the title of this Bill has been altered. I first saw it as "the South Island Native Reserves Bill." Now it is confined to the Westland and Nelson reserves. It had been my intention to move an amendment in Committee, which I think I shall now be debarred from doing, since the title of the Bill has been altered. I think that will be the result of this change of title, because the amendment I wished to put in was that "The Native Lands Administration Act, 1886," should not apply to land in the Middle Island of New Zealand and in Stewart Island; and I think that would hardly come in under the present title of the Bill. I wished to have inserted that amendment because the Natives of the Middle Island are quite ignorant as to how their land really stands now, and how far it will be affected by that Act. I have already explained to this Council that the Administration Act of 1886 was framed especially to apply to the North Island, and that its provisions should never have been extended to the Middle Island. Nothing has been done by the Government for the Natives of the Middle Island, and now a Bill is brought forward which is only intended to give relief to Europeans. I therefore trust that the Council will consent either to alter the title of the Bill, or else to allow this amendment to be inserted in the Bill as it stands. I have already explained to the Council that no harm can come by such an amendment. As coming from the other Island, I feel it my duty to bring this forward and to show that the Natives of the other Island are suffering wrong. The Bill only applies to certain reserves, and is intended to benefit the Europeans there. I wish my amendment to extend to the Natives outside these particular reserves. Both the Bill and my amendment apply to the Middle Island. The Council may suppose that I am misunderstanding my position; but I wish to make known the wants of my people, and I shall continue to advocate their case whenever I feel called upon to do so. I trust the Government will agree to my request, for, if not, I can assure them the Bill will never pass. I am not making any exorbitant demand now, and I think it is quite right this want should be attended to. If the title of the Bill excludes the amendment I propose, then I would move that the title be altered to what it stood originally. I see several things which I object to in the Bill, but my principal desire is to have this amendment inserted; and also I have scarcely had time to peruse the amendments which were made in the Bill, which I have only seen to-day: and I trust this will be agreed to.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—This is the Bill which came to the Council from the House of Representatives. If the honourable member thinks proper, he can, in Committee, move any amendment; and he can also move, as a consequential amendment, the alteration of the title.

Bill read a second time and committed.

IN COMMITTEE.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA moved the addition of a new clause as follows:—"The Native Lands Administration Act, 1886," shall not apply to lands in the Middle Island of New Zealand and Stewart Island."

The Committee divided on the question.—"That the clause be added to the Bill."

Clause rejected.

Hon. Mr. Stevens

Bill reported, and read a third time.

On the question, That the Bill do now pass, The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA said,—Sir, I am not yet satisfied with the reasons that have been given for not allowing my amendment to be made in this Bill. I would therefore beg to call your attention to the fact that there is not a quorum of the Council present.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I understand there is more than a quorum.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I would say, as I had not an opportunity of speaking when we were considering the proposition, my reason for voting against this proposition has been that it is proposed to introduce into this Bill, which affects only the Westland and Nelson Districts, a provision extending all over the other Island. It seems to me that this provision is entirely outside this Bill; and it is for that reason, and not because I do not sympathize with my honourable friend in his efforts, that I thought it my duty to vote against it.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.—Sir, I would state that I have not had an opportunity of properly seeing the amendments which have been made in this Bill. They have not been printed and translated, and the copy of the Bill which I had in speaking is headed "South Island Native Reserves Bill;" and now, this evening, since I have been discussing the matter, I am told that the title of the Bill is altered to "Westland and Nelson Native Reserves Bill." I will not agree to the passing of this Bill, which applies to me, as I am one of the owners of this reserve. Clause 21 refers to 500 acres at Grey-mouth, and I am the principal owner of that reserve; and this is bringing in a Bill that applies to me personally, and I will not submit to this in silence. I said that, if my amendment were passed, I would agree to the Bill. I would remind the Council that this Bill is being passed specially affecting me, and yet the provisions of it seem to treat me, Taiaroa, as though I were not a being. I will therefore move, That this Bill be read the third time this day three weeks.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—The honourable gentleman will understand that the question of the third reading is passed. The question now before the Council is, "That the Bill do now pass."

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.—Sir, I thought this was the third reading of the Bill, and that I was in order in making this motion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—As I have explained to the honourable member, the question was, in the first place, "That the Bill be read a third time." That was passed. The present question is, "That the Bill do now pass." It is quite competent for the honourable member to speak on that; but it is not competent to move that the Bill be read the third time at a future date, for the opportunity for that has passed.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.—Can I not move that the Council do adjourn?

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—It is perfectly in order to do so.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.—I beg to move, That the Council do now adjourn.

Motion negatived.

Bill passed.

NAVAL AND MILITARY SETTLERS' AND VOLUNTEERS' LAND BILL.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER had no doubt honourable members had not forgotten that this had been the subject of agitation for a great number of years. A Commission was appointed some time ago for the purpose of dealing with these claims. It was found that a great number of claims had to be satisfied in some way or another; but nothing had been done further than making the inquiry, and naturally the parties were anxious that matters should be finally settled. The object of this Bill was to deal with these claims. There was one special provision—that the Government might satisfy claims in cash, provided they did not pay more than 50 per cent. of the nominal amount of the scrip; and the object was to satisfy those claims by granting money instead land-scrip. It was found that people often disposed of this scrip at almost any price. It would be beneficial to the country as well as to the people themselves that they should have an opportunity of realising, and the Government should have the power to satisfy the claims of those who deserved it by granting 50 per cent. of the nominal value of the scrip. That was the principal matter of importance in the Bill. This Bill, so far as the Commission was concerned, would wind the matter up.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS would say, before the question was put, he thought it would be well that a Bill like this should be introduced at an early period of the session. There were some things of an objectionable nature in this Bill. The preamble stated,—

"... further evidence has been adduced by or on behalf of the persons mentioned in the Second Schedule in substantiation of their claims, and the same have been proved to the satisfaction of the Defence Minister to the extent in the said schedule mentioned."

They all knew what was meant by "to the satisfaction of the Defence Minister." He suggested it meant "to the satisfaction of the department." If it was found necessary to appoint a Commission on the previous occasion to go into all these claims, he did not think it should be left to the Defence Minister to settle the claims that had been rejected by the Commission. He thought that it would be better to let this Bill stand over till next session. He did not think honourable members had time to go thoroughly into the Bill, and he trusted the Hon. the Attorney-General would not object to holding it over for another session. He would move, pro forma, That the Bill be read the second time that day six months. He thought this was a Bill that ought not to be hastily passed. At an early part of the session the Council had little or nothing to do, and the Bill ought to have been introduced in the Council, and sent down to the other branch of the Legislature. It should go to the Waste Lands Committee and be thoroughly examined before it was passed.

The Hon. Mr. McLEAN would like a little longer time to study a Bill of this sort. From former experience of what became of land-scrip granted under this system, they should be very cautious before they allowed that experience to be repeated—they should certainly never submit again to what had occurred in the past. In former years land-scrip was granted to Volunteers who served a certain period, and the giving of that scrip did not tend to promote settlement at all, or to make settlers of the Volunteers who got it. The practice was to sell the scrip at from 2s. 6d. to 10s. in the pound, and a large amount of it got into the hands of one man, who used it at its par value in paying for Government land. He was afraid, despite any safeguards, that that was what would happen with the scrip issued under this Bill. This Bill did not deal with all claims; there were a lot more to come, including those of old soldiers who had forfeited their land through technicalities and no fault of their own, and who claimed now to be reinstated. He would like to see this matter held over: it was not fair to go on with it in the last hour of the session. The list of claims was a very long one, and after the claimants had waited so long they could wait four months longer without any loss. He moved, That the debate be adjourned.

The Council divided on the question, "That the debate be adjourned."

PROPERTY-TAX BILL.

On the question, That this Bill be committed,

Mr. TURNBULL said,—Before that is put, I should like to make a few remarks upon the amendment which I have placed upon the Order Paper. The object of the amendment is to endeavour to meet the case of absentee proprietors, and the amendment is as follows:—

"Every person who has resided in the colony for six months during the twelve months previous to the date of the property-tax being payable shall, if he pays the tax on the due date thereof, be entitled to a deduction therefrom of twenty per centum."

Of course I admit that this is a clumsy way of getting at the question, and I have no doubt that the Premier, when the amendment is moved, will object to it, and say that it gives an appearance which it ought not to give, of our taxation being much heavier than it should be. There were one or two objections made when the amendment was suggested. I gathered from the remarks of honourable members who addressed the House that their objection is that the amendment applies to a great extent to money which is invested here in the colony: but, at the same time, when we consider that this amounts to really one-ninth or, at least, to one-tenth of the taxable property in the colony which is now bearing so small a share of taxation, it appears to me that it certainly should pay some additional sum. Of course many honourable members will have noticed the state of affairs at Home—that the rate of interest is very much less than it was, and that there is a proposal now on the part of the British Government to reduce the interest on Consols  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The argument that money should not pay to the extent that real property pays does not apply, because real property must bear its local burdens, but money bears no taxation whatever. This is a question of very great importance; but I am afraid it is too late in the session to expect anything to come of it, and, as honourable members wish to get through the business in Committee, I will only move my amendment and take a vote upon it.

Mr. TANNER.—Before going into Committee on the Property-tax Bill I desire to make a statement. When the House had the Bill under consideration the other evening the honourable member for Inangahua mentioned me by name, and read an extract from a newspaper which reflected both on the Property-tax Department and on myself, inasmuch as it stated I had sold land for a high price which had been grossly undervalued—in fact, that I had sold land at the rate of over £212 an acre which was valued for property-tax purposes at £18 an acre. The land referred to is a portion of a block that I laid out in small-farm sections of 100 acres each, which I advertised, and which were open for sale seven months at £5 an acre on deferred payments. This occurred between two and three years after I had purchased this land—known as the Heretaunga Block—from the Natives. Some of these sections were taken up, and some were not; and the land under discussion was some of the latter. I have had this land laid out in town and suburban sections, which realised at auction an average of about £120 an acre, and not £212, as stated, and the land was assessed by the Property-tax Department at £115 an acre, and not at £18 an acre as stated; and here I will read from the property-tax paper which I now have in my possession: “316 acres 1 rood 20 perches, part Heretaunga Block, £36,340”—upon which amount I have paid my property-tax. So much, then, for the newspaper reports. One of the hundred-acre small-farm sections which I sold on deferred payments at £5 an acre—half of which I took out in contract ploughing—was laid out some time subsequently by the purchaser as the Town of Hastings. He gave me altogether for it £500, and sold it for £5,000; and the Borough of Hastings is now assessed at £500,000—showing how rapidly land may rise in value according to circumstances. Had the honourable member mentioned this matter in Committee I should not have referred to it; but, as he mentioned it in the House, and it will appear in Hansard, I considered it due to the department and myself that I should make this explanation.

Clause 2.—Rate of property-tax.

Sir J. VOGEL moved, That, after the word “property,” in the first line of subsection (1), the following words be inserted: “of over two thousand five hundred pounds in value.”

Majority against, 19.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported, and read a third time.

Mr. CADMAN.—I would ask the Premier if he will endeavour to make some provision in the Property-tax Bill which will make it easier for us to get English capital on the goldfields. The present law makes it compulsory for the total value of the shares to be taxed. One company, with a nominal capital of £180,000 and a subscribed capital amounting to something like £20,000, has taken up a mine, and has spent £8,000 or £10,000; but the Property-tax Department comes down and asks the company to pay property-tax on something like £185,000. If this goes on it will choke off foreign capital from being expended on the goldfields.

Major ATKINSON.—I am afraid it would be impossible to rectify the matter this session, because it would be an amendment of the Property-tax Assessment Act. I shall be very glad to consider it, and if I can see my way to giving relief I shall be very glad to do so.

Bill passed.

EDUCATION.

Mr. O'CONOR explained that he had “paired” with the honourable member for Tuapeka on the educational proposals of the Government against the proposed reductions, and, as the “pair” had not appeared in Hansard, he wished now to have it recorded.

NATIVE LAND COURT BILL.

Mr. HISLOP.—In the absence of the Minister of Native Affairs, I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. The Bill is merely supplemental to other Bills passed by this House, and relates merely to procedure. It is a technical Bill, and therefore it is not necessary for me to give any further explanations concerning it.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I should like to ask the Premier if the Government agree to the request of Paora Tuhaere and other chiefs. The request is that the Government shall pass my Bill called the Maori Relief Bill. Before speaking on these Bills, I should like the Premier to answer that question.

Major ATKINSON.—The Bill of the honourable gentleman would be utterly useless. His Bill is a mere scrap of a Bill, and would not provide anything. The position which the Government have taken up with regard to this matter is quite clear—that we should make temporary provision only to do justice to people who were suffering from our past legislation, the Government undertaking to show the Bill to the Maoris for them to see that what we proposed was only temporary and reasonable. The honourable gentleman seems to have got a section of Natives to agree to his own Bill, which is legislation of a permanent character, and which would not even carry out the objects which the honourable gentleman appears to have. The Government have strictly carried out their engagements. They proposed to make temporary provision, and asked the Natives to examine their proposal, so that they might see it was of a temporary and reasonable character. The honourable gentleman, because he will not get his own Bill, says he will not assist the Government to get their Bills through. Under the circumstances, I think the House will see that the Government have done all they could to consult the Natives in this matter. During the recess they will prepare measures and will ask the co-operation of the Natives in order to do what is reasonable and right. In the meantime, I would ask that fair and reasonable provision be made for those who are suffering from our past legislation.

Mr. HUTCHISON. — I think the Colonial Secretary has hardly treated the House with the consideration which the importance of this Bill deserves. He has stated that this Native Land Court Act Amendment Bill is a mere supplementary measure. As I read it, it is nothing of the sort. It appears not so boldly objectionable, if I may use the term, as containing provisions which are anything but supplementary to the present law, unless under the term "supplementary" we are to consider almost anything that may be in the way of addition, however obnoxious. I should have supposed the Colonial Secretary would at least have considered some explanation necessary to the House with respect to sections 2 and 3 of this Bill. If I am not mistaken in my reading of the Native Land Court Act of last year, which this is proposed to amend, that was a mere machinery Bill, dealing with the procedure of a Court, but not dealing with titles. Another Act, called the Administration Act, by its very name indicates how titles were to be completed. I would ask the Colonial Secretary to inform the House what is the meaning of sections 2 and 3 of this Bill. They may deal, no doubt, only with conveyancing, and, presumably, only with the fee-simple of land; but legislation has hitherto hedged round dealings in Native lands with exceptional and necessary precautions. Deeds had to be executed in a particular way: the Natives signing had the transaction explained to them by a licensed interpreter, and the execution was witnessed by an official—ordinarily a Justice of the Peace—and an adult male witness. That, no doubt, has been swept away by the repeal of the various Acts last year; but the repeal of those Acts was coincident with the passing of that other Act which superseded all these formalities and precautions, inasmuch as it took the execution of deeds out of the hands of the Natives altogether, and left the transactions to pass the ordeal of a committee and afterwards to be given effect to by a Commissioner. I ask the attention of the House to these two clauses, which I consider most insidious in their operation; and their very presence in this Bill suggests something that is covert and undesirable. If there were any necessity for such clauses, their place is in the Native Land Administration Act Repeal Bill, and not in the Native Land Court Bill where we find them. Following the remarks I have just made as to the former safeguards and formalities in the execution of Native deeds, I would point out that under these clauses by the mere execution of conveyances land would pass, and pass with even greater facility than in transactions between Europeans. I will first quote section 2 of this Bill; and I draw attention to the words "certificate of title," because they indicate a mere transition state of title to Native land, the completion being a Crown grant, before the issue of which hitherto there could have been no dealings with the land except with the consent of the whole of the owners of the land—the Crown grant, when issued without restrictions, carrying the ordinary incidents of an absolute grant. I will read the clause:—

"Any conveyance of land held by memorial of ownership or certificate of title issued by the Native Land Court executed since the thirtieth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, may be lodged with a Native Land Court Registrar, together with a true copy of such deed and of any indorsements thereon; and it shall be a duty of such Registrar to make a minute of the contents of such deed upon any memorial or certificate of title in his custody and having relation to the land the subject of such deed."

That clause gives even greater facility for the completion of transactions in Native lands than exists as to transactions between Europeans, and in that respect is in startling contrast with the whole series of Acts which up to last year had been devised and were in operation for the protection of the Natives. But it is more astonishing still to see the further facility the next section gives for the completion of transactions:—

"Where one such deed or several such deeds together effect a conveyance of the entire area held under a certificate or memorial it shall be a duty of the Chief Judge, at the expiration of three months from the lodging of such deed, or from the last of such lodgments where more than one, to forward such deed or deeds to the Minister of Lands, with such report as he may deem fit, and particulars of any unexpired leases of such land registered in the Native Land Court. Thereon a warrant for the issue of a certificate of title under 'The Land Transfer Act, 1885,' may issue to the person entitled under such deed or deeds. Such warrant shall be accompanied by the particulars of leases as aforesaid, if any."

Here is a second step, and for the first time in the history of our Native-land legislation the Minister of Lands has something to do with it. The Chief Judge sends the deeds and a report to the Minister of Lands and "particulars of any unexpired leases of such lands registered in the Native Land Court." Among the formalities which up to 1886 were rendered compulsory for the protection of the Natives in the execution of deeds there was this: It was required that all transactions between Natives and Europeans should be submitted to a Commissioner appointed under the Native Lands Frauds Prevention Act—a most suggestive title—and that official had to be satisfied as to the propriety of the transaction, and his sanction, his imprimatur, had to be given before the transaction could have any effect. Since 1878 the Court also had to satisfy itself of the fairness of each transaction. The 3rd clause of this Bill would do away with that. The 2nd section does away with all formalities heretofore necessary in the execution of Native deeds; and the 3rd section sweeps away the safeguards of the inquiry before the

Commissioner, and absolutely makes title to Native land complete by the deeds passing through what I may designate as a mere machine—you put the deed into one end and it comes out at the other, at the end of three months, a complete Land Transfer title, without the least check or supervision, or protection of the interests of the Native owners. And yet the Colonial Secretary calmly brings down a Bill with such provisions as these, and says to the House that it does not require any explanation—that it is merely supplementary to the present law. It is supplementary, but to a revolutionary extent, and to an extent such as I think this House will not lend itself to sanctioning. That is the first phase of the Bill; and there is another. There is a provision which I must ask the permission of the House to consider. I refer to section 5—and I would mention that “the said Act” means the Native Land Court Act of last year; it reads,—

“An order made under the said Act in favour of a Native may direct that the title given by or to be derived under such order shall or shall not be subject to any, and, if any, to what, restrictions on alienation, and that whether the title to the land partitioned was or was not theretofore subject to any such restrictions; and land the subject of an order directing restrictions on alienation shall be thereafter held subject to such restrictions, and any Crown grant thereof shall be made subject thereto.”

There is a flood of words! but the meaning of them is that the Court may revise any recommendation previously made on a certificate of title with respect to restrictions, and, if it thinks proper, may sweep these restrictions away. Now, these restrictions are in the form of recommendations to the Governor. By the Native Land Court Acts, from 1863 onwards, these were most valuable and necessary safeguards to the Natives interested in the land. Under the Act of 1863, supplemented by the Act of 1865, the names of all owners in any block dealt with by the Court were required to be recorded by the Court; but by the provisions of the Acts of both 1863 and 1865 no more than ten names could be inserted in the certificate. Those ten, according to all principles of equity and natural justice, would be considered to be the trustees of those not named in the certificate, sometimes amounting to over a hundred. Yet the practice has been, as often as it could be followed, to treat with these ten as if they were the owners in fee-simple of the land; and most transactions in the past have been of that character,—these ten receiving the whole of the purchase-money in the transaction, and either doling it out in very small portions to the others, or, more often, retaining the whole of it themselves. The only protection the other owners had was the strength of these restrictions or recommendations embodied in the certificate, and reliance on the Governor, when issuing the Crown grant, which was the ultimate perfection of the title, inserting a clause against the alienation of land by sale, or mortgage, or lease for more than twenty-one years. Now, there are a great number of blocks of land to which that state of things has applied. The law as to there not being more than ten grantees prevailed up to 1873. Endeavours have been very often made to remove, or to partially remove, these restrictions to the alienation of land. For a period of some twenty years or more certificates of title have been issued by the Native Land Court, bearing its recommendation to the Governor that on the issue of the Crown grant there should be inserted in it such restrictions; but it has often been found in the political history of this country that such recommendations have been ignored; and sometimes even when the restrictions have been acted on they have afterwards been removed. No doubt the Governor may not act—or need not act—on the recommendation. Sometimes the Native Minister of the day, on his own responsibility, has advised the Governor to ignore them; and in some instances, of which we have had evidence quite recently, assurances have been given to intending purchasers that the restrictions would be removed, and it has been found by subsequent investigation that such removal has operated most prejudicially to very many of the Natives interested in the land, quite as much as to the ten or lesser number whose names appeared on the title and who were dealing with the European purchaser. In connection with this subject, a case lately came before the Supreme Court, and it is on this case that all this proposed legislation is stated to be founded. I do not at all admit that the Bills now before the House really are required as a consequence of that case. The case I refer to is that of Seymour versus Macdonald, the plaintiff being an intending purchaser of Native land and the defendant the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court. An application was made to the Supreme Court for a mandamus to compel the Chief Judge to certify, under the Administration Act of last year, to a transaction which the Supreme Court held to be, in its inception and its subsequent progress, illegal. It arose in this way: The land was the subject of a certificate of title which contained a recommendation such as I have mentioned—that on the issue of the Crown grant the Governor should insert a proviso making the land inalienable except by lease for twenty-one years. Yet, in the face of that, the purchaser went on to acquire a title in fee-simple. It was argued that the recommendation was simply a suggestion to the Governor, which he might or might not act upon, and that until he acted upon it Europeans might proceed to endeavour to purchase the land. Now, the view of his Honour Mr. Justice Richmond—before whom that case first came in the Supreme Court—is one which I hope honourable members will bear in mind in dealing with these Native titles. The case is reported in the fifth volume of the New Zealand Law Reports, page 67. The facts were as I have stated, and his Honour Mr. Justice Richmond, in dealing with the recommendation or report in the certificate of title, against alienation, says,—

"It appears to me impossible to contend that the report can be treated as a nullity by the very Court which issued it. True, it is as yet only a recommendation, which the Governor may ultimately decline to act upon; but the Court, having once made such a recommendation, is functus officio in the matter. It would be ultra vires in any Judge of the Court to pretend to anticipate the action of the Governor and take the matter out of His Excellency's hands by allowing alienation. The land must therefore be considered as subject to a restriction precluding alienation within the meaning of section 24" [of "The Native Land Administration Act, 1867"].

This 5th section of the present Bill, as I read it, is a reversal of the law as laid down by Mr. Justice Richmond; and here again I would remind the House that the Colonial Secretary, in introducing the Bill, did not think any explanation necessary, although it is a most revolutionary measure. Is this House, on the last day of its session, to have brought down to it a series of Bills the first and most innocent of which is that now before us? I think the House will not allow itself to be imposed upon in this manner. These Bills were before the Upper House, and were considered by the Native Affairs Committee of that House, and various amendments were made in them; and now they are brought down here at the very end of the session, when it is, of course, out of the question to move that they be remitted to the Native Affairs Committee of this House. It would be merely a useless form. That is only another argument for refusing the Bills altogether. Therefore it is my duty to move, That this Bill be read a second time this day three months. I take this as the first step in the opposition I must offer to all these Bills. I have dealt very shortly with a very large and important subject, and I trust I have shown the importance of the legislation attempted by this Bill. I trust also that I have in some measure shown—what others who may follow me will affirm—that this is not legislation we should deal with at this time, but that it ought, in all justice, to be relegated to another session. If, however, my motion is negatived, I shall still consider it my duty—and there are others who will act with me—to oppose this Bill by every constitutional means. We shall offer the most uncompromising opposition to every one of these Bills.

Mr. FISH.—I do not rise to offer opposition to these Native Bills, for I know very little about them, and honourable members generally have not had time to consider them. But I think the argument of the honourable member for Waitotara—that it is too late in the session for these Bills to be passed—is so good that I shall feel bound to vote for his motion.

Mr. CARROLL.—I quite agree with most of what has fallen from the honourable member for Waitotara. There seems to be a great want in this measure. Our legislation in years past has been in the direction of affording every protection to the Maoris, so that they should not be taken advantage of, as instanced in the case referred to by the honourable member for Waitotara. Finally, however, it was the Native Lands Administration Act that swept away all those measures of protection. Before any transaction was completed or any deed was executed by the Native Land Court it was necessary for the Natives to go before the Trust Commissioner, who was directed to make inquiries into the transactions. That Commissioner had to be perfectly satisfied that the Native signed his name to the deed knowing what he was doing; that he had other land besides that which he wished to sell, to live upon; that he was not holding that land in trust for another; that he had not received as consideration for parting with it arms, ammunition, liquor, et cetera. When the Trust Commissioner, after making these inquiries, was satisfied that the transaction was right, he authorised the deed. Under this law the Maori was amply protected, and had control of his own land; but the Native Lands Administration Act swept all that away: and now I see nothing in this Bill to provide a remedy for that state of things. I should like to have an explanation from the Colonial Secretary with regard to sections 2 and 3. They seem to me to open the door to very questionable transactions, without affording that protection which has always been afforded in the past to the Natives. There is no Trust Commissioner provided for, and there is no machinery at all for the protection of Native lands. The sections simply provide that after a conveyance has been signed by a Native it can be accepted, no matter how it has been signed. I say that is totally unfair, and, unless some provision is made in the measure by which you can revive the old system of protection to the Natives, I shall certainly vote against the second reading.

Mr. SAMUEL.—With the exception of sections 2, 3, and 5, the provisions of this Bill appear to be properly supplementary of the Act of 1866; but with regard to those three sections I think the honourable gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill should have given us some clear explanation, so that we might know exactly what we are doing. Section 2, I think, would be an extremely improper section to enact, unless the date of the execution of the deeds therein referred to were changed from the 30th September, 1866, to the 1st January, 1867. By "The Native Land Administration Act, 1866," it was competent for Europeans to purchase lands from the Natives, and, as has been pointed out, the deeds then executed had to be examined in the manner provided. Previously the transaction could be inquired into by the Frauds Commissioner, and it required his signature before a deed could be registered. That provision, however, was swept away by the Native Land Administration Act, and it was provided by that Act that thereafter no dealings should take place between Natives and Europeans except in the manner prescribed by the Act. That Act, however, did not come into force until the 1st January, 1887. If, then, this section had provided that all deeds executed after the 1st January, 1887, were to be dealt with in the manner provided the section would be understandable, for it would refer to deeds executed under the Act of 1886, and also deeds executed to the Crown, in neither of which cases would there be any objection. If, however, this section is to apply to deeds executed prior to "The Native Land Administration Act, 1886," I cannot see anything in it which should recommend it to us. With regard to section 5, that also seems to me to require explanation; but I am led to presume that it is merely intended to give power to the Native Land Court to free the persons negotiating for land from the restrictions which obtained over persons who held the land previously and who are deceased. As the older Natives pass away, and younger Natives come to exercise their rights over the land in a better manner than in the past, it might be well to take away the restrictions upon their dealing with their lands, and it might be well that the Court should have power to free from the restrictions the persons who had previously held the land. If this is the object of the clause, it certainly should have been explained to us. What is more, I am strongly of opinion that we should have had time to see whether it would have any other effect than that—possibly a bad effect. It is very dangerous to tinker with our legislation, as we have been doing for the last two or three years in regard to Native lands; and it is time that the Government took the whole matter into consideration, and, instead of, at the end of the session, introducing exceptional legislation in a manner which may injure both Natives and Europeans, they should bring before the House a well-considered system of allowing these lands to be disposed of for settlement without doing injury to the Natives and with their full concurrence. I trust that the Bill will not be ordered to be read a second time this day six months, but that it will go into Committee, and that the clauses other than those that I have mentioned will become law, because they contain most useful and valuable amendments.

Mr. TANNER.—The honourable members who have already spoken have referred to the Native Lands Frauds Prevention Act as one that would be repealed by this Bill, or, rather, by another that is to come on. I am one of those who agree that, if this second Bill to which I have referred is passed, that Act should be reinstated. Honourable members who have spoken on that Act—both the honourable member for Waitotara and the honourable member for the Eastern Maori District—have spoken of it as if it were necessary simply for the protection of the Natives. But I beg to say that it is just as necessary for the protection of the Europeans as it is for the protection of the Natives, and I will give an instance in point which came under my own knowledge. A Native conveyed a piece of land to a European; but another European, thinking that there was a flaw in the title, induced the Native to go to his house and sign a twenty-one years' lease to him of the same piece of land. This European brought his lease down to have it registered, and it was necessary that he should go before the Trust Commissioner before he could get it registered. The person who bought the land put in his conveyance and objected, and on considering the matter the lease was declared to be "contrary to equity and good conscience," in terms of the Act. Had it not been for the Trust Commissioner the European who had bought the land would have had, in all probability, to go to law, and would have been put to much expense. So that the Trust Commissioner is as much a necessity in the interests of Europeans as of the Maoris. I understand it is now desired to go on with the Loan Bill, and therefore I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir G. GREY.—At what period of time will the debate be resumed? We should have full notice of it.

Major ATKINSON.—It is difficult to say when; but I will see that full notice is given. These Bills were not put at the top of the Order Paper, and were only brought on because the honourable member for Christchurch North was not in his place, and it was not desired to go on with the Loan Bill in his absence.

Sir G. GREY.—A number of persons have determined to resist this Bill and the others relating to similar subjects, because they consider that it is unfair to push them on at this period of the session; that, though no wrong may be intended to be done, still wrong will be the effect of passing them. I therefore think that a specific time should be fixed at which we should renew the consideration of the Bills.

Mr. KELLY.—I would ask the Government to withdraw the Bills for this session. The Native members are opposed to their being proceeded with. They came down from the other House, and they have not been sent to the Native Affairs Committee here for consideration; and, under all circumstances, I think they might very well be left over until next session.

Mr. CADMAN.—I would remind the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill that the country electorates in the North Island are looking very anxiously for legislation upon the subjects dealt with by these Bills, and we were led to believe that some important changes would be proposed, in the interest of both races. But none of the desired changes is proposed by these Bills. They seem to be mostly in the direction of making legal transactions which, if not illegal, appear to be not quite legal. If the Bills are to be gone on with, I suppose we must endeavour to make some amendments to make the measures beneficial to the people we represent; but that will take time, and if the Bills go on in their present shape they will be useless.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I wish to add my voice to those of other honourable members who have asked the Government not to insist on these Bills being passed through this session. That such measures should be brought on without being sent to the Native Affairs Committee is a circumstance without precedent. I will not say that the Bills are of such a character that they might be postponed till next session, but I will say that, if they are of so much importance that they should be passed this session, then we should adjourn for a week or ten days from Christmas, and take up the consideration of them on reassembling after the adjournment. If that cannot be done, then they should be postponed till next session. The forcing-through of Bills of this kind within a few hours of prorogation, and in the absence of opportunity to properly consider them, is repugnant to all our ideas of proper legislation; and I hope that the honourable gentleman, finding that the sense of the House is against him, will drop them for this session.

Mr. HISLOP.—I think I may say that these Bills will not come on again before the evening. Although I cannot say that I am much impressed with the arguments brought forward by the honourable member for Waitotara, or with his threats to block the passage of the Bill, yet the Government recognise that the legislation asked for is of great importance, and, if the time at the disposal of the House will not permit of due consideration being given to the matter, they will consider the reasonable request of the Native members and others that the Bills should be postponed till next session. At the same time, I must say that we understood that these Bills were proceeding with the sanction of the Native members, and the objections of those honourable gentlemen have come upon the Government as a surprise. In the meantime I ask that the debate be adjourned, and later on we shall see better what the position is.

Major ATKINSON.—I hope that the House will consent to the adjournment at once. I merely had the Loan Bill postponed owing to the absence of the honourable member for Christchurch North. I will undertake to give the honourable member for Auckland Central ample notice as to when this Bill will come on again. In the meantime, as the Colonial Secretary has stated, the Government will, after the intimation received from the Native members, consider whether it is absolutely necessary to go on with these Bills.

Mr. MARCHANT.—Before the Government finally determine to abandon the Bill, I would appeal to them to take into consideration the case of Mr. Joshua Jones, of Mokau. He has been here during the whole session waiting to see if legislation can be effected to deal with his wrongs: for he undoubtedly has wrongs. These wrongs it is proposed to remedy to some extent in the Native Land Administration Act Repeal Bill; and I think it would be a grievous injustice to him if nothing were done to rectify his wrongs. I venture to bring the matter under the notice of the Government, and trust they will consider it, and that, in case they decide to abandon these measures, they will see if they cannot make some provision to deal with his case.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I trust the Government will give us time to consider this matter. I take a great interest in the administration of Native affairs. This administration has been the bugbear of the colony for the past forty-five years. In my opinion, from beginning to end the Natives have been unfairly treated. I should like further time to be given to the consideration of this matter.

Mr. SEDDON.—I hope the adjournment of the debate will be agreed to. I find I have memoranda of some length for a speech upon the Financial Statement, and if we adjourn the debate an opportunity may yet be given of going on with the debate on the financial proposals of the Government.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I feel placed in some difficulty by the proposal of the Government. These Bills very much affect the district which I represent, and a great deal of interest is taken in them. I think the majority of the members of the House will not be here after the rising of the House to-night, and I think it possible that very great injury may be done to many persons with whom I am acquainted, and whose interests I have undertaken to watch, if the Bills are considered after so many honourable members have left. The case mentioned by the honourable member for Taranaki is one which certainly should be dealt with as quickly as possible; but it should be dealt with with care. Very much more harm might be done in that case by hasty and ill-considered legislation than by having the matter postponed. I hope the Government will, if they are not satisfied that they can bring the Bills on at a reasonable time, postpone them till next session, rather than cause the irremediable injury which might be occasioned by putting the Bills through when honourable members are not present.

Mr. CARROLL.—I would suggest that, if it is necessary that these Bills should be abandoned, some inquiry should be instituted into this particular case of Joshua Jones. From what I can hear he has suffered very great inconvenience and hardship. If it is possible to remedy his grievance—if there is time to do it by passing one of these measures—I shall be quite happy to assist; but, if there is no time to do that, I hope the Government will make inquiries into the matter and see what can be done.

Sir G. GREY.—It is hardly satisfactory to be told that we shall have information given to us as to the hour at which this debate will be resumed hereafter. Supposing, for instance, it is to be resumed at half-past two o'clock tomorrow morning, I really am not in a state to sit up. I think we should know, before agreeing to the adjournment, the precise hour at which the question will be taken. At the present moment we have the House at our disposal. I believe that the whole future of the Native race depends upon these Bills. I am certain the Government do not know what they are doing; and the Premier himself will agree with me, because he stood up in the House and told me that I should find the whole of the Natives in favour of these Bills, and that I was wrong in saying they would object to them. He told me I should find out my mistake when they came on. Now, I have had no conversation with the Native members on the subject, nor with any Natives; but I knew they must oppose measures so wholly destructive of their race. In my belief these measures strike a blow at the Native race—at their existence, absolutely.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is outside the question of the adjournment, and is speaking upon the main question.

Sir G. GREY.—We ought not to adjourn now, because these measures threaten the future of the Native race, and we have the House now under our command. We can move the adjournment of the House, and can even now prolong this debate to such an extent as to compel the Government to cease pressing on these Bills. I believe that no such destructive measures have ever before been brought forward as these Bills, and I believe they have been brought forward in favour of certain individuals, and that this great cruelty and wrong has been done for the benefit of some few persons. I am certain, Sir, that that is the case. Believing that firmly as I do, surely, in speaking to the adjournment of the debate, I may state these things, which render the non-adjournment of the debate necessary unless we are first of all told the precise period at which the debate shall be resumed. If we are promised that, I will give way; but, otherwise, if I speak for an hour, I shall continue to speak as I do. I wish to use no threats; but, if we believe that such vast interests depend upon this, surely we ought to use every means in our power to secure those whom we believe to be wronged. It was said that one reason for consenting that these things should be hurried through is that one individual has suffered wrong. Surely the whole race is not to be sacrificed to one man. Such a proposal was never made by Parliament before. I say, if an individual has been injured, clearly and justly let us devote ourselves to getting right done to him.

Mr. MARCHANT.—May I correct the honourable member? I did not make any such proposal; but I asked whether, if these Bills were not proceeded with, the Government would endeavour to afford some meed of justice to that gentleman. I asked nothing such as the honourable gentleman suggests.

Sir G. GREY.—There were two or three speeches upon the subject; I only gathered the tenor of the whole.

Mr. MARCHANT.—The honourable gentleman looked at me very hard.

Mr. SEDDON.—A cat may look at a king.

Sir G. GREY.—No, no, that is not it; but a heart that is touched by a look—(Inaudible.) I am in favour of justice to the individual. That I contend for; but I say, in this case, before we are asked to adjourn we ought, in fairness, to be told the precise hour at which this debate shall be resumed. I move, That this debate be adjourned to this day week.

Mr. TAIPUA.—I quite agree with the proposal made by the Premier for the adjournment of the consideration of this matter, seeing that the debate is likely to be protracted. I hope no honourable members will make a party question of this on account of their opposition to the Government, but that they will consider the merits or otherwise of the Bill, and be guided entirely by that. It is to be remembered that all previous legislation relating to Native lands has brought trouble upon the Native people. We are still wondering and waiting to see what this Government will do for the benefit of the Natives. I hope the motion for the adjournment will be carried.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I quite agree with the honourable member for Auckland Central that the time should be named, because it might come on when we are busy. We were at the meeting of the Native Affairs Committee this morning, and nearly lost the debate on these Bills. Therefore I will support what has been suggested by the honourable member for Auckland Central, that the time should be named when the debate on these Bills will begin. I have made up my mind to stand firm to the wish of my people against these Bills.

Mr. SMITH.—The district I come from is largely interested in this question, and I am sorry the Government have brought these Bills down on the last day of the session without their having previously gone before the Native Affairs Committee. What was put in the Bills I am afraid will be lost. I do not know anything about the Native Land Court Bill; but the last Bill, the Native Land Administration Act Repeal Bill, will, I am certain, cause a very long debate indeed. Therefore it will be for the Government to consider whether they will adjourn it altogether or not. If they wish to adjourn the Bill until next session no doubt a great deal of opposition will be done away with. I may point out, with reference to these Bills, that a great many honourable members would have amendments—in fact, those representing the districts interested would be bound to have amendments—and those amendments would have to be considered, and would take a very long time indeed. There is one thing I wish to point out to the Premier. I believe there is a case put in these Bills coming from his own district—the case of Joshua Jones. I was on the Waste Lands Committee two or three years ago. We considered this case, and the Committee almost unanimously decided that he had a grievance, and recommended the Government to deal with it. They dealt with it by putting a clause in the Special Powers and Contracts Act. That was overridden in another Bill. He has come down again, and I think his case should be put in some Bill. The Committee more than once have decided that he had a grievance, and I hope the Premier will state to the House that he will put a clause in some other Bill dealing with this case.

Major ATKINSON.—I hope the House will agree to go on with the work we are anxious to get at. I do not understand the position the honourable member for Auckland Central takes up; but, if this will meet his view, I am quite willing to make the following proposal: that these Bills be adjourned, and take their place on the Order Paper, as corrected, out of which they got because the honourable member for Christchurch North was not here. I will undertake not to bring them on to-night later than eleven o'clock.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—I was in hope the Premier would agree to the suggestion that these Bills should all stand over until next session. We have all suffered inconvenience in the past through continual change in the Maori laws. Nearly every session they are amended in some direction or another. I hope that when we do have Maori laws amended again it will be for all time. These are but temporary measures, and are only to remain in force until the end of next session; and, that being so, no harm can be done if these Bills all stand over until then. I agree with the suggestion that the case of Joshua Jones should be dealt with this session. The Government can in some way arrange that he should receive the benefits he was to derive under this Bill. I do hope the Premier will agree that these Bills shall all stand over until next session; and, if he does, I feel quite sure that the honourable member for Auckland Central will withdraw his amendment with regard to the adjournment question. I think it is only reasonable, at this stage of the session, that this should be done. I am not aware that the Premier has considered these Bills, or that any member of his Ministry has considered them. I feel certain that, through press of work, they have not had time to give due consideration to these measures. It would be better for all parties that these Bills should stand over. The subject is a very important one, and I should like to see a complete revision of the whole of the Maori laws.

Mr. T. THOMPSON.—I wish to express a desire that, whatever may be the fate of these Bills, the Premier will take into consideration the case of Mr. Jones. I may say that I have had an opportunity of going very fully into the grievance of this gentleman, and I do believe he has a very substantial grievance against the Government.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I should like to say, about this claim of Mr. Jones, that I should think it would be well to have legislation this session upon that claim, although I fail to see how it is going to be done under present circumstances. I should be glad if the Government could see some way of opening that block of forty thousand acres for settlement, instead of allowing it to be blocked up for fifty-six years. I hope the Government will try and make some fair and equitable arrangement with Mr. Jones and the others interested for the purpose of having this block made available for settlement.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I am in a position to state that as soon as Mr. Jones gets a title there will be a very large amount of capital expended on that land, thus employing a considerable amount of labour. For the last thirteen years Mr. Jones has been fighting the battle single-handed to get that justice which he ought to have got years ago, and I trust the Premier will see his way clear to bring down a Bill to put Mr. Jones in possession of that land. It will have the effect of bringing half a million of money into the country within a very short time. The obstacles that have been continually thrown in Mr. Jones's way have retarded the progress of that part of the colony to a very considerable extent. I hope the Government will see their way clear to drop these Bills this session, because I am certain they will not carry them through; and I ask them, in all equity and justice, to bring down a short Bill to place Mr. Jones in proper possession of the land.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I feel that very great injustice has been inflicted on Mr. Jones. The whole of the papers were carefully gone through by the Committee. Mr. Jones has been for some reason or other deprived of his rights; and it is one of those cases that seem rather like romance than anything else. I refer to the manner in which Mr. Jones has been treated in reference to this land. I regret that these Bills have been left over until the very end of the session, and I think it would be wise to hold them over for the present. But as to Mr. Jones, I think a very great injustice has been perpetrated on him by his not being allowed to get possession of this land. On several occasions justice has been almost within his grasp, and but for the action of one or two Ministers he would have got it. The property in question is a very valuable one, and the opening-up of this block would bring a very great deal of capital into the country, would give a considerable amount of employment, and would add to the revenue of the country very much.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I think the Government would shorten the time taken up by this debate if they would give some indication as to whether they intend doing justice to Mr. Jones.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I hear "No" from those benches; and, if that is so, I am prepared to stay here until after Christmas until something is done in the matter. I was on the Public Petitions Committee when this case was fully inquired into; but, through the action of the Government, the whole action of the Committee has been upset on several occasions, and I think it is time the matter was looked into and finally decided. I think Mr. Jones has been treated very injuriously indeed. If the Government do not see their way to do something I think this debate will be prolonged to a very great length.

Mr. FISHER.—The Premier has already put before the House the plain position of affairs. He has said he is inclined to take the business on the Order Paper, and, as already stated, these Bills have come on because of the absence of the honourable member for Christchurch North, and the House wished to proceed to the business on the Order Paper. If the House will consent to the proposition of the Premier, that these Bills shall be postponed and that the House shall proceed to other business, all difficulty, for the present, will be obviated. The Premier himself has said that he will go on with the orders of the day up till eleven o'clock, and that he will not proceed with these Bills at any later hour. I think that ought to meet the wishes of every honourable member who is interested in the passage or non-passage of these Bills, and I appeal to the Native members whether that does not meet their views. If the House will allow us to proceed with the business in the order in which it appears on the Order Paper there need be no further difficulty in the matter whatever.

Sir G. GREY.—I would point out that the southern members wish to leave at eleven o'clock to-night, and I should like to have these Bills discussed in their presence.

Mr. LAWRY.—I hope the Government will give effect to what is evidently the wish of the House; and, not only in the interests of justice, but also in the interest of our common humanity, I think Mr. Jones's case should receive immediate attention. I fear, if the consideration of the question is postponed, as has been suggested, the matter will simply be postponed out of existence. It has become notorious that Mr. Jones's case is one of exceptional hardship, and a grievous wrong has been done him by successive Native administrations by neglecting his legitimate claims. I therefore hope the justice asked for will be granted without delay.

Mr. ROSS.—The honourable member for Auckland Central has said that the southern members have made arrangements to leave at eleven to-night. I do not know what arrangements have been made by others; but, speaking for myself, I intend to stay till the business of the session is disposed of.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I think the House will not be satisfied with the assurance of the Premier, more especially as it has been varied by the Minister of Education. It is manifestly unfair that the discussion should be open to be resumed at any hour up to eleven to-night; and to compel the honourable member for Auckland Central to be present continuously till that hour would not be treating that honourable gentleman with the respect he deserves at the hands of the House. Moreover, I object to its being resumed at that hour, or at any time near it; because, though the honourable member for Roslyn may remain after to-day, we know very well that nearly all the southern members intend to leave to-night, and, with reference to this Bill and the other cognate measures, I especially rely on the southern members to see justice done in this matter. They are totally disinterested in it, which cannot be said of some honourable members representing northern districts, because at the proper time I shall call attention to the fact that several honourable members are directly interested in this question. I say this: that I do not think this proposed legislation should be allowed to go on if one southern member leaves, because I rely on the sense of justice—untrammelled by any interest, however remote—in the minds of honourable gentlemen from the South to see that this great question is treated as it deserves. I hope other honourable members will express their opinions on this question until we see that the Premier is convinced of the gravity of the subject, and until he gives an assurance that these measures shall not be proceeded with during the present session.

Mr. TAYLOR.—There is no necessity for carrying these Bills through this session. I hope it will not be done, and I, for one, shall stop as long as possible to prevent it. It is a monstrous thing to take advantage of honourable members wanting to get away to try and force these things through. In the South we see enormous tracts of land in the hands of a few individuals; and, if we do not deal properly with the Native-land question, we shall see the same thing in the North—we shall see a few individuals mopping up all the Native lands in the colony for their own benefit. I am not at all interested personally in the Native-land question; but I must protest against anything which would tend to further monopoly in land. I hope the Natives will stand up for their rights, and not allow a few selfish men to get possession of their lands.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—I should be exceedingly sorry to do anything tending to embarrass the Government, and I know that honourable members on this side of the House are anxious to expedite business as much as is reasonable; but there is a limit to what is reasonable, and when that is reached the unreasonable begins. It would be utterly unreasonable to give the Government an opportunity to bring up these Bills at half-past ten to-night, just when we should all be starting for the steamer, and it would not be acting in the interests of both races in the colony to allow it to be done. The southern members are not immediately interested in the question of Native lands, but it is their business to see that any legislation on that subject is equally fair and reasonable to the people of both races. I do not say that, in dealing with this question, there are any northern members, even those who may be immediately interested, who are prepared to do anything but what is just and reasonable; but the fact remains that some honourable members are directly interested, and the country would think it most extraordinary if we should go away and leave legislation of this sort to be passed when the majority of honourable members were not present. I have no wish at all to do anything which might impede the Government, but I think they should of their own accord give us an assurance that these Bills will be dropped till next session, when they could be fully considered by this House, and carefully deliberated upon by the Native Affairs Committee; when southern members would have ample time to study them, and northern members who wished to make any amendments would be able to propose them and have them considered. I trust that that is the course which will be taken.

Mr. KELLY.—I hope the Government will reconsider the matter and accede to the wishes of the Native members. We are not in a fair position with regard to these Bills. It has always been the practice to submit Bills of this kind to the Native Affairs Committee, and these Bills have been submitted to the Native Affairs Committee of the Council, where there are only two Native members; but here, where there are four Native members and a number of European members representing Native districts, no opportunity is given to properly consider these Bills, and they have been kept from the Native Affairs Committee altogether. At the beginning of the session I was asked by the Native members to request the Government to have these Bills sent to the Native Affairs Committee to report on and to consider any amendments suggested, and I thought the Government would send them, as usual, and I told the Native members that no doubt the Bills would be sent to the Committee after passing the other House; but that has not been done, and they are now brought before us at the fag-end of the session, when there is no time to consider them. I know that members interested in the question have a number of amendments to propose, and I feel sure that it would take two or three days to put the Bills through; and I therefore ask the Premier to again consider the question. If there are any particular clauses he wishes to pass to remove any injustice, I am sure the House will assist him; but, as it would take practically three days to go through the whole of the Bills, I again ask the Government to consider the suggestion to drop them.

The House divided on the question, "That the words 'this day week' be added to the question."

Majority against, 13.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. W. P. Reeves

Mr. HISLOP moved, That the debate be adjourned till after Orders of the Day Nos. 1, 2, and 3, so as to reinstate the Bill in its original position on the Order Paper.

Mr. PERCEVAL.—I think the proposal of the Government is very fair. This morning the Government, out of consideration for the leader of the Opposition, took this measure first; and I do not think it is fair to take advantage of that to embarrass the Government.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I move, as an amendment, That the debate be adjourned till Monday next. I do so in order that the Government may have an opportunity of considering whether they will proceed with these measures; and, secondly, that honourable members may have time to know more about these Bills.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Those who are acting in this matter are not obstructive in seeking to force the Government to comply with a very reasonable request. However, if the Government will not take the ordinary adjournment for luncheon, I will take the opportunity of referring to the case of Mr. Joshua Jones. That is a very urgent matter, and I would suggest that the Government should, during the recess, appoint a Commission to inquire into the matter. The case is one that cannot be dealt with properly in this hasty manner, because it is a matter on which evidence must be taken, and it would necessarily follow that it would have to be referred to a Committee of the House before legislation took place upon it. Most valuable evidence could be taken with regard to the working of the Native Land Court, and if this evidence were laid before the House next session it would be a very useful guide to us in considering necessary legislation.

Sir G. GREY.—Can we not have the usual adjournment now? We have been working early and late, and I think we are entitled to take some little adjournment. I remained up last night till past twelve o'clock, and that was nothing to what other honourable members had to do; and then we are called upon to work early in the morning,—and surely we ought to be allowed some little time for refreshment now.

Mr. SAMUEL.—It is usual at the end of a session, when there is such a decided objection to a Bill as there is to this, to ask the Government to consider whether it is not expedient to postpone the consideration of the measure to another session. I support two of these Bills, although I should like to see them considerably altered in Committee; but, still, it is quite evident that there are a great many members here who are prepared to resist the attempt to pass these Bills through in the limited time at our disposal. I hope the Government will not look upon this attitude as indicating a hostile feeling, but as proceeding from a desire to do justice, and to prevent improper things from being ratified, which might be the case under these Bills. I hope the House will agree to the adjournment of the debate until after the other orders of the day are disposed of, and that in the meantime the Government will consider whether or not it is necessary to proceed with these Bills.

Major ATKINSON.—I gave an assurance more than an hour ago that that was what we intended to do.

Mr. SAMUEL.—Then, I hope the House will agree to the adjournment.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN.—I would suggest that the Government should bring in a short Bill providing for what is absolutely necessary, withdrawing what is unnecessary, on the understanding that no honourable members shall move any amendments in the Bill. It is far too important a question to be forced on; and honourable members, as a matter of duty, must resist such legislation as is here proposed, not with a view of interfering with the Government, but to satisfy their own consciences.

Mr. SEDDON.—I trust there will be no further opposition shown to the fixing of the adjournment of the debate. We know that, from the work that has been done, and the arrangements that have been made by members for leaving, it is next to an impossibility that these Bills can be dealt with; and the Government have, in effect, said as much.

Major STEWARD.—I am sorry that I was away when the Government, at an early period of the sitting, intimated that they would take into consideration the question of whether they would proceed with these Bills or not. If I had understood that, I should have voted with the Government on the last division.

Mr. CADMAN.—I can quite understand that the Government do not like being forced into the position of having to drop their Bills; but, at the same time, it is only fair that the Government should consider this: that our constituents are interested, and that we ought not to be put in the position of having these Bills forced upon us. We must debate them, and must endeavour to amend them.

Mr. KELLY.—I think that the Government should not be put out at the opposition shown to these Bills. It is not a party affair at all. A good many honourable members who have supported the Government throughout the session voted against them on the last division. For instance, the Native members, who have given Ministers a hearty support, are opposed to them in connection with these Bills. The Government should recognise this, and withdraw the Bills. I am in favour of the Native Land Administration Act being repealed, for it has done considerable harm in my district; but it is evident that there is no chance of the Bill going through, and it is of no use proceeding with it.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I should like to ask leave to withdraw my amendment. I may say that I did not hear the Premier indicate his willingness to consider the feasibility of proceeding with these Bills.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

EDUCATION.

Mr. BROWN wished to make a personal explanation. On Tuesday morning, at half-past three or thereabouts, when he had given his vote on the education question, he was challenged by the Government whip, who stated that he had paired on the question. He replied that he had not paired, but had been waiting all night in order to give a personal vote. On inquiring with whom he had paired, the whip gave the name of the honourable member for the Buller. The next morning he saw the honourable member for the Buller, and asked him if he had paired with him. The honourable member said he had done so, and he replied that he had refused to pair with him and other members for the reason that upon the question of the reduction of the expense of education he desired to give a personal vote, and, although at great inconvenience to himself, as he was suffering from a serious illness, he had remained in the chamber to give a personal vote, and that he had done so as his constituents were interested in the reduction of the education vote, and that he knew some of them did not understand the system of pairing, and therefore it was desirable that he should vote personally. The honourable member for the Buller told him that there were other gentlemen present when he paired, and mentioned the honourable member for Inangahua and the honourable member for the Thames. He had referred the question to these gentlemen, and both had informed him that he had not in their presence given any pair, but had refused to do so for the reasons already expressed. The honourable member for the Buller had told him it was very important for him to set himself right with his constituents, and that he must make an explanation to the House; but he (Mr. Brown) understood this would not be done unless he was present when the explanation was made. After the statement was made to the House, he had received a note from the honourable member for the Buller, telling him what he had done. He thought the House would agree with him that he was not trespassing too much on its indulgence in asking it to hear both sides of the question. As the names of the honourable gentlemen who were present when he was said to have made the pair had been given, he would ask them if they would state what had taken place.

Colonel FRASER knew nothing further about the matter than that he was sitting with the honourable member for Tuapeka, the honourable member for the Buller, and some other members, and that the conversation veered round to the education question. The honourable member for the Buller then asked the honourable member for Tuapeka if he would pair with him, and the latter honourable gentleman said that he would not, as the Catholics in his district would not understand pairs, and that he wanted to give a personal vote. He (Colonel Fraser) left then, and of course did not know what happened afterwards; but no pair had been given in his presence.

Mr. PEARSON wished to say that the honourable member for Tuapeka had come to him, when sitting with the honourable member for Dunedin East, and asked him to pair him in this way with the honourable member for the Buller: Increase of school-age—For, J. C. Brown; against, O'Connor; normal schools, the same way; capitation reduction, the same way; and also for strict-average attendance. The names were recorded at the request of the honourable member for Tuapeka.

Mr. W. P. REEVES said that, as his name had been mentioned, he would say what had occurred between the honourable member for Tuapeka and himself. He would have liked to have a pair, and went to the honourable member for Tuapeka and asked him to pair with him, knowing that he was going to vote in an opposite direction. But the honourable member for Tuapeka had replied that he wanted to give a vote in the House, and consequently would not pair.

Mr. O'CONOR thought it necessary to add something to what he had stated previously. The statement of the honourable member for the Thames was perfectly correct: the conversation named did take place, and the honourable member for Tuapeka at first did express unwillingness to pair; but afterwards he distinctly, in reply to a question, said that he would pair, and upon what. On saying that, he went into a certain portion of the offices of the House, and he (Mr. O'Connor) came direct, and, seeing the pair recorded, left. They had paired many and many a time before, and were old friends, and he was sorry that this misunderstanding should have occurred, and believed it to have been merely a misunderstanding on the part of the honourable member.

Mr. BROWN remarked that it had been said by the whip that he (Mr. Brown) had paired on certain questions. It was the usual thing for one whip to give notice to the other whip as to the members who had paired. This was the usual custom, and the reason of it was that both whips should know who had paired. The whip on the other side had not received any notice with regard to himself. All this had arisen from the offensive way in which the Government whip had come to him after he had recorded his vote. From the way the question was put he was under a misapprehension, and had voted exactly in the way that his pair would have voted. That alone should have secured him from any interference on the part of the whip, for he had broken no pledge. The general understanding with whips was, if possible, except when both members were present who had given the pair, that the member giving the pair should do so in writing. That was the general rule, and he thought it only fair that he should bring the matter before the House. He certainly had not intended to give a pair, and if he had done so it was not likely he would have remained in the House until three o'clock in the morning, especially in the state of health he was in at that time.

Mr. PEARSON wished to say that the honourable member would never have another opportunity of bringing a matter of this kind before the House, for so long as he (Mr. Pearson) was a whip that honourable gentleman's name should never appear in the book.

Mr. Pearson

NEW ZEALAND LOAN BILL.

On the motion for the committal of the New Zealand Loan Bill,

Sir J. VOGEL said,—Sir, before you leave the chair I should like to offer a few remarks. It will be remembered by honourable members that when this Bill passed its second reading I expressed the opinion that it was not necessary to borrow so large an amount, and that there was a risk in giving an assurance not to go into the market for three years and a half. No answer was made to the arguments I used. The Minister of Education, in his usual fashion, simply got up and abused me and the late Government. But a speech of that kind did not affect or touch the arguments I used. Later in the evening, or, rather, the next evening, the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government adopted a similar course. It is no answer to arguments to refer to the past proceedings of a late Government. As time is very short, I shall overlook anything of that kind, and go into the question as briefly as possible. I do not consider it necessary to borrow the large amount proposed, nor do I consider it safe to give the assurance which I understand the Government propose to give—to not enter the money-market for another three years and a half. As regards the question of amount, I pointed out—and no answer whatever was given to the point—that, if it is necessary to borrow so large an amount as a million early next year, it stands to reason that, as a million of money is to be expended next year, the same reasons operate in the direction of borrowing the following year again. In other words, if the funds at the command of the Government are so congested that, besides the money required for immediate expenditure, it is necessary to have so much in hand as is proposed by the Government, then the same causes, if in operation, require another loan next year. I said I did not consider that necessary, because I did not consider the million proposed to be borrowed early next year was necessary. The honourable gentleman proposes to add to his loan-power an amount of £400,000 for the deficiency of last year and the present year; and no doubt he will place himself, so to speak, to use a sporting phrase, "on velvet" at the end of the year, because he will pay off the deficiency and have a very large amount at his command. The question is, What may occur afterwards? The trust funds are fully invested, more or less, and the same causes will produce the same effects later on. As far as the Public Works Fund is concerned, it is tolerably free. But, as I pointed out when speaking on the subject, they sometimes carry a very large amount of various investments. Now, as regards the same causes being at work, I should like to point out to honourable members what we have to consider in future, supposing we give this assurance not to borrow for three years and a half; and I ask honourable members, as prudent businessmen, would they consider it safe and satisfactory to do so? First of all, the Sinking Fund debentures have to be taken up in the colony.

That is to say, those debentures that represent the accretions of the Sinking Fund amount to about £250,000 at the beginning of the year, and by drawing are reduced by £120,000, leaving £130,000 to be paid. Then, there are the Government loans to local bodies. The Government propose to reduce that amount to £100,000 for the coming year—that is to say, for the two years it is to be £300,000; and, afterwards, I am much mistaken if, on account of the very large amounts that are being taken from local bodies, they will be content with £100,000 per annum. At any rate, that is a source of requirement in the future that cannot be overlooked. Then, there are the guaranteed debentures. They are carried upon various funds. They are not, as honourable members sometimes suppose, unnegotiated: they are sold. They are not put on the open market, but they are used as a means of obtaining advances from various funds to enable those funds to take up securities from time to time. Then, there are the Westport and Greymouth Harbours. Money will be required for them, and it is not a desirable way to obtain money to issue the guaranteed debentures. I am of opinion the money would be much better obtained in a direct manner. Then, Sir, there are a large amount of public buildings to throw, sooner or later, on the Consolidated Fund, and, if that fund is not sufficient to meet this charge, it may be necessary to borrow money in order to do so. I am dealing now with local loans which may be required within the next three years and a half, in contravention of any assurance given not to go upon the market for three years and a half. Then, there are loans to be paid off: the Ten-forty loan, which we can now call in at any time, or shall be able to do so from January or February next. In six months we can pay off two millions of the Ten-forty loan, now bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent.; and if the money were borrowed at 4 per cent. we could save 1 per cent. on that loan. There are other loans about falling due. Then, we cannot leave out of calculation, when talking about an assurance of this kind, the fact that this colony is in this position: Without any "reserve"—to use a banking phrase—we have £1,600,000 "on call" invested with us in the Savings-Bank. That is a very large amount. It is perfectly safe. It should be so while we have recourse to the English money-market; but, if we are to be shut out from that recourse, it would be an exceedingly dangerous thing to hold £1,600,000 without a reserve in bullion as security. I am not aware, as stated by the honourable member for Port Chalmers, that money can be borrowed in this colony for 5 per cent. I have to state, as against the idea of that being the case, that the late Government made inquiries in several directions and found it would not be safe to ask for money in the colony, because the chances were against anything like a considerable amount being obtained. When the Kaihu debentures—guaranteed by the colony as regards both principal and interest—were offered for sale, a small amount at 5 per cent. discount was taken by the Insurance Fund, and the rest sold to one of the banks, but not without considerable difficulty. It is a mistake to suppose that a large amount can be obtained in the colony. The honourable member for Port Chalmers arrived at the result he did because, he said, there was a considerable amount of money offered on mortgage. That is quite a different class of investment. Persons who send money for investment on mortgage do not necessarily take Government debentures. Then, the honourable gentleman was at fault with regard to the equation of interest. He talked about the Government paying  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. for its loans. He made a miscalculation as to the effect of selling at a discount. To sell a 4-per-cent. loan, with only thirty years to run, at 5 per cent. discount, would mean borrowing the money over the whole term, including sufficient to pay the discount at the end of the period, at £4 6s. per cent.: that is to say, if a loan were sold having thirty years to run, and bearing 4 per cent. interest, for 95, that would be borrowing money at £4 6s. per cent. That is for thirty years. But if we borrow for forty years, as we do now, it would mean something less, because there would be a longer time to accumulate the discount, or, in other words, a smaller annual amount would cover the discount. The honourable member for Port Chalmers was therefore altogether wrong as to the price that any discount we might have to pay would cost us in the way of interest. Selling, as I have said, at even 5 per cent. discount would only make us pay £4 6s. for the loan, and there is a great difference between £4 6s. and  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum, of which the honourable gentleman spoke. Now, Sir, I think I have shown honourable members that, having regard to the various circumstances—and there are others which could be mentioned—it is not safe to give such an assurance as is proposed. I should like to make a merely passing reference to the position of local bodies' loans in the Home market. It is a question which it is undesirable to discuss, but any one who holds a responsible position in the Government cannot be unaware of the fact that the necessity may arise of consolidating these loans, and that it is not desirable to leave them out of any possible consideration that might be required to be given to them. For my own part, I believe the time will come when some arrangement will have to be made to prevent the issue of local loans in the English market, and to come to some arrangement for consolidating and becoming responsible, on the old principle, for the local bodies' loans. However, I wish to say, en passant—not to pledge myself to it, because there is a danger, in making such an utterance, of giving a fictitious value to the loans;—but some of the loans, I may say, are very high in the English market. I wish to say a word now as regards the principle of the Bill itself. It affects, by its schedules, to denote how the money is to be spent; but clause 15 completely nullifies any supposed allocation of the loan, by leaving it within the power of Parliament to alter the allocation within the four corners of the objects comprised in the schedule. My contention is that the various items should not be set forth—that it is surplusage to do that, since the body of the Act gives power to alter and apportion the amounts. My contention is that the amounts should not be separately denominated, and that the loan should stand unallocated, the House reserving the discretion of ordering as small an expenditure as possible from time to time. I am confronted with this difficulty in the matter: that, while there is a majority of the House, I believe, strongly in favour of reducing the expenditure, the question arises, Who is to have the credit of doing the work? In speaking the other night of the Young New Zealand party I referred to them as “stupid boys.” That was rather an absurd thing to do, when you consider the age of the honourable gentlemen in question; and it was put to me afterwards that such a reference might possibly apply to members on our own side of the House. Of course I scarcely need say that I meant no reference to honourable members on our side. But I may explain what has been going on this session between sections on both sides of the House. There have been a number of honourable members loud in their expressions of discontent with the Government in the lobbies, but yet voting with the Government in the House; and there was a movement on the part of those honourable members in the direction of seeing whether they were strong enough to form an independent party. They had not the smallest amount of affection for the Government, and would have been only too glad to give it its congé. Then came the question, Should they try to get over the open opponents of the Government, or should the open opponents of the Government try to get over them? Their first attempt was on the tariff question, and a deputation was appointed to wait on the Government. The Premier gave no hope of granting the request. The adjourned meeting passed a resolution to the effect that the conduct of the Government was unsatisfactory: but the Government supporters who had taken part in the movement did not attend the meeting—they made their appearance no more. The same sort of thing has gone on intermittently with the party which has appropriated to itself the name of “the Young New Zealand party.” From time to time they have tried to obtain the services of the members on our side of the House, and we have been quite ready to obtain their services if they could be persuaded. Of course I do not at all mean to reflect on those members of our party who have been endeavouring to persuade the gentlemen of the “Young New Zealand party” to come with us—to come out into the open light of day and vote according to their principles. The title “Young New Zealand party” is a very comprehensive phrase. The party includes gentlemen who, apparently, are not open to the charge of youth. For instance, there is the honourable member for Port Chalmers, who, when I first came to the colony—twenty-six years ago—was even then put down as an old identity; and he certainly has not grown younger since. Then, there is the honourable member for Wallace—a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect. From the outward appearance of that gentleman you would say that he is nearly as old as I am; but, judging by his words and actions, you would say that he is very youthful. I dare say most honourable members have read a charming book called “Vice Versâ,” and I cannot help thinking that my honourable friend has had that fatal Indian stone in his hand, and that, while he is able to show the exterior of a man in age, yet he really is a very young person. The feeling he has displayed towards myself makes me think that some dozen years ago perhaps the honourable gentleman was a little boy trotting about in socks and drawers, and that his nurse, with that evil custom which nurses have, made me a sort of bogey to him. I can fancy her saying to him, “Now, Master Samuel, if you will dirty your pinafore or get your boots wet, I will send for ‘Bogey Vogel,’ and he will put you into the next loan, or borrow you, or turn you into a sinking fund;” and that the honourable gentleman has grown up with the idea that Vogel is a most dangerous person, and he cannot get that idea out of his head. I ask the honourable gentleman to look at me and say if I am such a bogey—if I am such a “terror” as was represented to his infantile imagination. We have heard this session about honourable gentlemen voting day after day and week after week against their principles because of their fear that they might be voting on the same side of the House as myself. Sir, that appears to me to be a most absurd thing to do, and the results of it may be far more serious than these honourable gentlemen imagine. Take the question now before us, for instance. I believe there is a majority in favour of reducing this loan, but yet some honourable members do not like to vote for a reduction for fear they shall vote in the same way as I propose to do. Well, I do not wish to shock the sensibilities of those honourable members, and to give them the excuse of being able to say, “We should have reduced the loan, but Vogel proposed it,” and therefore I hope some honourable member will propose a reduction which will give them an opportunity of voting for it. Now, I think the course which should be taken is this: There is no object whatever in keeping these subjects in the schedule. Supposing we say we think a loan of £600,000 is sufficient, I would suggest that we should keep clause 15 as it is—though we should require to alter a word in it—and that the two parts of the schedule should read simply thus: “In aid of Part I., Public Works Fund, and cost and charges of raising loan, £300,000”—that would be reducing the £500,000 to £300,000; and, similarly, with regard to the second part, these words could be left in: “In aid of Part III., Public Works Fund, and cost and charges of raising loan, £300,000.” That would leave the total amount £600,000, and would give the House an opportunity of voting the items as it might consider desirable from time to time. If the amounts had been "ear-marked," as in the Act of 1886, of course it would be different; but they are not "ear-marked," and there is no object in pretending to do what is not done. I wish to call the attention of honourable members who profess to be against borrowing to one point which may have escaped their notice. Do they know that within the last three or four days the Government have in view another £500,000? Recollect, we were first told that the loan might be a million; and then there came a Public Revenues Bill, with a proposal to increase the amount by £400,000. Now the Government propose to get another £500,000 at their disposal. Honourable members will ask what I refer to. I refer to the announcement made in another place by a member of the Ministry that they propose to sell that part of the Otago Central Railway already constructed—and that, when this year's expenditure is defrayed, will represent very little less than half a million. So there is another half-million to come in: that, surely, should cause those honourable gentlemen who profess to be averse from borrowing not to allow the present loan to be so large as is proposed. I shall support any amendments in the direction to which I have referred, and I hope they will be made. As it is so late, I should like them to be made in a shape that would least shock the sensibilities of the Government. I do not want to gain any triumph over the Government; and, at this period of the session, to talk about a change of Government would be absurd. If the Government want to take credit for having taken no advice throughout the session, but for having acted on their own responsibility right through, I do not grudge them that consolation. I shall be prepared to vote for these reductions, without proposing them myself, if some other member would propose them. I hope the proposal will be made in the shape of a £400,000 reduction; and if honourable members will not go so far, but will only go so far as a quarter of a million, and if the Government are prepared to accept that, I will take that as the next best thing. But I think the reduction should be made to the total amount I have mentioned, and I think no inconvenience whatever will arise from such a course being adopted. Sir, I shall not oppose our going into Committee on this Bill.

Major ATKINSON.—I will just point out that the real difference between the honourable gentleman and the Government is this: The honourable gentleman wants to borrow sufficient for one year, and to trust to the chapter of accidents for what may turn up next session. The Government, on the other hand, ask the House for authority to borrow sufficient to carry on the necessary works—with great reductions—for the next three years. That is the proposal we ask the House to adopt, so that by the end of that time our public-works expenditure shall have nearly receded to the vanishing-point. That is the whole difference between the Government and the honourable gentleman. No doubt it is shrewd of him to recommend that the loan should be reduced, and some honourable members may perhaps be led away with the idea of getting his support in trying to effect reduction for their purpose. But the Government recommend this after very careful consideration, and they have based all their estimates on this proposal. Those estimates have all been approved by the House, except the one with regard to immigration; and I would remark that that vote being struck out has been a matter of very great regret to the Government, because we propose next session to submit a scheme of immigration which will require for its carrying-out a little money—not a great amount; and we shall ask the House not to strike all reference to immigration out of this Loan Bill, but to leave the amount for immigration blank, so as to deal with it next session. We shall then propose a scheme of immigration which, I think, will be satisfactory to the House—a scheme not for the immigration of labourers, but of people such as we greatly require; and I think it will be wise of the House to leave a small margin available for this purpose. The Government went very carefully into the matter before proposing this Bill, and it was with very great regret that they felt compelled to propose a loan at all. But their scheme is a complete scheme, and they wish to have this to go upon, to give them time for a thorough reorganization and reduction of the public expenditure out of the Consolidated Fund; and they ask the House, at the same time, to fix definitely the amount of loan-money that should be spent during the next three years. I do not propose to follow the honourable member in all his arguments; but he has told us that there are certain amounts which must be raised here. He is quite right, no doubt. He says, for instance, the Government will raise Sinking Fund debentures, which is quite true. Then, he says there are loans to local bodies, in which he is also right; but I do not know what he meant by "guaranteed debentures," because these have never been taken up by the trust funds, as far as I know, except that for a short time some of them were held by one of the funds. As the honourable gentleman knows, they are usually held to secure advances of money from the London banks. It will be my endeavour, at the earliest possible date, to provide for having a working balance of them in the Post-Office Savings-Bank, so as to provide against any sudden run. This, I think, the Post Office can have and ought to have. I think there ought to be, say, £200,000 in these debentures in London, so as to be able at any moment to raise money on them if it be wanted here to meet a sudden demand. This is the direction in which I think we should go, and it is in this direction that I shall propose we should go. Then, Sir, with regard to school-buildings, the honourable gentleman says we shall have to raise money for that purpose. With regard to the Tentforties, as they are called, and the renewal of other loans, of course they will be exempted from any promise not to go on the London market for the next three years, and the London money-market would be only too glad to accept those loans, because it would be only a question of taking up a loan at a reduced rate. I hope, therefore, that the House will support the Government in their proposals.

Sir J. VOGEL.—It was proposed to put in the Bill a provision that the time should be extended. Has that proposal been adopted by the Government?

Major ATKINSON.—I have never adopted it, and the honourable gentleman has no right to suppose that I should adopt it.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Well, Sir, it was proposed by one of those honourable gentlemen who generally move these things for the Government.

Major ATKINSON.—Was it? I was not aware of that. There is no doubt that the honourable gentleman who makes the proposition is a good and staunch supporter of the Government, but I was not aware that he was in the habit of moving these things for the Government, and I am not prepared to adopt this proposal. However, I do not want to follow the honourable member for Christchurch North in the extraordinary line of argument he has used. What I want to impress upon the House is this: that the honourable gentleman's object is to leave the borrowing-power of the colony open, and to take only sufficient to carry on till next session; whereas we desire to extend the borrowing over three years in a fixed manner, so as to reach the vanishing-point. I ask honourable members to bear that in mind. As I have said, the Committee the other night did not reduce any of the estimates of the Government except that for immigration. I have already stated why the Government think that that should not have been reduced; and I hope the amount will not be taken out of the loan. I venture to think it will be not only safe and prudent but an act of wisdom on our part if we fix the expenditure for, say, three years. I wish we could accept the longer period proposed by the honourable member for Manawatu, but I think if we fix it as far as the life of this Parliament is concerned we shall have gone as far as is prudent. I hope the House will now go into Committee on the Bill, and will keep the schedule just as it is, because it is ear-marked in every way.

Bill committed.

Bill reported, with amendments.

FISHERIES CONSERVATION BILL.

This Bill was read a first time.

On the motion, That the Bill be now read a second time,

Sir J. VOGEL asked that the nature of the Bill should be explained.

Mr. FISHER said it was a matter of urgency. It altered the amount of penalty in the case of those found engaged in illegal sealing. It had come to the knowledge of the Government that several vessels had recently been fitted out for sealing purposes, and were about to act in contravention of the law; and it had been found that the present penalties to prevent illegal sealing were quite insufficient, and this Bill was necessary.

Mr. W. D. STEWART said, apparently the Bill would have a retrospective effect. These vessels might have left the coast, and those engaged on them might not find out the change till too late. Should they not know the change in the law?

Major ATKINSON.—No; we do not want them to know till we catch them.

Mr. W. D. STEWART said there was a forfeiture clause in the Bill—not only were very severe penalties provided, but vessels found illegally catching seals were forfeited to Her Majesty. In the case of penal legislation of this kind, where there were not only very serious penalties, but forfeiture, very serious reasons should be shown before the Bill was allowed to be passed. He thought no sufficient reason had been shown that the matter was one of emergency; and a little more debate should take place on the question than there seemed likely to be.

Mr. FISHER said the penalties now inflicted had been found quite insufficient to act as a deterrent. In the case of the "Awarua," recently, fines had been imposed, but they were so insignificant in amount that it was found profitable to break the law, and he understood that, in spite of this fine, illegal sealing was now about to be engaged in.

Mr. BRUCE said the honourable member for Dunedin West might recollect that during the last Parliament some honourable members who could speak with authority on the subject contended that the present laws were quite insufficient to prevent illegal sealing. The late member for Port Chalmers (Mr. Macandrew), for instance, was strongly of opinion that the law should be made very much more stringent, in order to preserve the seal-fisheries. He (Mr. Bruce) did not think they ought to take into account the fact that those on the two vessels which had been referred to which had set off on an illegal sealing cruise might find, if caught, that the law had been altered. At present a man might get, say, three months' imprisonment for picking pockets. He might proceed to pick pockets, assuming that that was the maximum penalty he might get; but would he deserve any sympathy if he found, when caught, that the law had been altered and he could get six months? He did not think the Legislature should give a great amount of consideration to those who deliberately broke the law, and they should not be allowed to plead that the law had been altered without their knowledge.

Mr. W. D. STEWART had no wish to oppose the Bill, but they should be very careful in suddenly altering the criminal law to such an extent as was proposed.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES hoped the Bill would pass. It was so necessary that it should be allowed to pass without a word, and he hoped that it would have the effect it ought to have.

Bill read a second and a third time.

PUBLIC REVENUES BILL.

Major ATKINSON moved the second reading of this Bill.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Late as it is in the session, I certainly think that some explanation should have been given of this measure. However, I understand that, although power is given to appoint agents at Home, it is not the intention of the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government to negotiate these debentures in England. I do not know whether the honourable gentleman will give any pledge; but I understand that it is not his intention to do so. I should like the honourable gentleman to explain two other points in the Bill. As it is drawn, it is difficult to understand whether it is the intention to limit the amount of £400,000 to any less amount that might be proved to be the deficiency of the year, or whether it is intended to take this amount as a conjectural amount, and to give authority to raise the sum whether the deficiency should prove to be this amount or not. My difficulty is increased because notice has been placed on the Order Paper of an additional clause to be inserted by the honourable member, the meaning of which clause is not very clear to me. Before I proceed to remark further, I do not think I am asking too much if I beg of the honourable member to explain this clause, and whether he intends to limit the amount to the deficiency, or to take an arbitrary sum of £400,000.

Major ATKINSON.—I propose to take the arbitrary sum of £400,000, because it is very difficult to estimate the amount of the deficiency; but I should propose to issue the debentures to some smaller amount if this is too much. I do not wish to borrow more; but it may be difficult to say what should be the amount, because I may want to raise money before the actual deficiency is known. The honourable gentleman knows the necessity of this sometimes, and therefore I take an arbitrary amount. With regard to the new clause, I may remark that under the present Public Revenues Act the appropriations of the Consolidated Fund are extended over an additional quarter, up to June; and of the Public Works Fund only the balance of the unexpended votes is so extended. Up to a year or two ago it was customary to vote the amount proposed to be expended in the current year, and the amount which the Government would contract for was treated as liabilities at the end of the year, and taken as one vote. The late Minister for Public Works changed this system, and added one column for the amount proposed to be actually spent in one year, and then he took authority to let contracts to an amount which was indicated in a second column. We have followed this practice, and have taken in the first column the actual expenditure of the year; but it is necessary to have more than this in order to continue the expenditure to the following June. That is the sole object of this clause.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Then, I understand that this new clause has nothing to do with the deficiency of the present year.

Major ATKINSON.—Oh, no.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I thought it right to refer to the matter, because it appeared to give power to the Government to include in the deficiency of the present year the liabilities of next year, which, by the law as it stands, come into the expenditure of the next year.

Major ATKINSON.—This applies only to the Public Works Fund.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I thank the honourable gentleman. As regards the £400,000, I had intended to propose an amendment in Committee limiting the power of borrowing to the exact deficiency of the year. But, since the honourable gentleman adheres to his fixed arbitrary sum, and it will not indicate the exact deficiency of the year, I do not wish to place any inconvenience in his way. It is clearly understood that, although the £400,000 is borrowed, it does not follow that there is a deficiency to that amount.

Dr. NEWMAN.—The matter of these deficiency bills is one of the greatest importance. I do not think the Premier has, in this Bill, sufficiently grappled the position. The position I take to be this: that it is the grand aim of every Treasurer, when he finds himself behindhand in his revenue, to float paper in order to keep himself going. Look at the history of these deficiency bills in the past, and let us see what the results have been. Five years ago a Treasurer wiped off £1,800,000 of these bills, and then we started over again. But almost immediately afterwards there was another deficiency of £150,000, and this was, as in the former case, wiped off by being put into the funded debt of the colony; and now, again, we have to find another £400,000, which makes a total of some £2,400,000 of deficiency bills—in other words, of the money this country was behindhand in its revenue. The House should look at this matter with the gravest concern. I know what these deficiency bills are in England; and I believe that here they bear about the same proportion to our consolidated revenue as the deficiency bills in England do. This fact remains: that, after being free five years ago, we have £950,000 of deficiency, in addition to the fact that we have funded £150,000: in fact, there is a deficiency in revenue of nearly £1,100,000. It will be said, no doubt, that these deficiency bills are usually given to meet large payments of interest as they become due; but the whole history of the colony shows that sooner or later they will become funded.

Major ATKINSON.—The honourable gentleman is altogether wrong.

Dr. NEWMAN.—The honourable gentleman had £1,800,000 of deficiency five years ago, £150,000 afterwards, and now there is £400,000 to-day.

Major ATKINSON.—The proportion of deficiency bills funded is a very small fraction of those issued.

Dr. NEWMAN.—Although we started a fresh career when those deficiency bills were wiped off, we have since gone on adding to the number issued. Our power of issuing them will be exhausted in a few years, and then we shall find what we have issued and commence again. This simply means that this colony is out-running its revenue by so much; and that is an entirely unjustifiable condition of finance. I think we should live more within our means, and, instead of having £900,000 of deficiency bills, surely it would be quite sufficient if we had £600,000 issued at one time. At one time we had only £600,000; and a year or two ago it was proposed to add £200,000 more. I then thought that that ought to be vigorously protested against, and it was my intention, if I had seen I had any chance of carrying it—which I found on canvassing honourable members I had not—to move an amendment refusing to increase the limit within which those bills might be issued. But, now, here we are authorising the issue of £400,000 more. We are asked to increase the limit by £200,000; and I ask the Premier if he cannot do with £700,000. If we do not check this kind of financing the result will be this: that the moment there is a strain upon our resources we shall fund the whole of these deficiency bills, and then start on a fresh course of issuing more bills. I do not think that the Treasurer should countenance this policy. If we are overrunning our revenue we ought to increase our taxation and make the people realise that they are living beyond their means, instead of issuing this enormous amount of deficiency bills, and from time to time greatly adding to the funded debt of the colony. For this reason I hope the Treasurer will accept my suggestion to reduce the amount of deficiency bills issuable to £700,000.

Major ATKINSON.—Of course it would be quite easy to do that and to abolish all Treasury bills; but it would come to this: that we should have to put on taxation to the extent of a million. I do not know whether the honourable gentleman is prepared to advocate that instead of the issue of Treasury bills. It is probably known to the House that the English Government is always a quarter behind in its revenue; and we are also, to a considerable extent, behind in our revenue, and we must, as they do in England, find means of anticipating our revenue or put on taxation to an enormous and unnecessary extent. It is impossible to abolish the issue of Treasury bills unless we are going to increase taxation.

Dr. NEWMAN.—I do not propose to abolish them all at once.

Major ATKINSON.—Well, the argument will apply to the extent that the honourable gentleman wishes to abolish the issue of Treasury bills. He wants us to go back to the old days; but he forgets that in the old days we had no interest to pay. The honourable gentleman has never considered the matter at all, or he would never have made the speech that he has made to-night. Why, the English Government have authority to anticipate the whole of their revenue, and very frequently take advantage of their authority to a very large extent. We have never asked for authority to anticipate more than a quarter of our revenue. Let us take the position of the Consolidated Fund on the 31st of March. Let us assume that our finance has been perfectly sound, and that on the 31st of March all payments due within that year have been met, and that all revenue due up to that date has been received at the Treasury. Supposing that our finance is absolutely sound on the 31st March, and that we commence the new year with a clear balance-sheet, what happens? We have, during the month of April, to pay out £600,000 for interest. Where is that money to come from? It is quite clear that it can only be obtained by anticipating the revenue; therefore we must have authority to issue sufficient Treasury bills to raise money to meet that amount. When we get a little further into the year—in October—the revenue has nearly recovered itself; but then we have to pay out another £600,000 of interest, besides having had to meet demands for interest during the current half-year in odd amounts totalling up something like £900,000. Where is that money to come from unless we are able, when the pressure comes, to issue Treasury bills? When the honourable gentleman refers to the amount we used to issue in deficiency bills in past years he fails to recollect that the whole position of the finance is entirely changed, for the reasons I have stated. The Treasury bills must be in proportion to the interest that we have to pay, and must enable us to anticipate revenue in order to meet interest payments on particular dates. Since we have consolidated our debts we have had to pay most of our interest in April and October. In April we have received no revenue at all towards meeting that interest, because we are obliged to remit the money Home some six weeks before that, and we must have Treasury bills to enable us to do it. We are also thrown out by the revenue coming in unequally. We do not ordinarily collect the property-tax, for instance, until the second half of the year; and where are we to get the money to meet our liabilities which we look to the property-tax to discharge? I say, having considerable experience, that it is quite impossible that we can carry on safely unless we have authority extending over deficiency bills to the amount of £900,000. At present we have power to issue such bills to the value of £1,045,000; but we propose to reduce that to £900,000 by this Bill, which I consider to be the lowest limit possible. But the distinction between deficiency bills for this purpose—for anticipating revenue—and deficiency bills for covering deficits on the operations of the year is as great as the difference between light and dark. The honourable gentleman is mixing up deficits with the very necessary and proper operations, which are entirely independent of deficits, on the ordinary transactions of the year. The honourable gentleman has failed to give the matter any attention, and he has fallen into the error of confounding the practice of temporarily issuing deficiency bills in order to pay interest with the deficits that may occur at the end of the year. But the two cases are entirely and absolutely distinct. As to the funding of deficiency bills to which the honourable gentleman has alluded, if he had really looked into the matter he would have seen at once that this great sum which was funded by myself in 1881—£1,800,000—was partly an accumulation of £800,000 of deficiency bills which had been issued in aid of the provinces. They were really to cover provincial liability which had accrued from time to time as we were winding up the provinces, and had to be met, and they were necessarily added to the debt of the colony. As to the other million, that unquestionably was a deficit; and it arose from the failure of the Land Fund to meet expectations. The honourable gentleman will no doubt recollect that the Land Fund had been relied upon to an enormous extent in the years 1878 and 1879; but the estimates proved delusive. A deficiency occurred, and it was necessary, in the opinion of Parliament, to add that deficiency to the funded debt. If we had not added it to the debt we should have had to put on taxation, and that was impossible. When we came into office at that time we did put on taxation to a considerable extent; but it was quite impossible to meet that million by extra taxation. It was felt desirable to fund it, and the House authorised that to be done. I am quite willing to go a long way with the honourable gentleman if he desires to put on taxation to cover deficiencies; but, if we are to do without deficiency bills at all, then we must—unnecessarily, as I think—increase the revenue by something like one-fourth; and, if he will go to his constituents and tell them that he proposes to do that, then it will be quite time enough for him to come and talk to us about doing away with deficiency bills altogether, and to give us a lecture such as he has given us to-night. I think the limit proposed is a most reasonable one, and, as I have said, I have taken £400,000 as an arbitrary amount, because I think that that will not leave us more than a fair margin. If he is prepared to recommend that, instead of taking power to issue deficiency bills, we should put on taxation for £400,000 to meet contingencies to the amount provided for, it will be very well for him to talk to us as he has talked. I agree that we should make our expenditure come within our revenue: that is what the Government are doing; but that has nothing whatever to do with the question that the honourable gentleman has raised, because, for the reasons I have stated, we must continue to issue deficiency bills in anticipation of revenue; and so long as the year's revenue is sufficient to meet its engagements, and wipe off its deficiency bills from time to time, there is no reason to complain of what is a very proper and very convenient transaction in connection with our finances.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CONTRACT BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—I propose to move resolutions on this subject, and then to ask the House to deal with the Bill. As I indicated to the House some few days ago, the Government have been in communication with the agents of the company, and have been informed that the company accept all the proposals which the House had made in its resolution based on the report of the Committee, except that there is a difficulty with regard to the running-powers. Had the House not been in session it would have been within the discretion of the Government to settle this matter; but, as the House is in session, we thought it desirable to apply to the House again. I therefore submit alternative proposals. The first is that the Government should undertake the working of the four sections which are described in the resolution, giving to the company 40 per cent. of the gross proceeds. Now, it is possible, in working the lines upon these terms, there will be a small loss. It may amount to £1,000 or £1,800 a year. It is proposed, as honourable gentlemen see, not to bind the Government to work these sections for more than five years. The company have also informed us that it is not at all likely that they will want us to work the sections on the West Coast, but that we shall be asked to work simply those at the Nelson and Christchurch ends, which adjoin our lines, and may be worked at small expense. The alternative is, that the company may begin the line where they choose, the Government not undertaking any working at all. Honourable gentlemen will find set out on the Order Paper the alternative proposals. The Government will recommend the first course. It will be for the House to determine which of these two courses it will follow. As I say, after careful consideration the Government recommend the first; but some honourable gentlemen may differ on the subject, and therefore the Government will accept whichever the House desires. In the meantime, I propose to move the first series of resolutions which appear on the Order Paper.

Motion made, and question proposed,—“(1.) That the Government be authorised to work the several sections of the Midland Railway hereinafter described: (a) A section from Belgrave southwards, to cost £60,000; length, say, six or seven miles: (b) a section from Springfield towards the west, to cost £60,000; length, say, five miles: (c) a section from Brunner-ton towards the east, say, nine miles: and (d) a section from Brunnerton to Ahaura, say, twelve miles.

“(2.) The Government to be called upon only to run such number of trains as they may consider necessary for the requirements of traffic.

“(3.) The Government to maintain only the rails, sleepers, and ballast; not the formation-works or bridges. The company to remove all large slips, and to make good any damage which arises from floods or other accidents to the permanent-way or works.

“(4.) The Government to pay to the company 40 per cent. of the gross receipts derived from the working of the sections of railway above mentioned.

“(5.) If more rolling-stock than the Government has at present on the Nelson and Grey-mouth lines be requisite to work the company's sections at those places, the company shall either provide the additional rolling-stock required at their own cost, the Government keeping it in repair, or shall pay the Government the interest on the cost of providing such additional rolling-stock as may be required.

“(6.) The arrangement for working traffic on this basis to be for not more than five years from date of new contract, after which, if traffic is to be continued by the Government, the arrangement to be on the basis of similar arrangements hitherto made with other private companies.

“(7.) Beyond the four sections hereinabove referred to, the company may make extensions when and how it pleases, but shall not be obliged to work any such extension until it is ready to do so; and, if the Government wishes to work any such extension, it is to do so on the same terms as hereinabove set forth for the four sections therein referred to.

“(8.) The company will construct any particular section which the Government may desire if the Government agree to work it on the basis above set forth.

“(9.) The working or non-working of any section of the railway is not to affect the earning of land-grants by the company in respect of such sections.”—(Major Atkinson.)

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—I understand from the Premier that the company agreed to the promises embodied in the draft contract, which was approved of by this House and the other branch of the Legislature. The resolution which we are now asked to agree to has only been in our hands a few minutes, and I have not had an opportunity of considering the precise effect or the bearing which the resolution would have upon the contract between the company and the colony. But there is little doubt that the resolution foreshadows this fact: that the company will ultimately force the colony to take over the railways entirely at an early date. It is only a step in that direction, but it is a very bold step, and whether the Government contemplate that or not I cannot say.

Major ATKINSON.—No, they do not at all.

This only refers to the proposal in the draft contract.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—It is contemplated that the colony shall run the lines.

Major ATKINSON.—Only these small sections which we compel them to make.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—You ask authority to work the lines.

Major ATKINSON.—Only those small sections adjoining our own lines. We are not compelled to work any more at all.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—I believe if you work part you will wind up by working the whole. Then, for instance, I may direct the Premier's attention to these words: "The company to remove all the large slips." Well, it is rather difficult to define what distinguishes large slips from small ones. I do not know where the dividing-line can be drawn. I do not know that there is a legal definition, or that there is any distinction.

Major ATKINSON.—I shall be happy to fill in a word to define that.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—It says, further, that the arrangement is to be on the basis of a similar arrangement hitherto made with other private companies: does that mean private companies here or in England?

Major ATKINSON.—We have not worked any in England.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—Probably we shall, however, one day if we go on like this—we do not seem to stick at anything. I understand that it means other private companies in the colony. Of course I do not exactly know what is meant by a private company unless it be a district-railway company. This measure, no doubt, has been carefully considered by the Government. It is not competent for a private member on the spur of the moment to say what is really the precise bent of these proposals: so that the Government must take the responsibility.

Major ATKINSON.—These proposals have been drawn up by the Public Works Department, and I suppose they are right.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—The Premier pointed out that the Government was to pay the company 40 per cent. of the gross receipts. Assuming that 60 per cent. was the cost of working, the colony would have to bear the loss.

Major ATKINSON.—That is so.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I understand the honourable gentleman to move the first resolutions, not the alternative one.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I may say I should certainly object to the alternative one. As regards the first resolutions, I think they are tolerably fair, and that the company may be submitting to some sacrifice in making the proposed commencement at the different ends. There is only one point I wish to draw the honourable gentleman's attention to. I presume that the exact points will not be incorporated in the contract.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Sir J. VOGEL.—And therefore I would just ask the honourable gentleman to make a note of this point. Clause (7) says,—

"Beyond the four sections hereinabove referred to, the company may make extensions when and how it pleases, but shall not be obliged to work any such extension until it is ready to do so; and, if the Government wishes to work any such extension, it is to do so on the same terms as hereinabove set forth for the four sections therein referred to."

Now, Sir, these words supersede the provisions of the contract which force the company within a certain time to complete the line. I think the words should be put in, "save as to the conditions of the contract as to the completion of the railway."

Major ATKINSON.—Yes.

Mr. HISLOP.—We propose an amendment to make it read in this way:—

"Beyond the four sections hereinbefore referred to, the company may make further extensions of each of such sections, but subject to their obligations to carry on and to finish the works as heretofore provided for, though they may carry on the works when and how they please."

Sir J. VOGEL.—That meets the point.

Mr. PEACOCK.—May I ask on what basis it is calculated that we shall lose not more than £800 or £1,000? How is the calculation made that we shall not lose a larger sum than the one mentioned?

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I would suggest to the Premier a verbal alteration in the last paragraph of clause 2 of the contract as it came from the Upper House, where these words occur: "Nothing herein contained shall affect the rights of the Queen to resume any lands selected by the company pursuant to 'The Mining Act, 1886.'" The Mining Act of 1886 does not apply to land selected at all, but only applies to land alienated by sale or lease. So I would move that "pursuant to" be altered to "save where the same has been sold under 'The Mining Act, 1886.'"

Major ATKINSON.—We cannot amend that now; but if the honourable gentleman will kindly give me the amendment we will get it inserted in the contract.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—The very words might be important, as preserving the rights of the Crown under the Mining Act.

Major ATKINSON.—Will the honourable gentleman kindly make a minute of that and let me have it? and I will put it in the contract.

Mr. WILSON.—Will the Premier say which of the two alternative proposals the company themselves wish?

Major ATKINSON.—The company have intimated that they agree to the first, but probably not to the second, so far as the agents here know.

Mr. ROSS.—I would ask, what object has the Government in relieving the company from their obligations with regard to the working of these lines, especially when, according to the statement of the Premier, we shall do so at a certain loss? We have given the company large concessions to construct the lines, and now it appears that we are going to work them at the cost of the country.

Mr. PERCEVAL.—I think the honourable member does not quite understand it. If he will recollect, in the contract we bound the company to commence at Springfield, Belgrove, and Brunnerton. That undoubtedly puts the company at some disadvantage, because they make pieces of the railway which they cannot work advantageously, and have to distribute their plant to construct these lines. Well, in the contract there was a clause that the Governor might enter into a contract with reference to the running-power on such terms as the company and the colony might agree to. These resolutions now set out in detail the terms of this running-power. That really is the position. Instead of leaving it as it is in the contract, these resolutions now set out the terms upon which the company and the colony shall work these lines.

Mr. ROSS.—I quite understand that, but not why we should make such terms as will entail upon the colony a certain loss in the working of the lines.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—The honourable member for Roslyn asks, first, why we should relieve the company of such an obligation. The company have entered into no obligation of the kind. They have entered into no obligation to commence at three ends at once, and we ask them to do that, and they will consent to do it on condition that we undertake to do a certain thing. My honourable friend asks why we should entail a certain loss upon the colony. It is not a certain loss, but a possible loss. I do not know that it is a probable loss, because there are twenty miles to be run, which would entail no further expense to the colony except for a little fuel. The same rolling-stock and men would do.

An Hon. MEMBER.—We have to maintain the rails.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—Yes; but my honourable friend must know that if you have an empty train running the wear-and-tear will be very light, and within the term of three years within which we undertake to work the line it would be inappreciable; and, then, we gain the employment of working-men in all those centres.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I would point out to the honourable gentleman that this is not a thing to be decided upon at five minutes' notice. I think we should pass the resolutions as they stand, leaving the Government to see afterwards to the proper wording of the contract. I do not think the amendment of the honourable gentleman is altogether safe. He speaks, for instance, of "the works as heretofore provided for." It should be "the works provided in the contract," for this may not be the last clause of the contract. And then the words "how they please" is a very wide phrase. It may mean flatter works, steeper gradients, or worse curves. I am content to pass the resolutions as they are printed, leaving the Government to see that they are put in proper shape.

Mr. Hislop's amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion, "That these resolutions be read as part of the draft contract brought up with the report of the Committee," agreed to.

Bill introduced, and read a first, a second, and a third time.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CONTRACT BILL.

This Bill was read the first time.

On the motion, That the Bill be read the second time presently,

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said,—Probably it will be convenient for the Council if I state what course I propose to pursue in reference to the different Bills which have been brought down and which have only just been distributed. The Council having read those Bills a first time, I propose that the second reading should be taken at half-past two o'clock to-day. That will give honourable members plenty of time to read the Bills. In regard to the Midland Railway Bill, the object will, I apprehend, be only to see that the Bill is in accordance with the contract that has been passed. This Bill has been passed by the House of Representatives, and is now submitted to the Council for its consideration. The only objection that has been made is, in point of truth, a money question. As the Council is aware, the 13th section of the contract which we passed provided that there should be running-powers given in accordance with what was done with other companies in New Zealand. That was found to be exceedingly indefinite, and the Government thought it was desirable that it should be put into a definite shape. The Government insisted that the railway should be commenced at Belgrove, Springfield, and Brunnerton. The company naturally objected to that without some arrangement being effected as to running-powers upon these different sections when completed and ready for use. The matter has been, I may say, under negotiation with the company from the time when the matter was first before the Council up to yesterday. Yesterday was the only time when the arrangement was made; and it came to this: The option was offered to the House of Representatives of passing resolutions—which have been passed there, and which are printed—to allow the company to begin where they like and carry the work on where they like; or that, if the House of Representatives did not like to do that, but would rather incur the money responsibility, and would require them to carry on at Brunner-ton, at Springfield, and at Belgrove in the manner proposed, therefore, if that were done, there should be some arrangement by which the Government could run those sections when they were finished. The House chose the alternative of compelling the company to begin at Belgrove, Springfield, and Brunner-ton, and agreed for a limited time to run trains under certain conditions; and if the company required the Government to run more trains they would be able to do so on certain conditions, which would be arranged. The resolutions adopted by the House—in which the Council is now asked to concur—are inserted in the Bill, because it was thought the Council should have power to deal with this part of the matter. The Bill is so drawn that it does not compel the Government to enter into a contract, but gives them power to do so on certain conditions, those conditions being those which we had under consideration a short time ago. This announcement may facilitate the consideration of the matter by the members of the Council. What I propose now, therefore, is that you, Sir, should leave the chair, to resume it at half-past two o'clock this afternoon, when I shall propose to take the second reading of the measures which have come up from the other branch of the Legislature.

The Council adjourned till half-past two o'clock p.m.

COUNCIL RESUMED.

The Hon. the SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past two o'clock p.m.

On the motion for the second reading of the Bill,

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said,—I have already intimated to the Council that the object of this Bill is to give effect to the arrangements made in the contract presented to the Council about a fortnight ago. Of course nothing could be done with those resolutions unless authority were given to the Government to execute a contract. It would have been much more convenient and much better if we could have prepared a contract and then legalised it afterwards; but that was impossible, because the contract would have to be submitted to the directors of the company in England, and no doubt it is a rather complicated matter to pick out from two Acts of Parliament and two long contracts exactly what is meant. It is in pursuance of a resolution arrived at by the House of Representatives, and forwarded to the Council for its approval, that this Bill is now introduced. I have already explained to the Council that under the original contract, as it was framed and laid before the Assembly in the first instance, and passed by the Legislature, section 18 left it very indefinite as to the way that running-powers were to be given to the company or the Government on their respective lines. As I have said, the matter has been the subject of a great deal of correspondence since the conditions of the contract were approved by the Legislature, and I am almost afraid to say what the telegrams which have been sent Home will cost the company. The end of the correspondence has been that a great number of alterations have been made in the contract as it was originally proposed—that is, the draft contract of 1887. As the Council is aware, a draft contract was sent out; but the Government did not think fit to accede to that, and it was referred to the House of Representatives, and they came to certain conclusions. And the end of it was that very large alterations were made in the proposals as contained in the draft contract of 1887. The company have been informed by telegram of all these alterations, and, one after another, they have acceded to them. The only question outstanding to the last was this question of the running-powers. The Government did not give way upon any other point; but upon this question of the running-powers it was thought, both in the interests of the Government of the country and of the company, that something more definite should be done. The company were to be compelled to start at three different places, and to carry the work on steadily from each with expedition; and it was thought that, in compelling them to do that, a concession might be made to them with regard to the running-powers. A proposition to this effect was made, and was assented to by the company's agent here, and I presume the company themselves will take no exception to it. The alteration was to this effect: to abolish the 18th section altogether, and leave to the company to say whether they would accept these resolutions as they were placed before the House of Representatives, and agreed to yesterday. I do not know that there is anything more to say about it. It is necessary that this Bill should be passed, and that these resolutions should be embodied in the Bill. I do not know whether we should deal with these resolutions first, or whether we should postpone dealing with them until we come to the section in the Bill which will embody them. However, I now propose, That this Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I suppose there will be some loss entailed upon the colony by the granting of this further concession. The Attorney-General has not stated whether such will be the case or not. If there is to be a loss by granting this concession, I think it is desirable that we should be informed as to what would be the extent of that loss.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I am not able to say what the loss will be—very different estimates have been formed; but the expense of carrying it out will be only small, because no additional rolling-stock will be required at Springfield, and there would be no additional cost at Belgrove, so that the cost of carrying out this arrangement will be very small. It may be that it may cost nothing at all, but I apprehend that there probably will be some cost. There appears to be no population at all beyond a given point on one section, although on the Springfield Section, I believe, there is a portion of country where there are some settlers. I anticipate that the expense will be trifling, because the present rolling-stock will be sufficient to perform the work. When the Brunnerton Section is carried on, I apprehend there will be no loss on that. That line will run through a district which will pay very well, and I have no doubt that the result will be no loss at all, but, in point of fact, a profit.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I hope that my honourable friend's rather sanguine views of the result of the opening of these detached pieces of railway will be fulfilled. I can only say, with reference to the Bill, that I view it with a great deal of apprehension. The whole history of our transactions with the persons who have undertaken this contract has been one of concession. Further concessions have been demanded, and further concessions have been yielded. It is impossible for one to say when these concessions will come to an end. I am satisfied in my own mind that this proposal is only a lever whereby to obtain still further concessions. I shall, in this matter, confine myself merely to voting against the Bill; I shall take no further action, leaving to the Government the responsibility of the matter. My own impression is that we have granted concessions enough already.

Bill read a second and a third time.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I beg to move certain resolutions. It is necessary that they should be entered on our Journals, and that we should send back a message to the House of Representatives stating that we agree to the resolutions. It is merely a formal matter. The resolutions are as follow:—

“(1.) That the Government be authorised to work the several sections of the Midland Railway hereinafter described: (a) A section from Belgrove southwards, to cost £60,000; length, say, six or seven miles: (b) a section from Springfield towards the west, to cost £60,000; length, say, five miles: (c) a section from Brunnerton towards the east, say, nine miles: and (d) a section from Brunnerton to Ahaura, say twelve miles.

“(2.) The Government to be called upon only to run such number of trains as they may consider necessary for the requirements of traffic.

“(3.) The Government to maintain only the rails, sleepers, and ballast, not the formation-works or bridges. The company to remove all large slips, and to make good any damage which arises from floods or other accidents to the permanent-way or works.

“(4.) The Government to pay to the company 40 per cent. of the gross receipts derived from the working of the sections of railway above mentioned.

“(5.) If more rolling-stock than the Government has at present on the Nelson and Grey-mouth lines be requisite to work the company's sections at those places, the company shall either provide the additional rolling-stock required at their own cost (the Government keeping it in repair), or shall pay the Government the interest on the cost of providing such additional rolling-stock as may be required.

“(6.) The arrangement for working traffic on this basis to be for not more than five years from date of new contract, after which, if traffic is to be continued by the Government, the arrangement to be on the basis of similar arrangements hitherto made with other private companies.

“(7.) Beyond the four sections hereinabove referred to, the company may make extensions when and how it pleases, but shall not be obliged to work any such extension until it is ready to do so; and, if the Government wishes to work any such extension, it is to do so on the same terms as hereinabove set forth for the four sections therein referred to.

“(8.) The company will construct any particular section which the Government may desire, if the Government agree to work it on the basis above set forth.

“(9.) The working or non-working of any section of the railway is not to affect the earning of land-grants by the company in respect of such sections.”

Resolutions agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives stating that the House had agreed to the following amendment proposed by His Excellency the Governor in this Bill—namely, in clause 9, to strike out the words “not exceeding one thousand five hundred pounds,” and to substitute “not exceeding two thousand five hundred pounds.”

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I propose that this amendment be agreed to. During the course of this Bill through the Council I intimated that it was probable that some such amendment as this would be proposed. When the whole subject of the salaries of the Commissioners was under the consideration of the Government they felt very great doubts about the matter. Therefore, when they came to the conclusion to make the salary of the Chief Commissioner £1,500, they felt it was probable that they might have to ask the Legislature to agree to such an amendment as that which is now proposed. I, for one, felt very strongly on the subject, because I think that the success of this new arrangement entirely depends upon the capacity of the persons who have the matter in hand, and especially of the principal Commissioner. The amendment does not absolutely pledge the Government to determine that the Commissioner shall have the sum named, but it says that he shall have a sum not exceeding that. It leaves it to the discretion of the Government, to a certain extent, to say whether they will import from England a first-class man—who could probably be got at £2,500—or whether they will be content to find a person in this colony, or in one of the adjacent colonies, to hold the office of Chief Commissioner. For my part I should, first of all, ascertain from the Agent-General whether we could obtain such a person as we want at the salary named. I feel that a great responsibility attaches to us in connection with this new arrangement, and I am very anxious that we should make it successful. I have taken a great deal of interest in the Bill from beginning to end, and I am satisfied that the Bill as it stands is a workable Bill. I believe that everything will now depend on the Chief Commissioner. I think it would be a great pity if, after making this great change in connection with our railways, and going to this great expense, we were to allow the matter to be spoiled by not giving a sufficient salary in order to get a competent man to take the Chief Commissionership. I move, That the amendment proposed in the Governor's message be adopted.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—I hope it will not be agreed to, for this reason: The honourable gentleman has informed the Council that it is discretionary with the Government to determine whether they will give this £2,500 or not. My own impression is that, if you put a sum of that kind before the public, no less a sum will be paid to the gentleman who may receive the appointment. There was a very strong expression of opinion in the Council a few days ago that we should endeavour to obtain some suitable person in the colony for the Commissionership. It is quite clear, from the remarks of the honourable gentleman, that it is the intention of the Government to apply to the Agent-General for assistance in selecting a Commissioner at Home.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I did not say that.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—I make no assertion. I only form my own conclusion from the remarks of the honourable gentleman, and I think any one would gather from what the Attorney-General said that it is intended to seek the assistance of the Agent-General in England to see whether we can get a good man from England at the sum mentioned. I am of opinion that we can get within the colony or colonies as good a man as we should get from England. I am quite sure that if we go to England we shall not get a first-class man. We may get what would be considered a fifth-class man. A first-class man is not to be obtained for that salary. I hope, therefore, the Council will not agree to this proposal.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—The expression of opinion referred to by the honourable gentleman was by no means unanimous, that we should obtain a Commissioner in the colony. Various opinions were expressed by honourable members; and some honourable gentlemen, myself included, thought it would be very advisable to obtain at any rate the Chief Commissioner from England. I am very glad to see that the Government propose to take power to themselves to give this increased salary if required. For my part, I regard this Bill very much as being in the direction of experimental legislation, and I consider that the whole success of the scheme will entirely depend on the administration. That is to say, if you do not get a first-rate man, a man with a great variety of qualities—qualities of the character demanded for that particular position—the whole thing will be a disastrous failure, and very shortly there will be an outcry to revert to the old system. If you get a first-rate man, in whom the people will have confidence, probably the departure will be a success. I think it quite possible, however, that, after a short time, an outcry will be raised and the Railway Commission will be denounced by the popular voice as a despotism. The only chance to prevent that happening will be to give the Government power to get the very best man they can for the position. I shall cordially support the proposal of the Government.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I very much agree with the Hon. Mr. Buckley that the Government might obtain a suitable man within the colony. Whoever may be the Commissioners, they will be possessed of an amount of power that no previous managers of our railways have possessed. I am quite satisfied that there are men here who, under the altered conditions, would prove quite equal to the majority of those whom we are likely to be able to choose from in England. The responsibility of this measure must lie with the Government. If the Government can get suitable men in the colony, I hope they will do so; but I am not prepared to say that, if the Government cannot get within the colony those who, in their opinion, are suitable for the position, they should not have the power of going to England and obtaining Commissioners there. With reference to this Bill, I leave the responsibility entirely on the Government; and I will do nothing to cramp their liberty in doing what they consider best under the circumstances.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I said, when the Bill was under discussion on a previous occasion, that I feared one cause of the failure of the Bill, if there should be a failure, would be that the salary of the Chief Commissioner was fixed too low. I am glad to see that a discretion is now to be given to the Government to fix the salary of the Chief Commissioner at £2,500. I feel that the whole success of this scheme depends on the manner in which it is administered. I think that the amount asked for in the Governor's message is a very reasonable sum, and that it will give the Government an opportunity of putting the thing into a fair position. I trust, with other honourable gentlemen who have spoken, that if the Government can see their way to getting a competent man in the colony they will give him the preference. At the same time, I recognise that it is much better to leave in their hands an ample margin of salary, in order to get the very best man for the management of our railways.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I apprehend that the Council would place itself in a somewhat false position if it were to reject the proposition of the Government. The House of Representatives has passed this amendment of the Bill, and has asked us to agree to it. I apprehend that the Council will place itself in a false position in this respect if it does not agree to that request: If this new arrangement in regard to our railways fails in consequence of the inefficiency of the men, no responsibility will rest with the Government or with the House of Representatives, but the sole responsibility will rest upon the Council; and, therefore, looking at it from that point of view—that it is a question which has been agreed to by the House of Representatives, and in which our concurrence is asked by that House—under all the circumstances in which we are placed, and considering the fact that the responsibility would rest entirely upon the Council, I trust the Council will not think of rejecting the proposition which has been made. I have always said that it does not follow that we shall find a suitable man in the colony, and that we shall probably have to go to England. I think it is of the very greatest importance that we should have the utmost latitude in order to find a competent man, as the whole matter entirely depends on the competency of the principal man. I hope, therefore, the Council will come to the conclusion that, under the circumstances, it is a wise thing and a proper thing to agree to this amendment. If the Council want to take the matter into their own hands and say, "We are entirely responsible for fixing this," they will, of course, be taking up a position they are entitled to take up; but they would place themselves in a very false position. There may be very competent men in the colony, for all I know; but I would point out that, if they have not had that kind of experience which is necessary to qualify them to undertake the management of such railways, they would not be competent in that sense of the term. It is not a constructing engineer that we want; we have constructing engineers already. But what we want is a man who understands the management of traffic; we want, not an engineer especially, but a man to act as traffic manager, and upon whom the whole management will rest, and it will depend upon his competency whether the undertaking becomes a success or not. Whether there are men sufficiently capable to discharge the duties of the appointments of second Commissioners is another question, no doubt; but, in my opinion, there is no man here who has that experience which men largely engaged in connection with railways in England have had; and we are in an out-of-the-way corner here, and, comparatively speaking, we are not in a position to judge properly of what is going on in the shape of improvements at Home. I think, therefore, we should look abroad and see if we cannot get a man for the position of Chief Commissioner sufficiently versed in the management of railways in England. I express my opinion freely on this subject at once, because it has entered into my mind from the very beginning that the whole difficulty of this matter had reference to the difficulty of obtaining a competent man, and I felt that we should have to go to England in order to obtain a man to fill the appointment of Chief Commissioner. The men among us have not had that experience which the men in England have had in the working of railways. At one time we thought that America would afford us a greater field of selection for a competent man; but the feeling now is that we ought to go to some of the men engaged in connection with the large railways in England and ascertain whether or not we can make a fair and reasonable engagement with one of them. But if we had to fall back upon America I do not think we should find that the scheme would be so likely to be a success. The Government and the House have fixed a sufficient sum for the purpose of making a fair trial of this matter. Let us have a fair sum put on the estimates, in order that we may induce one of the best men we can get to undertake the management. I would also point out that it is possible we may not have to spend the whole of the £2,500, but we wish to have the opportunity of arranging for the best man in England. Then, it is provided that the Act does not come into operation till such time as may be appointed by the Governor, and this, therefore, gives us ample opportunity of obtaining the best men to be had, and also of deciding on what is to be done in pursuance of the powers contained in the Bill. This does not hurry us, whereas if we had been hurried we might have taken a step that we should afterwards have regretted. Therefore I say that every possible consideration will be given to the subject, also to the men in the country and to the men out of the country, and that all pains will be taken to make a good choice. We may make a choice, but probably the scheme will not come into operation before the next session of the Assembly. I think that is exceedingly likely. I think, under all the circumstances, the Council will come to the conclusion that the wisest thing to do is to agree to the amendment which His Excellency the Governor has submitted to this Council.

Amendment agreed to.

PROPERTY-TAX BILL.

This Bill was read a first time.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said,—This session I have had many disagreeable things to do, especially in reference to the Midland Railway matter, for instance; but that is on a big scale, and the matter now before us is on a small scale. I have a belief that the present measure is necessary in order to equalise the revenue and expenditure, by raising the tax to a penny in the pound for the next year. It is not necessary that I should explain the object of this Bill, for, unfortunately, I think we can all understand the nature of the Bill perfectly.

If some means could have been taken for avoiding this I should have been well pleased; but we must remember that at present we have not only to exercise economy in our administration, but we have also to so manage that our expenditure shall not be the means of adding to the debt of the colony. There has been a deficiency during the last two years, which we have endeavoured to provide for by means of a Bill which has been read a second time just now. This is another measure, therefore, by which we can equalise the revenue and expenditure. I move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

Bill read a second and a third time.

AUSTRALASIAN NAVAL DEFENCE BILL.

This Bill was read a first time.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER, in moving the second reading, said,—Honourable members will remember that in the very early part of this session papers were laid on the table with reference to Australasian defence, and subsequently a draft of a Bill, which had been prepared in Queensland, and which had been passed by Victoria and New South Wales, was also laid on the table. Therefore I do not think it will be necessary for me to give any lengthy history of this matter, because I have no doubt that honourable members have well considered what is now before them. And I should say that the Bill is the same as that sent down from Queensland. The matter originated, as honourable members will remember, in the Conference which took place in England some seven or eight or nine months ago. This colony was represented there by the honourable gentleman who is now in the chair here, and also by Sir Francis Dillon Bell; and the other colonies were represented by some leading persons from each of them. This matter was fully discussed, and a conclusion was come to—a conclusion which, I think, was an exceedingly wise one—that an agreement such as this should be entered into by the Imperial Government and the Australasian Colonies. Two colonies have already adopted it, and I have no doubt that the non-agreement on the part of the other colonies at present is only temporary, and that Queensland will come in before long. I cannot understand the opposition to it. This agreement appears to be of the most favourable kind to the colonies; and it appears to me strange that the people of these colonies, who are far better off than the people at Home, should refuse to contribute their share towards their own defence, but seek to cast that burden on persons who are not so well off as we are. I think, as a matter of duty, we should so contribute, and that every consideration is in favour of our dealing with this subject in the way that it is proposed to be done. I cannot see anything more unwise than to reject this agreement. I am quite sure that the result of that would be to affect our reputation, and that our reputation would be worse in England than it is at the present time, and everybody knows that it is not very good at present. I should be very sorry that we should lose any respect which we may have. I am quite sure every reasonable man who thoroughly considers the Bill without any feeling of opposition, or any feeling of that kind, must come to the conclusion that it is very favourable towards the colonies, and that it is our duty as well as our interest to accept it fully and fairly. With these observations, I move, That the Bill be now read the second time.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I think, Sir, I should not like to see a Bill of this importance pass through the Council without, at all events, expressing very briefly my approval of it. I quite agree with the remarks of the Hon. the Attorney-General in moving the second reading of the Bill. I think it a step in the right direction, and that it is only a fair and reasonable thing that the colony should bear its just share of the cost of the protection of its own commerce. It is not for us to wait till a war breaks out. I think it is for us to be prepared to protect ourselves no matter what may occur. And, looking at the horizon at the present time in Europe, I think we may be prepared at any moment for a war among the great nations there; and it is our place to protect ourselves by this means, which is the most rational way that we can take to guard ourselves—by seeing that our waters are occupied by an adequate squadron. We are getting past the age of children, when we used to look to our mother to protect us; and I think we should take upon ourselves some share of the responsibility of defending these colonies, and also a share of the cost. In that respect we should only be occupying the position we are entitled to as one of the great colonies of the British Empire. We have not been behindhand in what we have done in former years. I can recollect when the colony undertook “a self-reliant policy,” as it was called, and we took our responsibility on our shoulders, and were able to bring the colony to a state of peace and harmony. The policy adopted in this Bill is the proper policy to adopt, and the question submitted to our consideration is one of a reasonable character. It does not attempt to throw more on us than we are able to bear, and gives us all we require at a very moderate cost, and gives us as efficient protection as we are in a position to accept at the present time. We wish to occupy a position that is right, and according to the arrangements entered into. In coming into an agreement of this kind the whole of the colonies will reap the benefit from it, and those colonies which choose to stand out from an arrangement which may be come to will be excluded from the position in which, for the first time, the colonies are interested as part of the Imperial whole. And we are consulted and advised with by the authorities themselves. The colonies which do not join in this will not be doing themselves justice at all; and I hope, therefore, that this Bill will not only be passed, but passed by a very substantial majority, as indicating the feeling of Parliament on the matter. It is not a matter which requires a great deal of discussion. I see we shall only be called upon by this, in the event of any of the other colonies standing out, to pay our pro rata portion of the original sum. And I agree with what the Attorney-General has said, that any colony that has not adopted the agreement will only stand out temporarily, and that ultimately better counsels will prevail and we shall find them all uniting on this question of common difficulty—this question of defence. It will bind us in our relations with the Home authorities, and raise our standing in the eyes of people at Home, when we take our proper duties on our own shoulders in seeking to assist the Home authorities in the work of defence.

The Hon. Mr. HART.—It seems to me, Sir, in regard to the policy of the measure, that it is something like insurance from fire in the case of a man's house. If a man had occasion to borrow money, it would be one of the things insisted upon by the lender that he should insure his house. If we must once more go into the money-market for borrowing purposes, it seems to me that, in order to get a favourable consideration of a proposal for such a loan, it would be absolutely necessary that some measure for the mutual defence of the colonies should be adopted, and that we should pay for our share thereof.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—Sir, while I cordially approve the measure now before us, yet I cannot but express my regret that it was not brought down earlier in the session. In saying this, I have no wish to cast any reflection on the Government, who have no doubt had great difficulty in piloting their various measures in the other House—although it has been a very easy matter in this Chamber—and probably the Government were compelled to defer this measure to a late period of the session. Yet, as a matter of fact, I think it is to be regretted that we are in this position: that we have really no time, nor a sufficient number of members present, to discuss this Bill in the manner which its importance demands. It may be said—and I think it was said by the Hon. the Attorney-General in introducing the Bill—that every one had been so fully informed as to the nature of these proposals that discussion is needless. I quite agree with him that, so far as public men are concerned, and especially so far as the members of this Council are concerned, discussion is needless. We have probably all made up our minds as to this proposal, and have thought over the subject, and we have no doubt generally arrived at the conclusion that this measure ought to be passed. But we have to consider also the effect which discussions in the Legislature have upon outside public opinion. I have heard it stated, and I think it has also been stated in the Press, that this measure was not brought before the country at the late general election, and that the country has had no opportunity of considering it. And it is said that if the question had been put to the constituencies they would have opposed it. Sir, that is not my opinion. I believe if the question had been fairly and properly put to the people they would, if not unanimously, at least by a very large majority, have approved of the measure now before us. But, Sir, it is quite within the knowledge of most people that this measure, like every other measure, has as its opponents persons who honestly believe, no doubt, that in doing what is here proposed we are going outside the sphere of our duties, and may involve ourselves in some very troublesome complications. These persons will no doubt put forth their views to the country, and it will strengthen these views if it is found that a Bill of this importance was passed through the Council without any discussion. It will be said, "Oh, no one cares much about it; no one could give any definite reasons for supporting it!" Though I think that would be exceedingly unjust, it is exactly an argument that will be used. A gentleman with whom I was conversing the other day—a gentleman who was known formerly very well in public life, and who is a very able writer and speaker—took these very views, and expressed his opinions—quite opposed to my own—which he would no doubt be able to address very strongly to the country; and, in that respect, I think it is to be regretted that a full and ample discussion is not to take place. But, while saying this, I do not detract from the reasons, or in any way wish to impugn the weight of the reasons, of the honourable gentleman who introduced the measure. Sir, it does appear that, in the first place, it is the duty of all parts of the British Empire to assist in its defence; and I think it would be an act of madness on our part to refuse to share the Imperial burdens whilst assuming the advantages of being connected with this great Empire. I quite agree with the Hon. Mr. Hart that it is to be looked on very largely as a question of insurance; and, in fact, it is the very cheapest form of insurance this colony could adopt. In regard to the cost of maintaining a navy, it is perfectly clear that to do it ourselves is entirely beyond the power of the colony, and we cannot merely rely on harbour defences for the defence of the country, and more especially for the defence of our commerce, which, as the preamble to the Bill states, we have recognised as an object of this measure, because the preamble to the Bill refers to the "maintenance of an additional naval force to be employed for the protection of the floating trade in Australasian waters." That being the case, it is quite clear that some measure of this nature was required. And now, referring to the amount we are asked to contribute, I think it is an exceedingly moderate one, and it appears to me that every care has been taken to limit our responsibilities to a very reasonable amount. The sum mentioned is, I think, £20,000 or £25,000 a year. No doubt that does mean, if capitalised, a considerable addition to our debt; but we must regard it in the nature of insurance, as has been described by the Hon. Mr. Hart; and I am sure that, if the matter were placed before the people in that way, they would realise the businesslike considerations involved in this proposal and vote for the sum. Apart from the question of justice and the question of prudence, I think there is another which ought also to be considered, and that is the tendency which the joining in this scheme will produce in the way of preserving the unity of the Empire. I am not one of those who have any belief in a political federation. I believe, myself, that a political federation in the shape of anything like representative institutions which would endeavour to discuss all such questions as peace and war is practically impossible; and that the time must inevitably come when the enormous increase of population over the whole of the Australasian Colonies will be such as to entirely remove the centre of political gravity from the British Islands to the colonies of Australasia themselves. It is merely a question of time when the population of these colonies must necessarily be enormously greater than that of the British Islands. Under these circumstances, it is quite clear that any attempt at political federation would fail, because, if you took anything like a population basis for your representation, then the inhabitants of Great Britain would be absolutely nowhere in comparison with the rest of the Empire. Instead of any attempt at political federation, I believe a measure of this sort will help to strengthen that federation of sentiment and interests which is already so exceedingly powerful in preserving the unity of the Empire. I believe the mere fact of the colonies showing their willingness to take a share of the expenses of the English navy will tend largely to strengthen the unity of the Empire. It will be looked upon as an earnest; it is not merely a sentimental belief, but a belief expressed in pounds, shillings, and pence, which is always the strongest; and when we believe in the unity of the Empire, and are prepared to pay for our share of the responsibility, apart from the purely commercial aspect of the question, apart from the question of insurance and the question of safety, I think that is a point which ought to be considered, and which this country would fairly agree to. Then, there is another point which I think New Zealand may fairly consider, and which has always seemed to me to be of importance,—that in any action of this kind in which the other colonies take part it would be exceedingly unwise for New Zealand to assume an attitude of isolation. I think we shall have to look to Australia something in the same sort of way as England looks on its connection with the Continent. The fact that the interests of England and Continental interests sometimes agree and sometimes conflict made it absolutely necessary for English statesmen to take a part in foreign affairs; and I believe, although in a very much smaller degree, there will be the absolute necessity of acting in unison in matters regarding the whole of Australasia, and that it will be impossible for New Zealand to “play a lone hand,” and that any attempt to do so will lead to very great disaster in future. Of course I do not mean to say that it will approach to anything like war; but there are other things besides war—questions of telegraphic communication, and the tariff, and matters of that kind, which, if we show a disposition to isolate ourselves from the other colonies, they will remember against us. Sir, I will not take up the time of the Council in discussing this subject, but I wished to make these few remarks for the very simple reason that no one else seemed prepared to speak on the subject: not that I think myself in any way competent to take up properly such a very important subject as this. I very cordially support the measure which is now before us.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPARD.—Sir, we do not all take the extremely favourable view of the Bill that has been, so far, put forward. It seems to me, looking round this Council and seeing how thinly the seats are occupied, this is not the time to open up a question of such vast magnitude—in fact, it may be called a question of world-wide importance. If we had had this Bill a fortnight ago we might then have discussed it at length, and the Government would have been able to gather the opinion of the Council from the discussion which would have taken place; but I think it is exceedingly unfortunate that we should have a measure of this magnitude—a measure not simply relating to a question of money, but to a great principle—coming down in the last hours of the session, and with scarcely a quorum present. It is not altogether a question of money, although something may be said about that aspect of the matter, for in a time of such severe retrenchment as that which has been proposed, when every branch of the public service will be reduced, and when every officer connected with the government of the country is compelled to submit to this scheme, it is hard that they should have to witness the adoption of a policy that may lead to still further severe reductions; and it certainly requires something more to be said than I have heard on this question to justify us in at once entering upon additional expenditure of, as far as I understand, £25,000 a year. I am not certain of the amount; we have not been told what the amount will be; but I think—from what I have gathered here and from the other branch of the Legislature—that it would not be much less. But, as I have said, it is not merely a question of money that is before us; we are taking an entirely new departure in a most important question of policy. We are going into partnership with the British Islands in the matter of war and peace. The reasons, so far as we have heard them—“the sentimental reasons,” I think, were the words used—were that by doing so we should be contributing our just share to the responsibilities which devolved upon us. But we should be just before we are generous, and we should know whether we are prepared with the money before we decide to do this. I should like to have this question considered: If war is brought upon us, and is brought about by a quarrel with any great European Power, with which these colonies have nothing to do, I think that is a question in which the colonies are not in the remotest degree concerned. Our population might endeavour to improve the country and found a new State, without being at all concerned in quarrels about the possession of Constantinople or the fortifications of some part of the Mediterranean. They do not concern us; and yet we may be told—as we undoubtedly shall be told, both inside and outside of Parliament—that it is our duty to support the Imperial Government in this matter. I say we have only to fall back upon what was said something more than a hundred years ago as to the duty of the American colonists of that time in regard to paying taxes for the support of wars engaged in by the United Kingdom—that taxation without representation is tyranny. We are told that our reputation would suffer if we did not agree to these proposals, and that if we did not join with the other colonies we should be treated worse than those who did.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—No.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPHARD.—No doubt that is what will weigh, and has weighed, so far, with members of the Legislature in inducing them to agree to this Bill. I do not think there is anything of the kind that need be considered here. I think we should deal openly and fairly with this measure, not caring what persons in Australia or on the other side of the world may think of our conduct. I am sorry to say that we are proposing to pass this Bill without fully discussing it, as we should have done if we had had a full Council. I know it is not right to refer to proceedings in another branch of the Legislature, and I will carefully avoid doing so except in such a way that you, Sir, will hold me quite in order. We know that the number of members of the other branch of the Legislature in actual attendance is enormously reduced—indeed, that there were not more than one-third of the members of that House present during the discussion on this Bill; and I do not think it is right that we should enter upon this important policy at this time, with so small an attendance of members. A large number of those who are now present will by to-morrow have disappeared from Wellington. Members are all scattering fast. Why? On account of this season of peace and goodwill towards men. And here we are needlessly involving ourselves in the wars of States on the other side of the world. I must deprecate any remarks which I have made being taken as in themselves necessarily hostile to some arrangement of this kind; but what I do complain of is that we have this Bill brought in in the last hours of the session, and we have not that numerical force in the Council to discuss it that we ought to have. I beg to move, That the debate be adjourned.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I am very much surprised, very much disappointed, and, I may say, disgusted at the speech which has just been made.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPHARD.—Sir, I ask whether it is a parliamentary expression for an honourable gentleman to say that he is “very much disgusted” with the speech of another member.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I think the honourable gentleman should withdraw so strong an expression.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I am very much surprised, and will not repeat the other word if the honourable gentleman feels it. I must say that I was disgusted that there should be any opposition to a measure of this description. The honourable gentleman says we should not mix ourselves up in the politics of Europe. I do not wish to mix ourselves up in the politics of Europe. We are doing this simply for the purpose of defending ourselves, and, as was stated by an honourable gentleman opposite, we are doing it as an insurance against the destruction of our property. We are not called upon to enter into the politics of Europe; we are not called upon to invade other people's country, or to make any attack on anybody; but we are simply called upon to subscribe some funds for the purpose of defending ourselves, and especially our commerce, on the high seas. Can anything be more reasonable than that? It appears to me to be an absolute duty that we should undertake it; and I think it would be most unreasonable for the people of this part of the world to call upon the Imperial Government to compel the unfortunate poor people of England to provide for the defence of our property. I say that it is enough to disgust anybody when he hears a doctrine of that character brought forward. The honourable gentleman says, using a cant phrase which we have heard so often, that taxation without representation is tyranny. I do not know what application that has to this question. Are we called upon to pay taxes? The honourable gentleman referred to the American colonies. That was a totally different thing. We are not taxed by England. We are simply told that if we do certain things—that is, if we will find a certain amount of money—we shall then have additional protection beyond what we have at the present time. That the Imperial Government should be called upon to do more than they are doing at the present time—that is, to keep five or six war-ships in these waters—is, I think, unreasonable. I say, under the circumstances, looking at the agreement which has been made, it is of the most fair and reasonable character; and I say again that I am very much disappointed that we should find an honourable member stand up and make the complaint that we are going into something which we ought not to touch under the circumstances. I was in hopes that this Council would be unanimous on this matter. I think it would have been very much to our credit if we had been so; and I only hope that the honourable gentleman who has just spoken will be the only black sheep in the flock.

The Hon. Mr. SHEPHARD.—I ask whether that is parliamentary language.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—I think the honourable gentleman should withdraw the expression.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I withdraw it entirely and freely, and without any reservation at all. Of course I am at liberty to maintain my own opinions. I have an opinion on the remarks of the honourable gentleman, but I will not express that opinion. I do not think I need trouble the Council at any greater length with the honourable gentleman's speech, a great deal of which was irrelevant, a great deal of it unfounded on fact, and it was exceedingly weak in argument. I only hope that the honourable gentleman, when he has a little more experience in these matters, will find that he has taken a very erroneous view. When the honourable gentleman comes fairly and honestly to consider the whole thing I have great hope that it will work a reformation in him, and that he then will be able to agree with the rest of us that we are taking a very wise course and an honest one.

Amendment negatived.

Bill read a second and a third time.

On the motion, That the Bill do pass,

The Hon. Mr. SHEPARD said,—I think it is due to the Council and to myself to say that the Attorney-General in his remarks entirely misrepresented what I said. I did not enter into the merits of the scheme; I merely said that it appeared to me to be inopportune: and I think the same still—that this is not a fitting time for us to deal with such a proposal as has been made. I guarded myself against discussing the contribution in itself. I conceived it not only my right but my duty, as a member of this Council, holding such an opinion, to express it; and I conceive that it is a wrong and an injustice that any member of the Council should be denounced in the manner that I have been for daring to have an opinion. I have said no disrespectful word about the Government of the country, and I certainly never dreamed of saying any disrespectful word against the Sovereign of this Empire. In all that I have said I merely exercised that right of free speech which belongs to every member of every Legislature in the world, and I shall exercise that right on all occasions when it appears to me right to do so; but I shall carefully abstain on all occasions—as I have done in the past, during the whole time I have been in the other branch of the Legislature and in this—from using an offensive expression about those who may chance for the time to differ in opinion from me.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND.—The logical outcome of the speech of the Hon. Mr. Shepard, if it were to be acted upon, would be that we should at once seek release from the bonds which now bind us to the Empire. It is quite true that we have no particular call to involve ourselves in the troubles of the great European nations; but so long as we remain part of the British Empire it is perfectly clear that we shall have no choice in that matter, and if we do not ask for release we are bound to take our lot with the rest. That this is distinctly recognised at Home will be seen from a story which, I believe, is true. Some complaint was made by the representative of one of the Australian Colonies that the whole of New Guinea had not been taken by the Imperial Government, and that the Germans had occupied part of the island. In case of war, it was said, it would lead to great inconvenience; but the Secretary for the Colonies, in reply, said, "Oh, you need not trouble yourselves about that: in the event of war, the first thing we should do would be to take possession of the German part of New Guinea." Whatever may come about in that direction is much more likely to be healthy if it is brought about pro re nata by the obvious need of the day. I think, in the present state of European politics, the defence of the colonies is a thing which is required at the present hour, and for that reason the combination is a natural proposal.

PRAYERS.

RED HILL GOLD-MINING COMPANY.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES moved the adjournment of the House to bring before the Government a question which had been placed on the Order Paper referring to the floating of a certain Nelson mining company. He would like this question to be answered, so as to have ventilation given to the matter. From the nature of the question it would naturally be assumed that something very serious was hidden behind, and it would lead members of the House and the public outside who saw the Order Paper to believe that this Nelson mining company had some swindle at the back of it. Knowing something of this matter, he wished to explain the position. What were really the facts of the case? A certain number of gentlemen in the colony, some living in Auckland, some in Nelson, and others elsewhere, took up a lease of land some time ago for mining purposes and prospected it, expending £3,000 or £4,000 in so doing. It was then proposed to float a company in London with a capital of £150,000. The syndicate sent out an expert to report, Mr. Price Williams, a gentleman of high standing on the London Stock Exchange and amongst syndicates. He was coming out, in connection with other business, to Western Australia and New Zealand, to report upon the coal and iron deposits in Collingwood, and unofficially he was requested to report upon the Red Hill property; and he did report favourably upon it. The syndicate at Home cabled out to a firm of solicitors to act on their behalf, to receive a transfer of the property from the vendors. They, knowing nothing at all about the matter, cabled Home to this effect: "Red Hill. Believe gold-mine practically worthless. Government Inspector, common opinion, agree. Strongly advise further inquiry; otherwise cannot act." Now, in doing that they acted in a most unbusiness-like manner. They were asked by the London solicitors to act on behalf of the syndicate in getting a transfer of the property, and, without knowing anything at all about it, they merely wired to Sir Robert Stout, the Premier, to get an expert to report on the mine. The expert was sent—Mr. Warren, the person acting as Under-Secretary. This expert, however, could not get into the mine. The drive was closed, and he had no order from the directors at Nelson to inspect the mine. He came back to Wellington, and made a report to the effect that he believed gold did not exist in the ground. The firm of solicitors sent a report Home to that effect. The result was that a panic was caused on the London market until Mr. Price Williams arrived at Home, and, concerning this matter, said at a general meeting of shareholders,—

"I made a most careful examination. I went into the tunnels and satisfied myself by careful notes, which shall be produced if necessary. I may say I certainly examined it most carefully.

"Mr. BALL: There is one point I should like to be satisfied about—viz., Does Mr. Price Williams consider the amount we paid a fair amount?

"Mr. PRICE WILLIAMS: I certainly should be very glad to pay that amount for the property."

He hoped the House would excuse him for taking up so much time, but this was really a matter of importance to the colony, as a thing of this sort going abroad would have the effect of doing very great damage to the mining industry of the colony. This company had been floated, and successfully floated, and the shareholders in New Zealand, the vendors of the mine, had never got a shilling, but, to show their bona fides in the matter, had taken scrip instead of money. The question had been put on the Order Paper by the honourable member for Gladstone, who really knew no more about the Red Hill Mine than the man in the moon; but he had been inspired by certain gentlemen who came from Nelson to put this question on the Order Paper, with the idea that it could not be answered satisfactorily, and to injure the enterprise in the eyes of the people in England. His (Mr. Reeves's) idea, too, was that this firm of solicitors wanted to screen themselves from having an action brought against them; for he understood that it was very likely that an action would be brought against the firm for a very heavy amount before long, for sending Home a cablegram stating that the mine was worthless. From what he had seen of it he could say that it was one of the best mines in the colony. The company had a large area of land, and it contained all sorts of minerals besides gold—it contained silver, copper, and lead—in fact, Collingwood was the true head-centre of the whole of the mineral resources of the colony. That this was the case had been said by Sir James Hector and by every geologist who had been in that part of the country. The company were getting some of the best mining-machinery that had ever been manufactured, and were expending £3,000 to £4,000 in bringing in a water-race for motive-power. He hoped that the next time the House met he would be in the proud position of saying that the company was one of the great factors in the prosperity of the colony. He was sorry the honourable gentleman was not here to ask the question; but he thought it his duty, in the interests of the mining community, to bring the matter before the House. The question on the Order Paper was as follows:—

"(1.) If he [the Minister of Mines] has any official knowledge concerning the floating of a certain Nelson mining company, to wit, the Red Hill Gold-mining Company, on the London market, and of the terms of the prospectus issued by the company? (2.) If he has taken any action in the matter, or is aware that his predecessor, the late Minister of Mines, took action in the matter? (3.) If it is true that representations on the subject were made to the late Government, and that some member of that Government cabled to England about the Red Hill Gold-mining Company; and, if so, will the Minister of Mines inform the House what was the purport of that cablegram? (4.) Whether he is prepared to bring in a Bill to amend the Mining Act by making it necessary to the legal operation of any New Zealand gold-mining company working with foreign capital that the prospectus of that company, published in Great Britain or elsewhere, should have obtained before such publication the approval of an officer to be appointed by the New Zealand Government?"

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON thought the honourable gentleman had been trying to take advantage of his position as a member of the House to advertise a mining company. There was nothing the Government wished to withhold. He thought it as well that the question should be answered now. The question divided itself into four, and the answers were: (1.) There was official knowledge of the floating of the company on the London market, as a copy of the prospectus was sent to the Hon. the Minister for Public Works by Messrs. Fell and Atkinson, in a letter dated the 3rd February, asking for information respecting the mine. (2.) He had taken no action in the matter; but there was a record of a telegram in reply to the letter from Messrs. Fell and Atkinson by the late Minister for Public Works on the 4th February, 1887. (3.) It was true that representations were made to the late Government as stated above. There is no record in the Mines Department of a message by cable having been sent to England. (4.) It was not the intention of Government to legislate on the question of appointing an officer to approve prospectuses for mining companies before being published. It would be a dangerous precedent, and to a certain extent would compromise the Government if the company afterwards proved a failure.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES hoped the Minister would not for a moment imagine that any blame was intended to be attached to him in the matter; but, in connection with the question, he (Mr. Reeves) wished to explain the real position of the company.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor, transmitting an amendment in subsection (1) of section 9, striking out the words "one thousand five hundred pounds," and inserting "two thousand five hundred pounds" in lieu thereof.

On the motion, That the message be agreed to,

Mr. W. D. STEWART said,—I do not know whether it is intended to vote this salary, but I venture to say that it is too large. It is a salary in excess of that paid to the highest officer in this colony, I suppose—the Chief Justice himself. I am quite satisfied that you can get the services of a good man for a less amount. I really think that a mistake has been committed in proposing such a large salary. I entirely disapprove of the proposal, and am satisfied you could get as good a man as you want for £1,500.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—I am satisfied the Government have no intention of paying such a large salary if they can by any means procure a suitable man at a lesser salary.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—There are plenty of good men in the colony who would be willing to take £1,500 a year, and it is quite a sufficient salary to pay. As the honourable member for Dunedin West has said, you will have the door opened to paying a higher salary to the Chief Railway Commissioner than for your Chief Justice. It seems an absurdity and an anomaly altogether that an officer in this position should receive three times the amount which his chief, the Minister, should himself get. You can get plenty of good men in New Zealand to undertake the duties for the sum originally mentioned.

Dr. FITCHETT.—It seems to me that the sum suggested by the Governor is altogether out of proportion to the work to be done or the capacity of the colony to pay. I do not think we can get much advantage by importing a man. He would have to unlearn a good deal before he could begin to learn the peculiar conditions under which our railways are run. It would be better to secure a man within the colony who has local knowledge. I do not think I should be doing my duty to my constituents if I consented to this large amount being agreed to by the House. I shall therefore move, That the amount be reduced to £1,750. That is an increase of £250 on the amount originally proposed, and is certainly fully adequate to the duties to be performed.

Mr. O'CONOR.—I hope the honourable member will withdraw that proposition. There is no comparison at all between the services rendered by the Chief Justice, or even those rendered by the Governor himself, and the services required of the Chief Commissioner of the Railway Board. We must remember the enormous amount of property we are placing in the hands of this Commissioner, and £1,000 should be no consideration in the matter of securing a really good man for the position. It may be possible to import a man of European reputation, to the great benefit of the colony. I think this is one of those matters in which private members should not interfere. It is far better to leave it to those who are responsible to the House. If they give too high a salary it will be their fault, but if they are not in a position to give enough it will be our fault.

Mr. PEACOCK.—I think, if the new system of managing our railways is to be tried at all, we should see that the circumstances are most suitable for making it a success, and I do not think the salary proposed is too large considering the salaries given to gentlemen occupying the position of managers of railways in the Old Country. It is intended, I presume, to get one with special knowledge of this subject to take charge of the railways, and I think the hands of the Government should not be hampered, especially as men in that position receive, sometimes, double the amount proposed to be inserted in this Bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The considerations that arose in my mind are these: that we have to go to the market to find what we want, and, if we take the amounts paid to men undertaking similar work done in other parts of the world, we must at once recognise that the sum originally provided in this Bill is altogether inadequate. I believe it would be impossible to buy the services we want at anything less than the sum now proposed. It was with very great regret I saw the small sum inserted in the Bill brought down by the Government. I thought that was one of the great blots of the Bill, and I shall most heartily support the larger sum now proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER.—As this is a proposal to increase the salary, it ought to be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—I beg to move, That the message be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Mr. MOSS.—We hear a great deal about getting first-class men from England; but is it to be supposed that first-class men will surrender highly-paid positions and come here for even £2,500 a year? What we shall have to do is to take some promising junior from some railway in England. A junior will be only too glad to take £1,500 a year; and let us increase it when we find he has earned it. Altogether it seems to me lowering to the colony to send away at all. I believe we shall find in the colony gentlemen who are in every respect able to manage our railways. We had gentlemen in Canterbury who managed the railways well there; they are now in other colonies. And

I think we should have no difficulty in finding suitable men who would think it an extremely good thing to get £1,500. We have had quite enough of sending to England. We should only get a second-class man, to be passed off upon our poor colonists in the higher character.

Mr. BROWN.—I can bear my testimony to the zeal and efficiency of some of our railway officials. I have had an opportunity recently of making a comparison as to how our railways are worked with the way railways are worked in Great Britain and elsewhere. I am certain we have got as good men in our employ as we can get elsewhere, who will be satisfied with the original amount. I shall not mention names, but if the management of the railways were placed under the control of some of those now in our employment I believe the railways would give better results to the colony. The Ministers consider themselves not worth more than £800 and £1,000 a year, and they now propose to pay three times that amount to one of their officials. We call it retrenchment. We began at the wrong end, and seem to be sorry for what we have done. Now we go to the other extreme, and offer a great salary when we can find gentlemen in the colony to take the position for half the sum proposed by the Government.

Mr. KELLY.—I shall support the lower sum. I think there are many promising rising young men in the railway service here who, if they only got a chance of coming forward, would be found capable of undertaking what is required. I trust the Government, in considering the matter, will fully consider their own officials. I do not think we should import a man for the position if we can find a capable man in the colony. This is a sort of distinction I do not like to see, because our Ministers and Judges and other high officials receive salaries altogether inadequate in comparison with the sum now proposed for the Chief Commissioner it is intended to import. I trust the Government will agree to the smaller sum, for I think £1,500 a year is a good salary for any man in that position.

Mr. CADMAN.—Let us look at the matter from a business point of view. Supposing honourable gentlemen were a company and were working the railways for themselves, what would they do? Their first object would be to get the best possible man as manager; and, looking at the past, and looking at the position of the railways of the colony, I, for one, do not think it is possible to pick up a good expert in the colony outside the present officials. I am of opinion that, even if a man has been working the railways of the colony for some time, he has still much to learn. If we are to take a man in the colony, we must certainly take some Government employé; and if we do raise the salary, as is proposed, it will mean that we shall be simply giving an increased salary to some one now in the Government employ. I believe we are paying the present General Manager £1,000 a year, and if he is appointed one of the Commissioners it will give him several hundreds more. I do not object to him as much as some do, because I think that if he had been left untrammelled in the management of the railways he might have proved to be a very good man, and if we are to retain his services under the new system I think it quite possible he may be worth more to the colony. I do not think we can get three good Commissioners outside the Government employ in the colony; and, if we are to get good men, let us not restrict the choice of the Government altogether to people in the colony; but, assuming that we do try to get a man outside the colony, it appears to me that the amount of remuneration already fixed—namely, £1,500 a year for five or six years—ought to be a sufficient inducement to many in the Old Country to accept a position on this Board.

Mr. PARATA.—I wish to know why it is proposed to give this official so much as £2,500 per annum, while our Premier, who has much greater responsibility, receives a far smaller sum. Seeing that our policy is retrenchment, and that reductions are being made in the honorarium and in the salaries of Civil servants all round, I cannot understand why this large salary should be paid. I think there are gentlemen in the colony quite capable of carrying out the work for a much less sum. If we get an official from England, what guarantee have we that he will be capable of performing the duties? In my opinion the salary should be reduced, seeing that the colony has resolved on a policy of retrenchment; and I think those railways which do not pay should be closed up altogether. If we pay such extravagant salaries as this, then the colony will never regain prosperity, because taxation has to be laid on Europeans and Maoris to provide the money. The Premier has stated that the Government is pledged to retrenchment all round: but this proposal is quite contradicting that statement. What guarantee have we that this system of management will be a success? It is quite an experiment, and no one can say what the result will be. I did not think we should borrow money to spend in such a manner as this, and I regret that this extravagant proposal has been brought forward. I object all the more because nothing has been done for the benefit of the Natives this session, and therefore I shall support the reduction.

Mr. TAIPUA.—I wish to say that I fully agree with what has been stated by the honourable member who has just sat down. He has said all I should have expressed myself on the subject, and therefore it is unnecessary for me to repeat it.

Colonel FRASER.—I regret exceedingly that the Premier has thought it necessary to bring down this proposal. It would be much better if the Bill were left as it is. It is ridiculous to suppose we can import a first-class man from England even if you make the salary £2,500. No first-class man will leave England for that salary, and if you are willing to take a second-class man it is very likely you will get a sixth- or seventh-class one. Our experiments in the way of importing talent have not been successful hitherto. I am perfectly certain we have talent sufficient in the colony to manage our railways if that management is left free from political control. The next thing will be a message from the Governor saying it is necessary for the salvation of the colony to import Premiers and Treasurers, because we have not men among ourselves capable of governing the country. I am astonished at the Government bringing down this proposal, and especially at the last hour of the session. I am as certain as that I stand here that it is a mistake to alter the Bill. We have talent enough in the country if we only go the right way to make use of it, and we should not go looking for big fish in other countries when we are likely only to catch sprats.

Mr. IZARD.—Sir, I shall support the vote for the higher sum, as proposed by Ministers. It is of the greatest importance that a thoroughly efficient man should be appointed to the head of our railways. To get a good man we must pay a good salary, and the amount paid is of no great importance if the man appointed has a thorough grasp of his work. He would soon save his salary and more. It is no doubt an anomaly that a larger salary should be paid to a railway officer than is paid to a Premier or Chief Justice: this must be faced, and we need not disturb ourselves about it. Again, Sir, I would suggest that the Government may very appropriately appoint Mr. Maxwell to one of the inferior Commissionerships. He is a thoroughly energetic, hard-working officer, and his merits have been testified to by the chiefs of his department on both sides of the House. No doubt he is, to some extent, an unpopular man. That is the result of the system. He has been hampered by hard, fixed official rules, and has not been allowed to exercise his independent discretion. I hope the Government will take these matters into consideration when making the appointment.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—We have heard some special pleading from the honourable member for Wellington South and Suburbs on behalf of his friends. Now, we have heard a lot of rubbish about getting a first-class man and paying a high salary, and one honourable gentleman has said that no first-class man could be got from England even for £3,000 a year. Does any one suppose the manager of, say, the London and North-Western Railway or the Great Western Railway would come out here for £3,000 a year? Certainly not. Look at the business they have to do. I suppose there is more traffic over either of those lines in a fortnight than there is over all ours in two years. It must be remembered that all our railways are single lines—we have no double or treble lines—and therefore the management of our railways is not nearly so difficult as of those of England. I am quite sure we have sufficient administrative ability in the colony if we only employ it in the right way. I think it is discreditable to the colony to assume that in a House of ninety-five members we cannot get a Minister for Public Works capable of carrying on the Railway Department properly. It is a most ridiculous thing; and I say again that if the local managers of our railways were allowed a certain amount of discretion we could do without any Boards at all; but instead of having that discretion they are tied up with red tape and sealing-wax, and cannot do what they are capable of doing. I do not take it upon myself to be a prophet, for a prophet seldom has honour in his own country, but I say that before we have had the Board in operation for two years there will be a cry to abolish it. Under any circumstances I think we can find within the colony men of sufficient business capacity to carry out the duties of Railways Commissioner at a salary of £1,500 a year. Even the honourable member for Wellington South and Suburbs agrees that we have good men in the colony. I may say that I think very extraordinary powers are given to the Chief Commissioner. He is to be all-powerful, and he might as well have no colleagues for all the power that they will have. I shall support the proposal to reduce the sum now proposed to be given, and should be glad to see it negatived altogether.

Sir G. GREY.—What I would represent to the House is this: that we have no extraordinary emergency to meet here—no great accidents have taken place, no great defect has been found in our railway management except so far as the fixing of the rates is concerned. That is the one thing in connection with which there has been a grievance. I believe that as able men are to be obtained here as you could procure from Great Britain, and therefore I hope we shall not import gentlemen to fill these positions. I hope that the House will pursue a course which I am satisfied will bring out the latent talent in the country and hold out a legitimate object of ambition to the young men of this colony, and prove that New Zealand has men within her borders quite as capable of performing these duties as any person who might be imported from Great Britain. A short time ago every Judge on the Supreme Court Bench was imported from Home or elsewhere, and yet now we have chosen from among ourselves, as Judges, men quite as able as any who were imported. We may hope for the same in connection with this Railway Board. And I do hope the House will give the young men of New Zealand a chance to rise to the higher positions in the service.

Mr. ROSS.—I hope that the amount will be left as it is in the Bill—at £1,500 a year,—because I believe that we can obtain in the colony not only sufficient subordinates to carry on the working of the department successfully, but also suitable men to take the higher positions; and I think the sum mentioned is quite large enough. There is one argument which I think might be urged against increasing the salary to be paid. We are making reductions in all the departments of the Service, and especially, I hope, in the salaries of some of the higher officers, who are, I think, in many instances, overpaid. It will be difficult to make those reductions in the salaries of heads of departments if we are at the same time increasing the amount to be paid to the Chief Railway Commissioner to so large an extent as is suggested by the Government. I hope the amount, therefore, will be allowed to stand as it is.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—I trust the Government will adhere to the former salary of £1,500: I think it is ample for any person. And I hope that we shall get these Commissioners from the colony. There is too much of a habit of importing expensive men from Home. If it is an Inspector of Prisons who is wanted, or an Inspector of Asylums, or an officer of Defence, we must send Home and import these men at a tremendous cost. There is no chance given to men of ability in the colony. I do not, however, agree with the honourable member for Wellington South and Suburbs that Mr. Maxwell should be retained. On the contrary, I think that all the trouble that has occurred has been largely due to Mr. Maxwell. But I believe that Mr. Hannay would be a very suitable man to be made one of the Commissioners. I think, however, that we should not increase the salary for the Chief Commissioner as is here proposed. We discussed the whole thing when the Bill was before us, and decided that £1,500 was a proper sum to pay. I do not see that we should, now that two-thirds of the members of the House are absent, alter the sum fixed by the whole House. I think it is an unfair and improper proceeding for the honourable gentleman to bring this proposal down; and on this ground, as well as upon others, I shall vote against the proposition of the Government. I hope there is no truth in the rumour that Mr. Maxwell is to be appointed as Chief Commissioner. If so we might as well not have passed the Bill, and certainly I, for one, should be very sorry that I voted for it. The principal object of the Bill was to remove the railways from his influence and beyond political control.

Major ATKINSON.—I hope the House will consent to this proposal. It will be in the recollection of honourable members that I myself thought that £1,500 would be found to be sufficient, and, indeed, I still hope so; but there were a large number of honourable members whose opinions were well worth considering who expressed the view that the hands of the Government should not be tied in this matter. I then stated that if the Government found themselves unable to get a man for the sum fixed by the Act they would take upon themselves the responsibility of giving a little more; but on consideration we have thought it better to bring the matter before the House at once. I will point out that the language used is "not exceeding"—we do not bind ourselves to give a higher sum. I think the appointment is one of great importance: in fact, the whole success of the scheme depends on the right man being appointed. I hope the House, therefore, will see its way to leave the Government free to act for the best in this matter. I can assure the House that the Government will act very carefully.

Dr. NEWMAN.—I think the question of salary in a matter of this sort is utterly beneath contempt to talk about. In all big companies and financial institutions they never think of a trifle in the way of a salary, because a good man may at any time find out little methods of making savings in connection with which a thousand or two a year would be not worth considering. The real question, I think, is, whether the Government will take sufficient care in the choice of a suitable man. That is the real question; and I do hope that they will give most complete attention to this matter, and not take any man who may happen to endeavour to force himself into the position. I have not much sympathy with the craze for importing expensive people, for I do not think it has been a success so far; but in this matter there will be a great gain in getting a man who has knowledge and experience, and in that connection a question of salary is very trifling. We saw an instance of that the other day, when, by the substitution of one kind of paint for another, a saving was made to the extent of something like £5,000 a year on the working of the lines. And that, I believe, was done by Mr. Maxwell, of whose capabilities the honourable member for the Hutt has so low an opinion. My own belief is that Mr. Maxwell is a very capable man, and that his unpopularity and, perhaps, want of success are due not to any want of capability on his part, but to the system under which both the Minister and the Public Works Department have been subject to political influence. Honourable members have gone to them—I have done it myself—and have said, "Oh! you must reduce the freight on wool,"—on grain, on cattle, et cetera. There has been enormous pressure by honourable members to get special concessions for their own constituents, and many have done it not because they thought it right, but because they saw that other people were getting these concessions, and they did not see why they should not get them also. If we get rid of this pressure, which has led to districts getting benefits at the expense of the colony generally, we may hope our railways will be more successful.

Mr. BRUCE.—I think a great responsibility will rest upon this House if it carries the reduction moved by the honourable member for Dunedin Central, because I believe that the whole success of the scheme will depend upon the introduction of a really skilled specialist. I do not deny that we have sufficient talent in the colony to fill the minor positions, but it is scarcely likely that we shall find here those special qualities which we want in the Chief Commissioner. I think we should look at this as a matter above party, and that we ought to leave it in the hands of the Ministry.

Mr. BLAKE.—I think that the Government should be left entirely free to choose the best man they can get; but at the same time I must admit that, as a full House approved the sum which is now in the Bill, it is scarcely fair to those who have left that an alteration of this kind should be made. However, my opinion is so strong that we do require a very able man at the head of our railways that I am disposed to say that the Government should be able to please themselves as to the man they will choose.

Sir G. GREY.—I should like now to say that the speech made by the honourable member for Thorndon, representing to us the pressure he himself at particular times has brought to bear upon the Government, and the great pressure that was brought from all parts of the House to bear on the Minister for Public Works, satisfies me that there is just as much reason for making the Public Works Department a non-political body as there is for making the Railway Department a non-political body. In fact, I think there is a much greater necessity for the one than for the other. Therefore, if this increase is carried, and as weighty duties are to be laid upon these Commissioners—I do not mean weighty in number, but in importance—I shall strive next session to have the Public Works Department made distinctly a non-political body. I believe that that will result in great advantages to the colony; and arrangements might be made by which, in point of fact, there would be Public Works Councils in various parts of the colony, assisted by the local bodies, so that really some control would be given to the local bodies over public works in their districts. And we shall in that way give a system of local self-government which we have not at this moment. I want the honourable member who feels that, by his sitting upon the Government, he has brought such a weighty pressure to bear upon them, crushing them down by force, and that similar pressure is brought to bear by other honourable members to do the same thing, to see that it really would be desirable in the interests of the country that the Public Works Department should also be a non-political body, and that the change should be accomplished in the manner I have pointed out.

The House went into Committee of the Whole to consider the message.

IN COMMITTEE.

On the question, That the Committee agrees to the recommendation in His Excellency's message, Sir J. VOGEL asked whether it was proposed to put this Bill into force at once.

Major ATKINSON said it could not come into force until the Government had made the necessary arrangements, which they proposed to set about at once. They would make inquiries in England, in America, and in the colonies for a good man as Chief Commissioner.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Then the Colony of New Zealand will be excluded?

Major ATKINSON.—Not by any means.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The salary proposed is far beyond the scale of salaries paid in New Zealand.

Major ATKINSON.—We do not fix the salary: the resolution says "not exceeding."

Sir J. VOGEL would suggest that in the arrangement with the Commissioners a clause should be inserted providing that if the House should feel inclined to resume the charge of the railways the Commissioners should continue to receive the same salaries, but should act in the capacity of Under-Secretaries under the Minister. He had been unable to carry an amendment in the Bill to that effect, but he would ask the Premier to take it into consideration.

Major ATKINSON said that in making the arrangement the Government would take that matter into consideration.

Sir G. GREY moved, That between the words "the Committee" and "agrees" the words "does not" be inserted. He was put at a great disadvantage in moving this amendment, because honourable members who would support him were away under the impression that there would be the usual adjournment for luncheon. He hoped the adjournment would be taken.

Major ATKINSON trusted the Committee would not adjourn. The principle of the message had been fully discussed, and honourable members were anxious to bring the business to a conclusion.

Sir G. GREY said the Premier had before promised he would not hurry the business, and he (Sir G. Grey) must protest against this attempt to force the matter through. Only on the previous evening the honourable gentleman had brought down the Midland Railway Bill when no one was expecting it, and had carried a series of resolutions, which were not even put under the proper date in the Order Paper, as they appeared under the date of Wednesday, although the Order Paper on which they appeared was not printed till Thursday. There was a great deal involved in the question before them, and the adjournment ought to be granted. If the Premier would not accede to the request he (Sir G. Grey) would have to speak until honourable members who were absent had returned.

Mr. BROWN moved, That progress be reported.

The Committee divided.

Sir G. GREY thought it best to keep the salary at the present amount, as passed by both branches of the Legislature. Those honourable members who had gone away believed that no change would be made. It was due to the country, and to those honourable members who had gone away, to see that no change took place. He believed that if all the members were present this proposal to increase the amount to £2,500 would be refused.

Sir J. VOGEL said he would oppose any increase beyond £2,000; but he was of opinion that the services of a suitable man could be obtained in the colony for less. Our system of railways was very dissimilar to that of Victoria, where, as in Great Britain, the lines were more costly, and converged on one great metropolis. In New Zealand the railways had to be worked from several centres; and the first thing a stranger would have to do would be to learn the local history of the country to enable him to regulate the services throughout the colony. He believed that a fuller House would not be willing to go to a higher amount than the sum he proposed to the Government as a compromise, and in his opinion it should either be £2,000 or remain as it was.

Mr. GUINNESS considered the time was inopportune to reopen this question, when more than half the members of the House were away. The Government had the power in their own hands to make this appointment without increasing the amount now. They could make inquiries in England and America and the other colonies, and, if they found they could not get a suitable man for less than £2,500, they could tell the House next session that they could get a man for that amount, and he had no doubt the House would vote the money.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES moved, That the words "two thousand five hundred pounds" be struck out, and "one thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds" be inserted.

Sir G. GREY hoped the House would accept that reduction. He thought it was entirely wrong, after a majority of the House had decided on a certain sum, to suddenly increase that sum, in the circumstances that now existed. This had been a session of reduction of expenditure, and he thought it would appear incredible to honourable gentlemen who had gone away to find that as soon as they were gone, after coming to a decision, that decision was reversed. Now that the majority of honourable members had gone, this increase of expenditure certainly ought not to be forced on the country. He hoped the House would insist on this reduction at least.

Mr. ROSS said, having, by his vote against the increase of the salary proposed to be paid to the Chief Commissioner of Railways from £1,500 to £2,500 per annum, recorded his opinion that any deviation from the amount fixed by the House when a large number of members were present ought not to be made, he would not offer any further opposition to the proposal, but would leave the matter to be dealt with in the discretion of the Government.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES said his desire in moving this was to show the inconsistency of the Government and of the honourable members who were supporting them in this proposal. A number of honourable gentlemen who, a short time ago, deliberately voted that the salary should not exceed £1,500, now, owing to outside pressure being brought to bear—and honourable members had seen inspired articles on the subject every morning for some days—were prepared to vote for £2,500. The Government were trying to make this important change by nothing else than a sidewind. It was most unfair to introduce such a proposal behind the backs of the majority of honourable members. He did not say it was done in an unprincipled manner, but it would be thought so outside, and the public would condemn the action of the House.

Mr. MOSS moved, That the amount be £1,525. He did not think the amount ought to be raised. He thought the decision should be put off till honourable members returned—those who had gone away at one o'clock. It should have been brought on only when all the members available could be present.

Major ATKINSON said the decision could have been come to before any honourable members left but for the obstruction.

Sir G. GREY said the Premier was not justified in saying there had been obstruction. Any obstruction there had been had been on the honourable gentleman's own part in requiring honourable members, most improperly, to vote this whole amount at once, though he knew a number of honourable members had left the House. The honourable gentleman had availed himself of that to do an improper thing; and very improper things had been done in a similar manner on the previous evening. If there was any obstruction the Premier himself was the cause of the obstruction. He moved, That progress be reported, and leave asked to sit again.

The Committee divided on the question, "That progress be reported."

Resolution reported to the House.

On the question, That the resolution be agreed to,

Colonel FRASER said,—I was astonished at the proceeding of the Government in this matter in the former part of the day: I am now perfectly amazed. Where is all the talk of retrenchment we heard blazoned about by them and their party in the previous part of this session? They commenced by taking off a few hundred pounds, bit by bit, from one end of the rope; and now at this moment, when the session is at an end, they add thousands of pounds to the other. The House, by a large majority, when a large number of honourable members were present, fixed this salary at £1,500; and now, when all those honourable gentlemen have gone to their homes, this is brought down as a matter of surprise, and, in a House of thirty-two, a motion is carried increasing the salary from £1,500 to £2,500! I think the proceeding is most unconstitutional. There is no endeavour to do what is right here now, and I therefore satisfy myself with entering my solemn protest against the proceeding.

Mr. MOSS.—I should like to say that I shall not vote any further upon the question. I do not wish to waste time, but I must express my regret that the House has been forced—that it should have been surprised—into an action of this kind.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—It was announced yesterday in the House.

Mr. MOSS.—A number of honourable members thought it was safe to use the hour between one and two o'clock, which is always the hour of adjournment, in order to prepare for their departure at seven o'clock to-morrow morning. I know that several honourable members left the House under that impression. I, for one, left it, and certainly should not have gone had I the least idea there was to be this variation in our invariable proceedings, and that a measure of this importance was to be forced on during the usual hour of adjournment. That was the reason why I was not here to vote against the proposal on the first division, and I wish to place that reason upon record. I returned to the House just a little too late for the first division, and other honourable gentlemen returned in the same position with me.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—If those honourable members had something to do in the House, what did they go away for? I knew I had something to do in the House—those three Native Bills. Although the Government promised that nothing should be done yesterday, I would not believe them. I stuck to the House till the last moment. I hope there will be no more divisions and waste of time, as our time is nearly up. I say it is childish to divide again and again. I think it is a shameful waste of time when the Parliament is nearly over.

Mr. LAWRY.—I should like, briefly, to say that I was as desirous as any member of this House to see economical administration by the Government; but I have heard honourable members outside the House declare over and over again that this Railway Board is to be a failure, and I say in this particular thing we should throw the whole of the responsibility upon the Government. Allow them to appoint Commissioners without let or hindrance, and then, in the event of a failure, we shall have some excuse for saying that the responsibility rests wholly with the Government.

Mr. CADMAN.—Now that it is decided by the House that the salaries shall be increased largely, there is one thing the Ministry ought to look to in these Commissioners. I think it is likely the time will come when pressure will be brought upon the House to repeal the Bill, and I would suggest to the Government that an arrangement should be made with the Commissioners so that the colony will not be heavily mulcted by having to pay these Commissioners large salaries for the four or five years for which they are appointed, in the event of the Bill being repealed. I think that, in the negotiations with the Commissioners, some provision should be made whereby, if the Bill is repealed, we should not have to pay them for four or five years after their services are dispensed with.

Motion agreed to.

AUSTRALASIAN NAVAL DEFENCE BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, it is a matter of very great regret on the part of the Government that this very important Bill has, through force of circumstances, been delayed to the last day of the session; but, although the Bill itself is delayed, no doubt honourable members have given the matter very careful consideration. At this period of the session, and with very few hours before us before we conclude our labours, I cannot go so fully into the matter as I should like to do, and as the importance of the subject would not only have justified, but perhaps demanded. Still, I think that I shall be able, in the short statement I shall make, to convince honourable members that the proposal of the Government, in asking the House to read this Bill a second time, is reasonable; and it is one which I hope the House will agree to with something like unanimity. This measure appears to me to be the first real step in uniting us in closer bonds with the Old Country. I do not propose to say as much upon this subject as I could have liked; but it seems to inevitably lead to what many of us most sincerely desire—a much closer bond of unity than at present binds us together. To my mind, it is impossible that the present relations between the colony and the Home Government can continue for a great number of years. They must inevitably either weaken or strengthen; we shall have to draw closer, or we shall have gradually to separate from the Old Country, and that, I believe, would be a matter of great regret, not only to the inhabitants of this colony but to the Mother-country herself; and, in my opinion, it would be a great misfortune to the world that the British Empire should unfortunately be dismembered by her colonies separating themselves from her. What I have felt for many years, and what I have expressed in this House before, is that the first real and practical step to draw us together, and really awaken the people at Home to the position of the colony, is to impress upon those people the importance of the connection; for, I take it, the great difficulty in promoting a closer union is not with the colonists themselves, but with the people of the Home-country. If we now, by consenting to this Bill, agree to contribute to the defence of the Empire a reasonable proportion of the expense, it will follow inevitably that after a certain time the people of England will wake up to the fact that we are a part of the Empire; and as soon as that fact has really been recognised, and we contribute a substantial proportion of the expense of the fleet in these seas, then the question will be asked, "Is it reasonable, is it right, that these people should contribute without having a direct voice in the question of peace or war of the Empire?" This seems to me to follow inevitably; and therefore for many years past I have been favourable to a fair contribution to the cost of the navy, looking forward to the time when this contribution will be recognised by the people and Parliament of England as necessitating the drawing of our connection closer than it is at the present time. Now, some people say, "Well, why should we contribute? England decides questions of peace or war. She is mixed up with European States, and probably her quarrel will be on European questions." Many answers might be given to this argument; but I do not propose to go into the whole question. The first question to ask is, Do we desire to remain connected with England? I think we may take this for granted, for I cannot go into the matter at great length at the present time, although I think I could successfully show that it is greatly to the advantage of the colonies themselves, of England, and of the world in general, that the colonies should remain united with England. However, I am going to take this for granted. If, then, we assume that we are part of the Empire, then I think we may very fairly ask ourselves, is it not right that we, citizens of the Empire, well-to-do citizens, as must be admitted on all hands, and better able to bear taxation than the large number of taxpayers of the Old Country—should contribute a reasonable proportion to our own defence in these seas? It may be said that it would be better for each colony to have its own fleet. That is a question which was discussed by the representatives in the Conference of 1883; but I think all thinking men will dismiss that as an impossibility—as a proposition that must inevitably turn out to be a failure. If each of the colonies were to get a ship or two of its own, we should soon be in a difficult position. There would be no authority; the ships would be unable to meet, they would be unable to combine; and we should get into this position: that our officers and men would not be up to the mark when a war suddenly broke out. There would be no promotion. That is a difficulty in all young services. That is got over by this Bill. The proposition is that there should be practically a part of the Imperial fleet here, which we should pay for. Now, I should like here, perhaps, to inform the House what the proposition is. It is proposed that there should be seven ships of a particular class paid for by these colonies. They are of a class estimated to be the best possible class for the work to be performed here. They are to be ships of about sixteen hundred tons displacement, and will steam about seventeen knots; and there are to be two torpedo boats, to steam nineteen knots. It is proposed to place three of the ships and one torpedo boat in commission during peace.

Now, the total estimated cost of this fleet, building, fitting out, et cetera, is estimated to be £700,000; and it is proposed, and was agreed to by the representatives at the Conference, subject to the approval of Parliament, that the Imperial Government should find the money to build the ships, and that the colonies should pay for ten years 5 per cent. on that amount. The colonies are also to pay for the cost of the establishment of the four ships which are to remain in commission during peace. The colonies are to pay the whole cost of the crews of these ships, and it is agreed that the cost shall not exceed £91,000; so that the total contribution of the colonies is to be £126,000. Then, in the event of a war the remaining ships are to be immediately sent out, and are to remain always ready. They are to be sent out at the cost of the Imperial Government. In the event of loss in war or by wreck the Imperial Government are to bear the entire cost of new ships; and, if the annual cost of the fleet should be less than £91,000 per annum, then the colonies are to have the benefit of it: so that we know the total amount we are liable to pay. It may be said that this is too much for the colonies to contribute; but I think, when honourable gentlemen bear the fact in mind that the Imperial Government at present maintains its fleet in these seas at a cost to the Old Country of £240,000 per annum, they will see that our contribution is not an unreasonable amount. We are to pay for the peace establishment £126,000. There are, in the event of war, to be three other ships commissioned at the cost of the Imperial Government, and the cost of the present fleet is £240,000. Looking at the position of the colonies, bearing in mind the great interest we have in the trade as well as the Home Government, I think it will be admitted that the proportion of payment by the colonial Governments is not unreasonable or unfair. In fact, to my mind, it is a very fair and liberal offer on the part of the Imperial authorities. Further, by the late Government, and upon the authority of the late Government through their representatives at the Conference, it was agreed that two ships should always remain in New Zealand waters. There is some little doubt whether this includes Fiji; but I do not think it is a matter of much importance, and this will go on the other side of the account. I think it was very right and reasonable to ask the Imperial Government to have two ships in these waters; but, still, I feel rather ashamed at making this matter one of pounds, shillings, and pence. We are therefore always to have two ships stationed in these waters. That will be a considerable direct gain as against the cost of maintenance of these vessels, and the annual expenditure upon them is a very considerable sum. The maintenance of the ships in these waters will amount annually to £126,000; and if we have two ships of that class on the station—and no doubt they will be here most of the time—honourable members will see that we get a very direct benefit paid back in supplying these ships with coal and food. I only put that as part of the case, because these are times when every pound of money is of importance to us; but I know there are honourable gentlemen who think our first duty is economy, and therefore I put it to those honourable gentlemen that there is another side of the matter, and that we shall annually receive a very large amount of this back directly by the employment of our people in supplying coal, food, and other things. Then, two naval cadet-ships are to be offered to New Zealand. It is very desirable that our young men should be allowed fair openings both in the army and navy, if they desire that sort of service. The reason why, at this late period of the session, the Government have brought this down, or, rather, I should say, one of the reasons why, although so late in the session, I am asking the House to agree to this Bill is this: that it would take two years to build these ships; that the Imperial Government have framed the estimates to be laid before Parliament, which is to meet in February; and that, therefore, if we delayed this until next session, the delay in the commencement of the building of the fleet would be twelve months from the present time, and, as it would take two years to build these ships, it is very desirable that no time should be lost. It is not taking the House in any way by surprise. This matter has been very carefully considered by the late Government, who agreed to it. All the papers have been before the House, and the country is well acquainted with the proposals of the Conference, so that we are not hurrying on this unduly, and, in asking the House to deal with it this session, are only asking the House to do what is prudent and reasonable, in order not to delay the building of these ships any longer than possible. The contribution we are to pay is upon the basis of the population of the colonies, and our contribution will be in accordance with our proportion to the whole population of the various colonies. I have had a return prepared according to the estimates of the Registrar-General, which shows the contributions of the various colonies under this agreement. [Extract read.] I may say the New Zealand Government originally, apparently, proposed that our minimum contribution should be £21,000; but they afterwards agreed to raise it a small amount, if the contribution was determined on the population basis. It seems to me that the population basis is the right one. It was proposed to consider tonnage, shipping, and trade; but that would be too complicated, and I think would have told upon us.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Is it European population?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, European population. The other Australian Colonies agreed that the basis should be population, and so we have proposed that in our Bill. There is one question my honourable friend the member for Christchurch North drew my attention to. Supposing some of the colonies which had signed the agreement did not see their way to ratify the agreement made by the delegates: the question then was, Are the remaining colomies to be liable for the amount in default? I think they should not be liable. I therefore propose to introduce a clause to the effect that our contribution is only to be upon the basis that all the colonies contribute; and, if the Imperial Government is prepared to carry out the understanding with four or five instead of all the colonies, the Imperial Government should make up the difference. Now, with regard to the question of our land-defences, that subject is intimately connected with this, and I am not going to throw any blame upon the late Government. I approved of what they did under the circumstances in which they were placed—that is, that they proceeded with the defence of the four principal ports; but it is undoubtedly a matter for our consideration whether it is advisable to continue to fortify and defend those four ports. I do not say it is so; but the Government are going to take that into careful consideration—that is to say, to make one port as secure as possible, so as to have a harbour of refuge for the ships to refit in, and coal; and I doubt whether we shall not find it—looking at the great cost of maintaining these four distinct ports—a more economical and wiser course to concentrate our attention upon one port in order to make it tolerably safe. If that is determined upon, after very careful consultation with the Imperial authorities, then we shall consider which of the ports it would be best to make safe, in the interests of the general defence of the colony. But it is quite clear that, if we are to maintain these ships and get advantage from them, if they are to be about here in time of war and be really serviceable to us, we must have some port in which they can take refuge after action, or come in to refit and to coal. That is absolutely necessary. I do not wish to evade this question of defence, and therefore I thought it my duty to point out to the House what was in the mind of the Government on the subject. I agree with those who think our main defence must be by ships. We cannot possibly defend ourselves from land, our coasts are too extended; and for external defence we shall therefore have to look to the Imperial authorities. But we do know that some time ago, at the period of the last Russian scare, the Russians had made arrangements not against New Zealand, but to make a raid on Australia, and in the circumstances it appeared very likely that it might be successful. Of course that is now impossible, since those places have been fortified; it would be absolutely impossible at the present time on their then plans. But I wish to impress on the House that we must have at least one of our ports thoroughly defended, so that in it the Imperial war-ships will be always secure of being able to coal, take refuge, and refit. Sir, I do not think I need say more now. The subject is an exceedingly tempting one, and if there were time I should like to enlarge on all these points; but as it is, I will simply say, in conclusion, that I do hope the House will see its way to assent to this Bill. It seems to me, as I said at the beginning, that the passing of this Bill would be the first real step to drawing the bonds of union between the Mother-country and the colonies tighter. We cannot see that at the present time; we only see the money going out; but we do see that we get a fair equivalent for our money, because I suppose there are very few who would say that it is not our duty to protect ourselves to a reasonable extent by providing for outside defence for our commerce in conjunction with the Imperial Government in something like a fair proportion to the shipping we own and they own. I think there are very few in New Zealand who would not agree to that. I think if we do this it will be strongly felt, after a short time, that we are contributing taxation without representation. To my mind, that is of great importance; and I think, when that is recognised, men's minds will turn to the necessity of considering how it is possible we can get representation, and then I think it will be a very small step to the finding of means by which we shall have a controlling voice in this great question affecting us. It is impossible, to my mind, to escape the consequence of that. We are not a sovereign country ourselves, and it is impossible for a colony like this to be made so insignificant as to be allowed to remain neutral. I do not believe in the possibility of that at all. The whole tendency of all the nations of the earth is to draw together to form large nations; and if the English people are to remain, as I hope and believe they will remain, a very great power in the world, if not the predominating power, I say that, while we have an opportunity of laying the first stone of the edifice, of taking the first step towards drawing the bonds between the different parts of the Empire tighter, we should seize that opportunity. If we are not prepared to accept it the opportunity will pass away, and it may not recur; and then there may come to be possible what, to my mind, would be a terrible disaster—that is, the severance of the colonies, and the sinking in the scale of nations of that great nation of which we are all so proud.

Sir J. VOGEL. — I support this Bill; but I think the grounds on which the Premier primarily supports it are very much to be regretted. I share with the honourable member a desire to see the dominions of Great Britain federated, but I am unable to see that this Bill is likely to promote that end. I fear not. This is not a sudden desire on my part; it is an object for which I have worked many years. It is seventeen years since I first took up the question and published a long letter in the Standard in London; and since then I have continually read, written, and reflected on the subject of promoting the federation of the Empire of Great Britain. But, although I am able to recognise that a great deal has been done in the way of bringing the colonies and the Mother-country more into harmony with each other, yet I do not think a genuine approach has been made to anything in the shape of a substantial federation of the dominions of the Crown. On the contrary, I think the impulse is rather to federate different groups of the colonies; and, in my opinion, the federation of these several groups will not lead towards federation of the whole Empire. When I went to England in 1870, at the time I first took up the subject publicly, the feeling was strong on the part of the Liberal party in Great Britain that the colonies were more likely to be a source of weakness to the Empire than of strength. The Goldwin Smith theories, in fact, were predominant. I remember that at the time there was a Bill being passed through the Imperial Parliament to give trustees the power of investing trust funds in British railway-stock; and, when I appealed to a Cabinet Minister to allow colonial Government bonds as a permissible investment, the reply he made was this: "How can you suppose that trustees in England will invest in colonial securities? I have resided a great part of my life in Russia, and do you think I would not prefer Russian to colonial bonds?" Well, Sir, time has worked out that problem, and we now know what colonial bonds are worth and what Russian bonds are worth! The first great step towards effecting a nearer connection between the Mother-country and the colonies was taken when Lord Beaconsfield—then Mr. Disraeli—at a great meeting of the Conservative party at the Crystal Palace, announced as one of the tenets of the party that no Minister of the Crown who had the welfare of the country at heart could be unmindful of the necessity of drawing into bonds of closer union the widespread dominions of the Crown. A great change took place after that, undoubtedly, and the Goldwin Smith theories are now scouted. But, while a conspicuous amount of attention has been shown to the colonies during the last two or three years, it seems to me that a line has been drawn. Some endeavours have been exerted to make the colonies more useful to the Mother-country, and to bring them into better terms; but a strong line has been drawn against their association into one federation. I ask myself, if there was a desire to associate the colonies and the Mother-country into a federation, why was that subject particularly and especially barred at the late Conference? That was the case; it was specially barred; it was specially prevented from being considered. I am of opinion—and I think most honourable members will be inclined to agree with me—that if there had been a disposition to federate the Empire the weak spot in Mr. Gladstone's proposal to establish Home Rule in Ireland would have been disposed of. I do not say it as regards all the so-called Unionists; but at any rate with that section of them following Mr. Chamberlain the objection was that the proposed Home Rule scheme shut out the Irish people from adequate representation in the Imperial Parliament, and it was an admitted fact that, whilst Home Rule was to be given to Ireland, Ireland was still to contribute to the Imperial revenues, and yet was not to have the same share in the control of Imperial affairs that she has now. Now, had the view been taken that it was desirable to establish a federal Parliament, that objection would have been surmounted, and there would not have been that break-up of the Liberal party that there was. I may be wrong, but it appears to me that it will not be long before an opportunity will occur of testing the real feeling which exists. I do not think the Mother-country is far from the adoption of a system of a more or less protective character; and when that comes about, whether it is called protection or fair trade, or whatever name it may go under, it will be seen whether the feeling in the Mother-country towards the colonies is strong enough to cause a preference to be given to the colonies over foreign countries. We know that France and other countries show such a preference towards their colonies, besides that in other countries the colonies are represented in the central Legislature. There is no such system as ours anywhere but in our Empire; and the time will come—in my opinion it will not be very long hence—when the specific question will arise in England whether a larger duty shall be charged on foreign than on colonial produce. When that question is answered we shall know what is the disposition towards federating the Empire. I do not agree with the Premier that a contribution of the kind we are now asked to make will lead to federation. And why? I will say, shortly, it is because it is folly, both in public affairs and in private affairs, to give all your concessions away in the expectation that other concessions will be given in return. Why, the step that was taken in reducing the duty on Australian wines in this colony, in my opinion, has shut out for years and years the possibility of making favourable reciprocal arrangements. When the reduction was made the other colonies hardly said, "Thank you." Instead of making the reduction the basis of negotiations, it was apparently a concession made without any return whatever. And, truly, I am afraid it will be the same here with the proposed contribution to the cost of the naval forces of the Empire. The late Conference was forbidden to go into the question of Federation. It was allowed to go so far as to consider the question of joint contribution to the cost of naval defence, and no further, as the official papers show. Now I will say why I deeply regret the remarks the Premier has made. He discards altogether the principles on which the late Government consented to make this contribution. He has placed in the first, in fact, in the principal position the question of contributing towards the cost of the naval defence of the Empire, and says that he looks on it as a comparatively unimportant condition whether we are to have two ships stationed here. Now, the attitude taken up by the late Government was this: They found that, in what they had regarded as a mere friendly parley with the Admiral on the station when he happened to be here, he was really acting from well-considered instructions from Home, and that the object was not merely the providing, more or less temporarily, for sudden emergencies, but that he was acting on a deep-seated principle to endeavour to make the Australasian Colonies responsible for a portion of the cost of the defence of the Empire. And the view the late Government took was that, while they would be quite willing to entertain any proposal for a contribution by the colonies towards the defence of the Empire, they would not be willing that the Australasian group should be singled out for the purpose, but that it should be a policy and an arrangement common to all the colonies of the Empire. As a compromise they intimated they were willing to make an arrangement by which this colony would be made the naval station for at least two ships, but they were not willing to come into an undertaking to contribute towards the defence of the Empire generally unless all the Crown colonies and all the constitutional colonies were drawn into a like arrangement. I regret that the honourable gentleman has adopted a different tone, because I am convinced that he does not represent New-Zealand feeling in doing so. If I had more time I would read an extract from the memoranda which passed upon the subject; but I do not wish to speak at greater length than necessary. Therefore I simply say that the late Government kept, throughout the negotiations, to the point of their being willing to pay for making this colony the station for two vessels, but not being willing to enter into an arrangement which would not comprehend the whole Empire. It is necessary to say a few words as to the reasons which have led to the recognition of the necessity of increasing the naval forces on the Australasian station. It is because the Imperial Government have disregarded the advice given to them by the honourable member for Auckland Central many years ago, and, later, by various Governors, Governments, and public men, that powerful and conflicting interests have been allowed to grow up in the Pacific, and to come into competition with Australian and Imperial interests. And now, when the Imperial Government have become awake to the fact that the Australasian fleet is insufficient not for the defence of the Australasian Colonies, but insufficient for the defence of those colonies when considered in connection with the larger responsibilities forced upon the Imperial Government by reason of the new aspects and features which present themselves throughout the Pacific, they ask the colonies to become responsible. How far this measure lays down any such principle I am unable to say; but, in my opinion, the only thing which justifies our adopting the Act is that the colony is willing to make a certain contribution for a term of years on account of two vessels being stationed in the waters of the colony. The late Government expressly stated that they took exception to the fact that, while Admiral Tryon admitted that the defence of the Australian Colonies was insufficient, yet, instead of making that defence sufficient, as the Imperial Government were bound to do, they entered into the question of what monetary bargain they could make with the colonies. I hope the honourable gentleman will appreciate the exact point I raise. I think that all parts of the Empire—India, Canada, and the Crown colonies, as well as the constitutional colonies—should contribute to the cost of the naval defence of the Empire, but that it is unfair that this portion of Her Majesty's dominions should be singled out for contribution—that the constitutional colonies in Australasia should be called on to pay when nothing is paid in respect of Fiji and other possessions, questions in connection with which form one of the prominent causes requiring the presence of a large fleet in these waters. I shall now come to the question of the Conference, and, first of all, may express regret that the Government has not laid upon the table the papers relating to the subject.

Major ATKINSON.—I think they are all laid on the table.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I have looked over my papers and I have not seen them: at any rate, they have not been distributed in printed form amongst honourable members. I should like to notice one point in connection with this matter at the outset. The honourable gentleman, in reply to a question put at an earlier period of the session, as to whether the gentlemen who represented New Zealand had made any report, replied in the negative. I think that the real fact of the matter was this: that, with a view of having something like a unanimous report, care was taken to send out a voluminous account of what took place at the Conference—of everything, in fact, short of allowing the publication of confidential particulars regarding the condition of Her Majesty's navy; and therefore the gentlemen who represented New Zealand, being parties to this report, satisfied all that could be asked of them in the way of giving full information to the colony of the proceedings of the Conference. And now, Sir, I wish to say a few words with regard to the action of the gentlemen who represented New Zealand. I may remark that the Premier omitted all reference to them in his speech, arising, perhaps, from the circumstance that he laid so little stress upon that particular point in the proceedings to which I am about to refer, and which, to me, seems to most signally merit the gratitude of the colony. When we agreed that our representatives should appear for us, it was on the distinct understanding that they would not assent to any arrangements under which Australasia would be called upon to contribute towards the cost of the Imperial fleet unless there was a specific provision that two vessels were to be located on the New Zealand coast; and I have to state that I think it due to the gentlemen who represented us—Sir F. Dillon Bell and Sir William Fitzherbert—to say that they showed great ability and very great skill in reconciling the other colonies to this condition being granted solely to New Zealand. I must confess that I was amazed they were able to do so; for, although we constantly insisted on this point, we received no sympathy worth mentioning from Admiral Tryon, and I had little hope that our representatives would be successful in carrying it. That they did so, and did it so well that we had several of the other colonies very generously supporting the proposal instead of opposing it, is a proof of the admirable manner in which our representatives discharged their duty. I may add, from information I have received from our representatives, that several of the other colonies vied with each other in generously supporting the proposition, to which we might not unnaturally have expected their opposition. I mention this because I consider that the Commissioners who represented us at the Conference are entitled to be specially thanked for their services, both as regards the special point to which I have alluded and generally. We had only received intimation of the completion of the Conference just at the time when the Government were resigning, and we had not the opportunity of thanking our representatives; but I think it is a matter which devolves on the present Government, and I hope that it is only necessary for me to call attention to the matter to induce the Government to look into it and consider it. I should further observe this: that, although one gentleman who acted as a Commissioner for New Zealand went Home for the purpose of taking a holiday, instead of taking that holiday he devoted himself to the work of the Conference; and I have no doubt he was put to much additional expense, and that, having to return as he did at so short a notice, he did not have that time at his disposal it was his intention to have when he left New Zealand. And I think it would be a graceful act on the part of the Government to ascertain what additional expense that gentleman was put to and what loss he sustained, and to reimburse him accordingly. I shall now come to the point of the Bill itself. I am not satisfied with the way in which the Bill is drawn. I know that the Government have had some difficulty, because the Home Government wished the agreement to be embodied in a schedule to the Bill; yet the late Government laid particular stress, in fact, insisted, on this point: that the colony should not be responsible for the withdrawal of other colonies. But, as the Bill is now worded, its effect is to make it responsible. And I do hope—although I find it difficult to get the Government to listen to suggestions coming from me—that they will allow amendments to be made in clause 3 which will remove all doubt on the subject. The agreement is with a certain number of colonies—New South Wales, Tasmania, South Australia, New Zealand, Victoria, Queensland, and Western Australia—and the proportion is only to be voted in the case of the others all agreeing to it. But the 3rd clause says,—

“In each of the ten years during which the said agreement shall be in force there shall be issued and paid to Her Majesty, out of the Consolidated Fund, for the purpose of the said agreement, a sum bearing the same proportion to the total amount payable under Article VII. of the said agreement as the population of New Zealand bears to the total population of the Australasian Colonies whose Governments are parties to the said agreement.”

Sir J. Vogel

This will let in, in my opinion, only those Governments whose Parliaments ratify the agreement; for it is not sufficient for a Government to say that it is favourable: it requires to be ratified by Parliament; and we know that in one case—that of Queensland—the Parliament has refused to ratify the agreement. Now, Sir, I would ask the honourable gentleman—Major ATKINSON.—Perhaps the honourable gentleman did not hear me state that I intend to propose an amendment in this direction, and that I have a clause ready which will make it perfectly clear.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I am obliged to the honourable gentleman. I am sorry I did not hear it. I am glad that will be the case. Then, I think we should adopt the Act as amended, but with this further point made clear. I have no doubt that when the honourable gentleman communicates the decision to the Imperial Government he will say something upon the question of the size of the vessels. I am not sure, under the agreement as it stands, whether the letter of the agreement would not be met by appointing small vessels here—two vessels as small as the one which lately visited here, perhaps smaller. But that is not the meaning of the clause; and I have no doubt that the honourable gentleman will think it desirable to point out that what is meant is that there should be placed in these waters two vessels of suitable character and tonnage. I have only to say, in conclusion, that, while I share with the honourable gentleman the hope that this measure will lead to federation—which, I agree with him, will be to the benefit not only of the Empire, but of the world in general—yet I fail to see any practical steps being taken in that direction; whilst, year after year, as these colonies improve in size and resources, they will be less inclined to abandon the independence which they now enjoy, and which undoubtedly, to a certain extent, they would have to abandon if they agreed to come into a common federation. Whilst the feeling towards the colonies is certainly becoming more favourable than it formerly was, yet the colonies have grown and are growing so rapidly that the difficulty will perhaps consist not of the Mother-country being reluctant to draw more closely the bonds of union between herself and her colonies, but of the colonies being unwilling to enter into an irrevocable federation: and unless it is irrevocable it is merely a passing agreement. However, Sir, perhaps neither the honourable member nor myself will live to know whose prophecy is correct. I will conclude by expressing the hope that this Bill will be passed as unanimously as possible.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Both the leader of the House and the leader of the Opposition have agreed in describing this measure as a most important one, and surely it would be impossible to exaggerate the importance of it; but that is only, to my mind, an argument against proceeding with the measure at this stage of the session. It is not in any sense complimentary either to the Parliament of New Zealand or to the Parliament of Great Britain that we should hurry over the consideration of this great measure. The subject is one which must affect the destinies of the colony in almost every conceivable way. Two-thirds of the members of this House have already left.

Major ATKINSON.—They have all paired one way or the other.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I do not know that the mere pairing is in any sense in point. The fact of honourable members having paired is hardly a good reason for going on with the Bill, if this is in any sense a deliberative Assembly. If this is a mechanical House, to be worked by party or by private or concealed arrangement, then this pairing may be a very good answer to my objection; but if this House is, as an Assembly ought to be, a deliberative body, and one in which arguments are with care to be submitted and with care to be considered, then the Premier's rejoinder is no answer whatever to my objection that this is not a fitting time for this great measure to be passed. I say that two-thirds of the members have left without having considered this Bill; there is barely a quorum present here to-day to discuss this national question, and within a few hours it is desired to pass it into law. Of course the Premier deprecates discussion; but in doing so he pays no compliment whatever to this House. To pass this measure now would be to commit the colony to a very grave position, and I submit that it would be no mark of respect to Great Britain that we should lay at the foot of the Throne any tribute such as this, wrung from an exhausted minority. I have computed that from this time on Monday last the members of this House who have been attending to their duty as members of the House and to their duty as members of Committees have had, out of seventy-two hours, only some twelve hours to restore their exhausted energies by sleep. That means, Sir, that we have been working at high-pressure for the last three or four days; and you have only to look round this House to see honourable members trying to snatch sleep while attending to their duties. And it is under these circumstances that we are asked to pass a measure which will mould the destinies of this colony for many years to come. This reminds one almost irresistibly of the passage in English history which is recorded by Kinglake—how in June, 1854, the Duke of Newcastle went down to Richmond, and at Pembroke Lodge had a meeting of the Cabinet, at which he submitted the despatch that committed England to the Crimean war. The historian describes that it was evening, a summer evening, and the Duke began to read his despatch amid the nodding heads of his colleagues, who had—somewhat like the experience of honourable members here—been going through nights of wakeful hours in the session of Parliament which was then sitting; and the legend runs that the members of the Cabinet were soon lulled to sleep, and gave assent without hearing or, at any rate, appreciating the gravity of the despatch. He records how, for a moment, the tumbling of a chair interrupted the reading. Here there is no such sound, unless it be that of honourable members audibly addressing themselves to sleep. The result of that despatch was to make history, one might say, to be almost written in blood for the next three years. No such consequence, it is to be hoped, will follow the passing of this measure, if it do pass; but, nevertheless, it must have a very serious effect upon the future of this colony. The Premier has given us details of the expenditure to which this Bill will commit New Zealand. The whole amount being, among the colonies, £126,000, our proportion will be about £21,000, and for that we are to get seven more vessels to the present squadron, which includes only one second-class armour-clad vessel, the others being mere sloops such as we have seen lately here; and there is the special provision, which the Premier referred to almost with an apology, that two of the vessels should lie, when not commissioned, in some one of the ports of New Zealand. But that is really no inducement whatever to reconcile us to this measure; it is a mere bagatelle. What does this Bill mean to us—the passing of this measure? The Premier has candidly admitted that we must at least fortify one port as a harbour of refuge into which these men-of-war may run. That, as it seems to me, means that the colony—for the purposes of this squadron—must incur an annual expense of a considerable amount beyond what, in ordinary circumstances, she would require to garrison the ports already partially fortified, if only for the purpose of preventing the ordnance and stores that are there from becoming deteriorated. That means a great deal, and it seems to me that it is to subordinate New Zealand to the fleet, instead of subordinating the fleet to New Zealand. Now, the Premier has, in his confident way, explained the necessity for some provision such as is indicated in the Bill. He has, curiously enough, asked us to unite with him in laying the first stone, which stone, Sir, is for the purpose of drawing closer the bonds—however that may be—which unite us with the Mother-country. It is a simile which fitly indicates the measure—it is a stone to draw closer the bonds that unite us with the Mother-country. But I have never known any stone which would have any such effect.

Major ATKINSON.—I did not use the word "stone."

Mr. HUTCHISON.—I took the words down. Sir, he invited us to unite in laying the first stone for the purpose of drawing closer the bonds that unite us with the Mother-country. It was a very curious but, as I think, a very apt illustration indeed. The Premier, inferentially, somewhat deprecated members of this House, who are inexperienced, discussing the details of this great scheme, and to that extent he perhaps seeks to awe the House with his military title. Although it is no disparagement to the gallant Premier that he won his spurs as a "bushranger,"—I have often thought the term was a very equivocal one, but that is what I understand he was called, and there were corps other than the Taranaki Bushrangers which went under a similar designation,—although the gallant Premier may thus have an amplitude of military knowledge, still I believe it to be the duty of members of this House, according to their lights, to endeavour to obtain information bearing on any subject that comes before them, and, on their own responsibility, to endeavour to form an opinion upon it. On these lines, I should ask the assistance of the Admiral who lately commanded on the Australasian station—Admiral Tryon—to show that it is not enough, if we commit ourselves to this scheme, that we should fortify one port. It is necessary, according to the Admiral, that we should be equipped at all points to resist an attacking squadron. I would refer honourable members to the memorandum of Admiral Tryon, dated the 27th March, 1885, to be found in the Appendices to the Journals of last session, Vol. I., A.-6, page 15, where, referring to a hostile squadron approaching the coast, he says,—

“To render an attack from the first-named futile, and, if possible, to render the task so improbable of success that no one would contemplate the undertaking, a local defence is called into existence; but, while it was not very costly to protect our homes, they do not, and they could not, help to drive off cruisers such as could prey upon us. We must therefore provide the means whereby they may be captured, if possible; if not, at all events driven off our coast.”

That is the conclusion of the Admiral in discussing the question out of which this Bill has arisen; so that it is not enough that one port should be fortified for the purpose of repelling these vessels, but, according to the Admiral, the whole of the colony should be placed in a position of efficient defence. It is quite easy for Victoria, with its single port; it is easy for New South Wales with its two ports, Newcastle and Port Jackson; and it is easy for Tasmania, with her one or two ports, to defend themselves without very great expense; but what is the position of New Zealand, an isolated colony lying far away from communication other than the telegraph, which would be sure to be cut? We know that the fortifying of one port would not be sufficient for the purpose indicated by the Admiral. What would be the purpose of an attacking squadron or cruiser coming to these waters? It has been generally supposed that the mission would be plunder. Now, as it seems to me, that would be a very subordinate part of the mission, if it were a part at all. The object of an enemy of England in attacking any of her colonies would be to inflict a wound upon the honour of England, which would be far more valuable to the country than sent the cruiser or the squadron than any bullion that could be carried away. Consequently, if this colony is to commit itself to a scheme of naval defence, it must contemplate the defending of all its vulnerable harbours against predatory cruisers. In that sense, this question is a most momentous one, for it means not only a contribution of £21,000 a year to England, but it means, further, that the defences existing should be efficiently equipped and manned. Last year the manning of our defences cost the colony some £40,000, and, assuming that the greatest economy is to be exercised in the maintenance of these defences in the future, the cost cannot be much less than this contribution, or something like another £21,000 or £25,000 a year. But that is not all. Supposing war were declared, either by or against Great Britain, would that expenditure be sufficient for this colony? Not at all. The fact of having committed ourselves to this scheme would also commit us, as far as we could provide it, to the efficient defence and equipment of these fortifications; so that, if such another panic arose as occurred a few years ago, it would mean an extra expenditure of at least half a million from this impoverished country. It has been aptly said that this fleet, even when in existence, is not intended for the defence of the colonies; it is rather for the purpose of going afield and attacking the enemy. It is like the policeman patrolling the block, which is a very vain precaution unless the householder also secures his doors and windows, and that at some little expense. But New Zealand is different from the other colonies, and I am surprised that the Premier did not touch on that aspect of the question. New Zealand invites attack from all quarters. She is isolated, and, as I have said, the wounding of England's honour is of far more value to an enemy than any contribution he could draw from a colony. Therefore New Zealand is the very spot at which an attack would be directed; and I see no attempt in this Bill to give New Zealand that protection which, relatively to her defenceless position in the midst of the Pacific Ocean, she is entitled to. These vessels are to be away patrolling this large Australasian station, which stretches almost from the Equator to the Antarctic Circle. Then, in the event of any hostile vessel eluding the fleet, New Zealand would be open to attack by the enemy's cruisers, and the result might be most disastrous. It was only a few months ago that there were naval manoeuvres upon the coast of Great Britain; and it will be within the recollection of honourable members that the whole English Channel was, as it were, covered with armoured-clads and gunboats. But another fleet managed to dodge the defenders, and, by all sorts of disguises and manoeuvres, reached the Nore several hours before the very ships that were supposed to prevent such an occurrence. That is an indication of how futile the defence might be of a colony or colonies defended by seven or eight or even a dozen vessels. Every cruiser sent out by a nation at war with Great Britain would be equipped with all the latest scientific appliances, and would be, most likely, faster than any British ship on the station; for it is the fatality of the Admiralty at Home that it manages to be second to almost all other nations in respect of speed. However, that is the position; and this view of the matter is borne out by Admiral Tryon, when he says,—

"History is apt to repeat itself: squadrons and fleets have escaped the most vigilant Admirals, and the most skilful strategists failed, in days of old, so to order our fleets as to prevent this. Since those days the composition of the navies of the world has greatly altered, and at this time it is far easier for an Admiral to avoid notice and conceal destination.

"It is possible that an attack may be delivered by a small squadron of ironclads of a type that does not entitle them to a place in the first rank—they would be very formidable if employed to attack our colonies; and, still more possibly, a hostile squadron might contain vessels of the fast, partially-armoured class that are now much in fashion, and the construction of them is on the increase. It is well to consider what such a squadron could do supposing it had arrived off our coast, having avoided detection, the Admiral in command, deceived by false reports, gone to New Zealand, with the telegraphs cut."

That is putting the case of Australia being left without the protection of the fleets of England, some false reports drawing the Admiral to New Zealand. But let us take the opposite case and suppose that, by some false report, the Admiral was called away to King George's Sound, what position should we be in, even if we had one of our ports sufficiently protected? The other four or five ports, left partially defended, would be where the enemy would make his attack, and so strive to wound the honour and lower the pride of Great Britain. Again, to indicate the manner in which this proposal has been introduced, and the careless or, rather, indifferent way in which the interests of this and other colonies have been left unprotected in matter of detail—and as to this, of course, it is no charge against the present Government, inasmuch as the articles appear to have been settled by the last Government, it making no difference in discussing the matter—here we have, for ten years, "Archers" and "Rattlesnakes," and no provision made for replacing them by more perfect vessels. I undertake to say that an "Archer," when launched with the most recent and perfect appliances, will in ten years, compared with the future implements of war, be as antiquated as the archer of old with his bow and arrows against the machine-gun of the present day. So much for the financial aspect of the question, which does not seem to be a very inviting one, being a contribution on our part without any adequate or sufficient return; and it commits us to an expenditure the magnitude of which it is difficult to exaggerate. Then, there is the political aspect of this question, which both the Premier and leader of the Opposition have touched upon. What is the object of this arrangement? It is, according to the preamble of the Bill, for the protection of trade; which means that, as trade is supposed to follow the flag, it is protection of English merchants' interests. And it is surely a great anachronism that in these modern days there should be proposed by England such a scheme as is indicated in this Bill. A few years ago it would have been considered an insult upon her honour that she should have to bargain and chaffer for a contribution to protect her flag in distant parts of the world. Honourable gentlemen will remember the celebrated "Arrow" case, which called forth from Lord Palmerston, in 1857, that just and noble speech in which he used these words:—

"But will any one tell me that officers at the other extremity of the globe, when a violent outrage has been committed on the honour of their country, are to remain with their arms folded till they can send Home for orders and receive instructions? Why, months would elapse between insult and resentment, and the purpose for which redress had been demanded would have been forgotten in the apathy and want of exertion which would have ensued."

This also leads me to ask, what if New Zealand refuses to be a party to this arrangement—if she refuses, as Queensland has done, to enter into the bargain? A British ship, flying a British flag, is bound for New Zealand: if attacked by a hostile man-of-war, and overtaken by an "Archer" or a "Rattlesnake," would the captain of the English man-of-war first ask, "Where are you going? If to Victoria, we will protect you, and blow the enemy to pieces; but, if to New Zealand, oh, she does not contribute! the enemy can sink you if he chooses"? That is the logical conclusion of the lack of New Zealand being a party to this arrangement. Is the British flag to be insulted with impunity because a British vessel says her port of destination is in New Zealand instead of some colony which is a contributory? That, surely, would be against the honour of England, and an argument which should go very far in inducing this House not to consent to such an arrangement as this, which is derogatory to the honour of England, and unworthy of any of her colonies. It is, as indicated by the Premier, taxation, although he did not use the word, and preferred "tribute." Still, it is taxation, and in this sense: that unless we adopt this arrangement we shall not be protected. Then there is the inducement held out by the Premier and by the honourable member for Christchurch North. They urge, as an argument in favour of this proposal, that, if we contribute to the defence of Imperial interests in this part of the world, we shall be making a distinct step in advance towards Federation. I understood that a few years ago that question was practically settled in the negative. It is impossible that any definition in any Act of Parliament or convention will secure that Federation which can best be preserved by community of feeling and by common language. These bonds are likely to disappear if they are reduced to the form of a protocol. I think, therefore, that the inducement which those honourable gentlemen held out in favour of this proposal is one which cannot commend itself to this House. Supposing we had representation, and that our Agent-General, for instance, was sworn as a member of the Privy Council, and had some voice in the deliberations of the Ministry at Home, do you mean to say that he or all the Agents-General could control in the slightest degree the intricacies of diplomacy on the Continent of Europe, or affect for a single moment popular feeling governed by the immense machinery and engine-power of the Press of Great Britain? It would be simply futile to suppose that the presence of Agents-General in the Privy Council or in some Board of advice or control would have the least power in shaping a question of peace or war, in which we should necessarily be involved without the least concern or wish at all. Then, Sir, there is another aspect of this important question scarcely considered by the public of England and the colonies which I should like to refer to as perhaps the most recent on the subject. It is indicated in the Imperial Blue Book which is on the table of the House, and which contains a report of the proceedings of the Conference which was held in London, I believe, early this year, at which we had two representatives, the Agent-General and Sir William Fitzherbert. At the meeting, on the 4th of January last, the Marquis of Salisbury, referring to what he called "Kriegsverein," said,—

"He had observed a tendency to the impression that the defence of the colonies ought to be entirely a matter for the Imperial Government, because any danger that the colonists might run was exclusively the result of Imperial action and policy."

"But these are not the only or the most important considerations which attach to this matter of Imperial and colonial defence. I do not think that, so long as the Empire hangs together, the colonies are in the least likely to be brought into any war."

Well, if there could be any good ground for that opinion, there can be no ground for these preparations. The whole drift of the argument is the other way. He continued,—

"Supposing the colonies were not part of the Empire, supposing that the colonies were independent, do you think they would be safe? I know that twenty or thirty years ago it was thought that they would be safe,—that their distance from Europe would make them practically safe. . . . I am very far from suspecting or believing that the rulers of the great countries of Europe are likely to commit any act of violence upon distant territories."

Then, after thus suggesting the contrary, he says,—

"Do not interpret my words as to imagine that I conceive any aggression likely or probable on the part of those who wield power in Europe; but the circumstances in which we live, and the tendencies of human nature as we know it in all times of history, teach us that where there is liability to attack, and defencelessness, attack will come."

Now, supposing that Lord Salisbury was right, although he is very vague and indefinite, the question is this: Can any liability to attack be removed without severing our connection with the Mother-country? On the one hand, we have unlimited liability—for the alternative of the refusal of this is that we shall be left only partially protected—and on the other, as suggested by the Premier, there is independence. Now, it seems to me we are not shut up to such alternatives. It seems to me that security on the part of the colonies from attack may be obtained without either committing ourselves to ruinous expenditure or, on the other hand, cutting the painter; and the suggestion which I would make is that there can be a better and more enduring settlement of this important subject. It seems to me the interest of Great Britain in the matter of colonisation is not singular, as it was a few years ago; that the expectations and endeavours of great nations, such as France, Germany, and Italy, have all been directed in the way of extending their colonial possessions, and, although the colonies of England are more numerous and important than those of any other Power, still it must be a matter of concern to other great Powers that their colonies should not be subjected to the attack which, in the event of England being their enemy, would most surely follow; and it seems to me that it would be an Imperial act worthy of the palmiest days of England's fame if she were to approach the other great Powers of Europe with a proposition to meet in conference, and, considering the importance of their interests in these scattered colonies, enter upon some treaty which would restrict the consequences of their European quarrels from kindred people distant far across the world who have no voice, and perhaps no interest, in those quarrels. And I venture to think the subject is one deserving not only the consideration of this Ministry, but of the British Ministry. A conference should be held at which some treaty might be made under which the colonies should be held to be sacred from attack; that there should be a colonial flag, which, without indicating any severance from the Mother-country, would still give security in the event of wars in respect of which the colonies were not immediately concerned. That would preserve our relations under circumstances which would be much more agreeable to the feelings of colonists bound up with the Mother-country, without making it a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence, and leaving them, in case of inability to incur this expenditure, the only alternative of separation. Even under such circumstances of neutrality, events might arise when,

Casting cold, prudential thoughts aside, colonists might Take some generous impulse for their guide, and, as in the case of New South Wales and the Soudan, colonies might voluntarily assist the Mother-country; and, if they did, it would be such a deliberate interference on their own part as would be equivalent to a declaration of war. That, however, would be almost impossible under the commercial conditions presented in this Bill, and I am sure this House would unanimously regret that circumstances should render the alternative of complete separation necessary or desirable.

Mr. GUINNESS.—I can only reiterate the expression of opinion that has been advanced by the last speaker, that this House, at this stage of the session, ought not to discuss such an important measure as this. I think the foundation for our agreeing to the measure was the prospect that the whole of the Australasian Colonies would bind themselves together in providing a contribution towards the naval expenditure of the State. Now we find that one of these colonies has drawn back from that position; and I say that no Bill ought to pass this Legislature which would have the effect of coming into force immediately in the shape proposed by the present Government. I say, if the Bill is passed at all, it ought to be passed with a proviso limiting its operation, or providing for its coming into operation only when all the colonies interested have agreed to the proposal to contribute towards this scheme of naval defence. The time, I take it, as mentioned by the honourable member for Waitotara, is not opportune to discuss such an important measure as this, when we see in this House simply a bare quorum. I am told that there is not a quorum in the House now. That in itself is sufficient evidence that we—a fourth of the members of the whole Parliament—ought not to decide such an important measure as this, by which it is proposed to bind the colony to an annual contribution of something between £22,000 and £25,000. I ask, is it at all right that this Parliament, that has been elected by the electors at a general election—where the principal cry that was raised by those honourable gentlemen who are now holding office as the Government of the day, and who have been placed there by friends returned by a majority from the country, was that it was necessary to retrench in every possible direction—is it right, I ask, that Parliament should be asked to pass this Bill now? The Government say that they have retrenched in every way in order to save further taxation. How can they say that, while, on the other hand, they are bringing forward wild schemes for lavish expenditure? Is it a proper step to be taken, after being engaged for the last ten weeks in devising schemes and measures for retrenchment in every direction, that, at the last moment of this session, we are asked, so to speak, to reverse a great deal of what we have been doing, and, by a bare quorum, to pass such an important measure as this? I do hope that the House will not agree to pass this Bill at this time. I fail to see any absolute urgency or necessity to pass it this session. The next session of the House is one which is likely to take place within a very few months, and I fail to see why we are to pass a measure binding us to this contribution whether the other contracting parties are bound by it or not. We know the Queensland Legislature have refused to pass a similar Bill. Let us give them another opportunity of reconsidering the matter after their general elections. Let us wait until that is done, or else, if there is a majority in this House determined to pass the measure this session, let us pass it with a condition attached that it shall not become law unless all the contracting parties agree to be bound to contribute—one and all.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I wish to put a question to the Government. A very important statement has been made by the Premier. He admits that nearly half if not quite half of the members are gone, but he tells us they are all paired. If that is so, it means that nearly half the House are against the measure, and I think it would be very important for us left here to be told exactly who have paired, and on which side. We have not their speeches to guide us to their opinions, as we have usually with those who pair; and I think honourable members should have that information from the list of pairs. Our opinions must be to a certain extent influenced by the votes of other honourable members, and, if what the Premier states is correct, the House must be pretty nearly divided on this question, and I think we should be in possession of the information I refer to before the debate proceeds. I ask the Premier if he will produce the list of pairs.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The House has never recognised pairing, unless an honourable member inadvertently votes after pairing. The House always religiously excludes the consideration of pairs—it is something outside the House, and a mere private arrangement between honourable members.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They are seen after the division has been taken.

Sir G. GREY.—Yes; that is after the votes have been given. We usually know perfectly well how members who have paired are going to vote, because they have usually expressed their views in speeches. But in this case a most important measure has been brought before the House after a number of honourable members have left Wellington; and yet we are told they have all paired on it. Now, that statement is either true or it is untrue. This is a thing absolutely unknown. A most important measure is brought before the House, and we find that a secret taking of votes upon it has been effected before the measure was brought in, and the Government are in possession of information which, if produced, would have a great effect on honourable members' minds. I think we should have that information given us, and I ask the Premier whether he will give us that information or not.

Major ATKINSON.—The Government have not got it at all.

Sir G. GREY.—The Premier stated that pairs had been given.

Major ATKINSON.—I have no doubt whatever that all honourable members who take an interest in the question, and are absent, have paired. The honourable gentleman is quite aware of the practice, and he knows as much about the pairs upon this measure as I do.

Sir G. GREY.—I do not know it at all.

Major ATKINSON.—The honourable gentleman knows the rule as to pairing, and he often pairs himself when he wishes to be absent.

Sir G. GREY.—I do not know what has been done in this case. I am entirely ignorant of it. I say this is information we ought to have; because, were the names made known, and the way they vote, it would have a great influence on us in coming to a decision. This is a question concerning the whole Empire. The Premier distinctly stated that all who have gone—more than half the House—have paired. Now, I ask that that information should be given to the House. Those gentlemen are not here to make their opinions known by their voices, and I say the colony and the House have a right to know what their opinions are, as shown by the way they have voted. I ask the Premier, will he give us that information?

Major ATKINSON.—Certainly I should not, if I had the power. It is a thing never heard of before. The pairs will be posted up in due time, as usual. The honourable gentleman's knowledge of parliamentary rules, if not very large, is quite sufficient to tell him that what he asks is an unheard-of thing.

Sir G. GREY.—The Premier is evading the real question. The pairs usually given are those of honourable members whose opinions are known from their speeches; but in this case honourable members have left Wellington before they could speak on the question. If the information is not given, I shall move the adjournment of the debate. I move that because it is not respectful to the other colonies or to Great Britain that a debate should take place under such circumstances as these. If the honourable gentleman misleads us into voting against the measure under the belief that we have nearly half the House to support us in certain views, and if he has betrayed us by that action into giving votes differently from what we might otherwise do on so great a subject as the defence of the Empire, I say he has acted traitorously to this House and to the country. There can be no doubt whatever that such is the case. I say that the common rules of honour on the part of the leader of the House require that he should not mislead the House on a question of this kind—that he should have recourse to no measure which will mislead us in the votes we give. We have a right to know what the opinion of the leading members of the House is on this question. Did I know how they have paired I could get some sort of clue to their views, and something to confirm myself in the resolution to which I might come on this subject. But, deprived of that information, I say we have no just means of forming an opinion of what our fellow-members—our colleagues—think on this subject. I hope the House will support me in demanding this information before we proceed further. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It will not be exceeding my duty to remind the honourable member that he loses the right to speak on the main question if his motion for adjourning the debate should happen to be negatived.

Sir G. GREY.—Then, Sir, if I lose my right to speak by doing that, I say the Government have no right to put me in that position. It is a most unjust and tyrannical measure. I feel that, in connection with things done last night, the same kind of procedure has taken place this session on the part of the Premier, which is not consistent with the honour of the House or the line of conduct the Government ought to pursue.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I think to adjourn the debate would be merely wasting time, and I hope the proposal will be negatived.

The House divided on the question, "That the debate be adjourned."

Adjournment of debate negatived.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I will not keep the House long, but I should like to say a few words upon this important measure. If the Government can afford it we ought to have six men-of-war, three for each Island; but I think that, instead of wasting time, we should leave it to the honourable member for Auckland Central to make a proposal next session so as to secure that honourable members who go away before the session is over should lose half pay, the amount so gained to be distributed among those who remain.

Bill read a second time.

On the motion for the committal of the Bill, Mr. HUTCHISON said,—Now that the second reading of the Bill has been agreed to, I would ask the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government whether he thinks he is justified in pushing on a Bill like this, affecting Imperial interests, under the circumstances now existent. We see that two-thirds or more of the members are absent. A measure passed under these conditions must bear a somewhat equivocal appearance. I would ask the honourable gentleman, under these circumstances, whether he proposes to press the Bill further.

Major ATKINSON.—Replying to the honourable gentleman's question, I would say that I think our duty is plain. The Government think that not only are they justified in asking the House to pass the Bill this session, but that it is their duty to do so. They feel that very strongly.

Sir G. GREY.—I should like to remark that the excuse made about the Bill being passed in this manner, after long delay, was quite insufficient. The honourable gentleman said that the reason for insisting on the Bill passing this session is that it would be too late to leave it over until next session, and that it was necessary to come to a decision now. That, to my mind, is a reason why it should have been brought on at an earlier period of the session. I think it is very wrong that, with so small a portion of the Parliament present, we should come to a decision on a matter of this important character. There can be no fair and proper discussion of it. I myself am shut out from discussing it. The country will never know the reasons on which the measure is advocated. It will be impossible to say that the colony is bound by a proceeding of this kind. Unless we know who have paired there is no good reason for believing that honourable gentlemen are satisfied that the matter should be brought forward this session. I think it is our duty to do the best we can to secure a full discussion of the matter in the next session of Parliament, and I shall do my best to achieve that even now. Had the honourable gentleman fallen in with my wishes and let me know what was the opinion of the leading members of the House, I might have taken a totally different course. The Premier's colleague agreed to give me the information before he came into the House, and I think the Government were bound by that. The Premier stopped him—

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Sir G. GREY.—I simply repeat that.

Major ATKINSON.—And I simply deny it.

Sir G. GREY.—Well, let it be seen.

The House divided on the question, "That the Bill be committed."

Motion for committal agreed to.

Bill committed, and reported to the House.

On the question, That the Bill be read a third time,

Sir G. GREY said.—Sir, on the third reading of this measure I wish to place on record my regret that it was not brought forward at an earlier period of the session. I think it is a melancholy thing to say that the first great national measure ever passed by New Zealand has been submitted to so thin a House. I had hoped that this measure would be brought down when the House was full; that it would be thoroughly discussed, and all the reasons in favour of the measure would be stated at length, as well as the objections to it: in this way we should have produced a measure better than that which we shall now pass, and we should have produced one that would be an example to the Empire of what should be done under such circumstances. Then I cannot help thinking that it was unfair to bring it forward at this time, after so many honourable members had left—not only unfair to this Parliament, but unfair to Great Britain; for it never can be said that this measure is a reflex of, and truly represents, the minds of the people or the Parliament of New Zealand. At the present moment we are acting quite in contravention of all the customs of this House. We are kept in ignorance of the names of a large number of persons who we are told have paired either for or against this measure. Under ordinary circumstances these names would have been affixed to these curtains; but for some reason, of which no explanation has been given, they have been kept secret from us. I think a great wrong has been done to the honourable members present in being shut out from this information, as even a sight of the names might have been a guide to us as to the feeling of the majority of the Parliament on the measure before us. I wish to place these circumstances on record, that it may be known that this Bill was passed at so late a period of the session, with so small an attendance, that sometimes only just a quorum of members was present; that information was concealed from us which Ministers at one time offered to give up, and we are ignorant of the views of our colleagues in Parliament on this Bill; and that therefore very little weight indeed can be attributed to a measure which is passed under such circumstances. I believe it is, in its present form, a very futile measure. I feel certain it will be the cause of frequent future discussion; that we have been led to embark on a new career altogether, the nature of which we cannot conjecture. We little know the path we are treading; and what might have been the occasion of rejoicing and of great national triumph if a proper measure had been passed, is to myself, as it will be to many others, a source of sadness and sorrow that so great an opportunity was lost, that the English people will be misled in thinking that this Bill represents the minds of New Zealand, and that it is obtained under circumstances which usually are not considered fair in Parliament. I believe the means resorted to to get the measure through are unfair, and it is with deep regret I hold these views.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Sir, I rise to a point of order. I ask your ruling as to whether this is not a money Bill, and, as such, should not have gone through Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It has gone through that stage. It was sent down by message from His Excellency the Governor, and was considered in Committee of the Whole.

Sir G. GREY.—Not as a money Bill. We have never been told that the Governor has given his assent to its introduction.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It was sent down by message from the Governor, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Could you inform the House what the expenditure of money under the Bill is—the sum which it appropriates to Her Majesty?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think that was stated by the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Then, Sir, on the question of the third reading, I would repeat that the conditions under which this measure has been proceeded with give reason for concluding that it is not the deliberate will of Parliament; and, with the expression of this protest, I have no other remark to make.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—I also wish to enter my protest against the amendment made in Committee. We heard a very able speech from the Premier when the Bill was introduced, and another from the leader of the Opposition; and they both concurred that this Bill was the first step towards federation, which both were anxious to see accomplished. The Premier dwelt on this subject, and said it was always a desire of his that we should federate with the other colonies, and that this was the thin end of the wedge for accomplishing that end. As a rule, I have been opposed to federation; but I am willing to waive this point, and now merely wish to show the Premier's inconsistency when he tells us that his desire is to have federation, and then, when we go into Committee, moves an amendment to this effect: that we shall not be bound jointly and severally. Now, if we were so bound there would be a certain amount of federation in the matter—there would be a common interest and a common liability: but what do we find? That, although the honourable member tells us he is very anxious for federation, directly an opportunity occurs of testing this federation, of saying that we are prepared to become jointly and severally liable with the other colonies—he says, “We are not going to do that; we are only going to bind ourselves. We are selfish individuals, and we will only bind ourselves to our own share.” I say the amendment moved in Committee was entirely inconsistent with the speech of the Premier on the second reading. I pointed out that to the Premier, and I pointed out to the House now that it is a direct breach of faith with the Imperial Government. The distinct understanding with the other Australian Colonies was that when we got the concession of two ships in New Zealand we should all be bound jointly and severally; because the Imperial authorities say, “Supposing one colony is a defaulter, do you expect us to go and collect the amount from the colony or take proceedings against it? We do not want to be put in that position. We look to the colonies as a whole to enter into this matter, and we expect this amount every year from these colonies.” That was what they said at the time. Then, again, the Australian Colonies behaved very well to us. It was a very delicate operation trying to get these two ships for New Zealand, and our representatives had to approach the question very carefully; and all praise is due to them for conducting the matter as well as they did. As I say, the Australian Colonies behaved remarkably well to us on the direct understanding that there was to be a joint and several liability, and that there would be no such thing as one colony saying that it would only pay its share. The whole success of this scheme of naval defence depends upon the whole of the colonies adopting it; and I was in hope that we should adopt it by acclamation. We know very well that the force here, although a valuable one, is practically useless unless supported by ships of the kind proposed under this arrangement. We always saw the difficulty of obtaining such ships, and we knew that it would have cost us half a million of money to build them; whereas the Home Government says, “Here are ships. You can make what use you like of them, and all we ask is that you shall contribute towards the expenses the sum of £21,600 a year.” I thought this offer would be accepted by acclamation, because, although we have to pay £21,600 a year, these ships will bring far more to the place, for, as the Premier showed, each ship will spend on coal, provisions, and otherwise, £12,400 a year, or £24,800 for the two ships, besides the money which the sailors will receive, and which, I understand, amounts to about £50 a year each, which they will spend here. Besides this there are other enormous advantages; so that we should have jumped at this arrangement and taken the Bill as it stood, so as not to imperil this great boon. But I fear we are now prejudicing the scheme by the insertion of the Premier's amendment. I hope it will not be so. I think the Premier should, as the honourable member for Auckland Central stated, have brought this Bill down at an earlier period, and not when there were only some thirty-six members present. It could then have been thoroughly discussed in all its branches before it was passed or rejected. I suppose it will be passed now, but it will be passed in such a shape that we shall not be bound except for our paltry £21,600 a year. That is the position which the Premier takes up with regard to this important measure. I felt bound to enter my protest against this amendment; and I fear that when we send over to the other Parliaments, and inform them of what we have done, we shall find there will be a great difficulty in getting this scheme agreed to. I hope it will not be so, but I fear it will.

Bill read a third time.

EDUCATION.

Mr. BROWN desired to speak on a matter personal to himself, which had been before the House on the previous day. On Monday evening his vote was challenged on the educational question by the Government Whip, the honourable member for Ashley. Yesterday that honourable gentleman gave as his authority for his pairing the honourable member for Dunedin South. That honourable gentleman was at the time on his way, as it was understood, to Dunedin. The "Takapuna" was expected to leave Wellington at four o'clock yesterday afternoon, but was afterwards detained to a later period. When this matter came on the honourable gentleman had left the chamber, and he (Mr. Brown) did not expect him to return. In order to verify what he had stated previously, the honourable member for Ashley had stated that the honourable member for Dunedin South was present with him when he (Mr. Brown) gave a pair on that question, and that he had broken it. He himself was quite surprised at this statement, knowing, as he knew at the time, there was no reason for it; and, when he saw the honourable member for Dunedin South later on, he (Mr. Brown) put the question to that gentleman whether such was the truth, that he had, in that gentleman's presence, with the Government whip, given a pair, or whether he knew personally that he gave a pair on that occasion. The honourable member for Dunedin South said the statement was not correct, and that if he (Mr. Brown) desired it he would in writing refute it. He wrote to the honourable member for Dunedin South the following letter:—

"House of Representatives,
"21st December, 1887.

"MY DEAR MR. FISH,—Mr. Pearson, the Government whip, gave your name to the House this afternoon as a witness that I had given a pair in his presence on Monday with Mr. O'Connor on the education votes, and that you were present when I specified on which items my pair was given. Kindly say if Mr. Pearson's statement is true or otherwise. — I have, &c.,

"J. C. BROWN.

"H. S. Fish, Esq., M.H.R., Wellington."

The honourable member for Dunedin South replied as follows:—

"Wellington, 21st December, 1887.

"DEAR BROWN,—In reply to your note of this day's date, I desire to say that Mr. Pearson is in error in thinking that I saw you authorise him to pair you as stated. We had a conversation as to you being paired with Mr. O'Connor, and it must have been that we mutually misunderstood each other. — I am, &c.,

"H. S. FISH."

The honourable member for Dunedin South told him that he had communicated his answer to the Government whip, and he (Mr. Brown) expected that the honourable member for Ashley would have risen, as he might have done on several occasions last evening, and given some explanation to the House. He not doing so, he (Mr. Brown) that morning wrote the following letter to him:—

"House of Representatives,
"22nd December, 1887.

"SIR,—In reference to your statement in the House yesterday, that the member for Dunedin South was present with you when I arranged a pair on the education-vote estimates, Mr. Fish has informed me that he has told you you were in error in making such an assertion, and if he had been in the House at the time he would have contradicted. Need I say that I am surprised you have not had the courtesy to withdraw the statement made in the House by you to my prejudice?

"I propose bringing the matter before the House to-day, hoping you will be present.—I am, &c.,

"J. C. BROWN.

"W. F. Pearson, Esq., M.H.R."

He need not say anything further, because it was a matter in which the honour of the House was involved, as it concerned the veracity of honourable members,—the statement, he might say, especially, of a Government whip.

Mr. PEARSON said the honourable member for Tuapeka was so well known in the House — especially in regard to pairing — that he should not go into particulars about the matter; but he would say this: that the honourable member for Tuapeka was paired, and that his name was on his (Mr. Pearson's) pair-book; and the honourable member for the Buller could testify to that fact. And he (Mr. Pearson) would go further and say this: that, if the question of personal honour came before the House as between himself and the honourable member for Tuapeka, he had no doubt what the verdict of the House would be in the matter.

Mr. O'CONOR said it seemed to him a very extraordinary thing that this pair was disputed now. The honourable member for Tuapeka was in the House, and he surely must have been under the conviction that he was paired when he voted. He (Mr. O'Connor) would like to know how it was that if the honourable member for Tuapeka thought he was not paired he voted against his own conviction.

Mr. BROWN said he need not say a word in explanation. He held in his hand a letter denying the honourable member for Ashley's assertion, and stating that it was untrue. The honourable member for the Buller had several times followed him about the lobbies requesting him not to bring this matter forward—

Mr. O'CONOR.—For your own sake.

Mr. BROWN said he had told the honourable member for the Buller that he did not want to have anything to say to him, and that, if he was giving him friendly advice, he did not wish him to proceed further in the matter.

LOAN BILL.

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor, recommending the House to make an appropriation in the Loan Bill for £70,000 and £9,000 unallotted.

Major ATKINSON moved, That the message be referred to the Committee on the Loan Bill.

Mr. GUINNESS would like to know from the Premier whether he intended to attempt to reverse the vote of the House given on the previous night. The £9,000 was absolutely struck out.

Major ATKINSON said that when the vote of £70,000 for immigration was struck out that morning it was understood generally that the Government would replace it as unappropriated. Then, as to the £9,000 struck out in the Second Schedule, the Government thought it would be better to reinstate it as unallotted, because it would be a stupid thing to do to go into the money-market for a loan of £991,000.

Mr. PERCEVAL said, that with regard to the £9,000, he took it as an expression of opinion on the part of the Committee that the amount referred to should not be proceeded with.

Motion agreed to.

Major ATKINSON moved, That the Bill be recommitted, with a view to inserting the two items referred to in His Excellency's message, and a new clause which was given notice of in Committee.

Mr. SMITH suggested to the Premier that the £9,000 should be set down for the purchase of Native land. He hoped the honourable gentleman would take that into consideration, as it was a great and important object.

Major ATKINSON said the Government would make proposals as to the purchase of Native land next session which he believed would meet with the approval of the House.

A message was received from the Governor transmitting a new clause declaring that the colony should not go on the London market for a further loan before the 31st March, 1891.

The clause having been referred to the Committee on the Bill,

The Committee divided on the question, "That the clause be added to the Bill."

Bill reported.

On the question, That the amendments be agreed to,

Sir J. VOGEL said,—I desire to raise a point of order. The Governor has sent a message down authorising the substitution of certain items in the schedule for others, or, rather, the substitution of certain items mentioned in the message for others which do not appear in the schedule now. If these items were in the schedule it would be competent for the Governor to recommend others to be substituted for them; but it so happens that the items referred to in the message were struck out by the Committee, and that therefore they no longer exist. I contend, therefore, Sir, that you cannot substitute a thing for a thing which has no longer an existence. The Governor's message should have proposed the addition of these items to the schedule, and not their substitution; therefore they are not properly before the Committee or the House, and the provisions which allow votes of this kind to be sent down by message have not been properly respected. I ask your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER.—As I read the message, it appeared to me that the items were recommended in substitution for items that were struck out; which appeared to me to be the regular course to adopt.

Amendments agreed to.

Bill read a third time.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Sir, I submit that your ruling is a mistake, and I warn the Government that I shall take an opinion upon it; and I consider the matter of so much importance that, if I find I am right, I shall raise the question in the Supreme Court. I think it also of the utmost importance not to allow the Government to adopt the very loose system which they have adopted of dealing with measures of this kind. Here we have a clause in this Bill which talks of the General Government.

Major ATKINSON.—So does the Constitution Act.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Yes; but in the Constitution Act it does not say the General Government shall borrow money. The Governor in Council is not the General Government, and "the General Government" was a term in distinction to the Provincial Governments, which no longer exist. And now we find the substitution of items for items that have already been struck out by the Committee. With regard to the Bill itself, it is one which will cause the colony to be laughed at. It has a clause containing a prohibition of borrowing, or, rather, an undertaking not to borrow for three years and a half. And, as regards the measure itself, it provides for a loan which is unnecessarily large, and which, as I said yesterday, I do not oppose more actively because I understood the honourable gentleman did not propose to raise it before October next. I am unwilling to delay the House at this stage, but I may say a more ridiculous clause could not have been put in any Act than the one which refers to the borrowing. Look at the position. Here is a clause which requires that every prospectus and every newspaper-advertisement shall have put in it that the Government will only borrow for the next three years under the Westport Harbour Act, the Greymouth Harbour Act, "The Public Revenues Act, 1887," and "The North Island Main Trunk Railway Loan Act, 1884." Why, Sir, what ordinary investor would invest with such an avalanche of loans apparently in contemplation? And the ordinary small investor throughout the country who wants to invest in New Zealand securities will shun doing so. I am afraid, Sir, there is not a House.

The House was called, and a quorum attended.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Sir, I say that it will make small investors shun doing so. I am afraid I must call your attention to the House again: Ministers are leaving the House.

The House was called again, and a quorum attended.

Sir J. VOGEL.—It is very disorderly conduct, it seems to me, that Ministers of the Crown should be going in and out of the doors, disturbing people who are naturally nervous. I may say, in repeating these remarks, that I do so because we are not reported in Committee, and it is essential, therefore, that I should put the matter before the House in order to be reported. I object, therefore, to the absurdity of putting in a clause, and causing it to appear in the prospectus and in the advertisements, which will deter a vast number of small investors from applying for the loan. Next, I object to the clause because it would be quite sufficient for the Government to intimate, as has been done twice before—indeed, several times before—that the Government did not intend to borrow: once it was put down at three years, another time for three years, and another time for one year; and an intimation to the banks was sufficient, or a paragraph in the City Article of the Times. Putting the notice in the way proposed would have such a grotesque appearance, and be so evidently an admission that the colony cannot trust itself, that it would be exceedingly injurious, besides being treated as a great joke. Therefore it is that I object to this clause going in. And it is worded in such a manner that it shows it is done by a 'prentice-hand, and that it is a mere concession of the Government to the fears of its own supporters that the Government is not likely to be true to the pledges it has given regarding borrowing.

Why, Sir, if the Government were to look on this matter from a point of view which would be consistent with their own self-respect, they would say to their followers, "We have told you what our proposals are; and our word is as good as our bond. Why ask us to put this into the Act? Is it not sufficient that we have said in the Financial Statement or the Public Works Statement that it is our intention?" I do not wish to detain the House any longer, and I shall not oppose the third reading of the Bill, because the House has already expressed its opinion in favour of it.

Bill read a third time.

On the question, That the title be agreed to, Mr. HUTCHISON said,—The words "Immigration and for" are now utterly unnecessary, and I move the excision of those words, as the purposes of the Bill as indicated in the first instance have been altered.

Major ATKINSON.—I am not prepared to agree to that. The House may yet decide that the £70,000 shall be applied to the purposes of immigration.

Mr. HUTCHISON.—Under this Act?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes. The money will be borrowed, and, I hope, applied to that purpose. The short title is "The New Zealand Loan Act." I cannot accept the amendment, for these reasons.

Sir J. VOGEL.—If the alteration proposed is made, will it be competent for me to move an addition to the title?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Provided it conform with the title.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The title should describe the purpose of the Bill, and it is not right that this title should stand as it does without the addition of the words "and for the purpose of stopping Future Borrowing." The Bill has become a Loan Bill and also a Bill for the purpose of stopping further borrowing, and I think, Sir, that should be a part of the title. May I move that, after this is settled?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think so.

The House divided on the question, "That the words be retained."

Amendment negatived.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I wish to point out to honourable members that it has become a distinctive feature of the Bill to stop further borrowing; and I think it would therefore be right to add to the title the words "and for stopping Borrowing in Future." I would propose to those honourable gentlemen who are so eager to advertise to the world that general amount of virtue and abstinence in which the colony has indulged that they should support this addition.

Amendment not seconded.

Sir G. GREY.—I could not quite agree with the honourable member for Christchurch North, because the words proposed would be foreign to the whole scope and title of the Bill. It is quite clear that we are about to put into the title something not contemplated by the Bill. Although immigration is not permitted by the wording of the Bill, you put that into the title. The title expresses that which the Bill does not provide. It is quite clear that there is a contradiction in terms. It would be best to leave that out, because it would convey a false impression.

Title agreed to.

SUPPLY.

A message was received from the Governor, transmitting the supplementary estimates, which were ordered to be referred to the Committee of Supply.

On the question, That Mr. Speaker do leave the chair, in order that the House may resolve itself into Committee of Supply,

Sir J. VOGEL said,—I wish only to make a very brief reference to the supplementary estimates. I must say I think a great injustice has been done to honourable members who have gone away, who were not aware that such proposals as these would be brought down. The first item I take is, "Contribution in aid of the Imperial Institute, £1,000." I presume that is on account of the £1,000 a year for ten years. The late Government asked the Agent-General whether it would be acceptable to those who have charge of the Imperial Institute that the colony should make a contribution in that way, supposing Parliament were inclined to agree to it. I say, then, that this matter should have been brought down by resolution, and the views of Parliament taken upon it; and not that, on the night when it is proposed to prorogue, this item of £1,000 should be brought down, without the question having been raised whether the colony is or is not inclined to make the contribution. I shall vote for the amount, because I believe in the purpose for which it is intended; but I say neither the House nor the country will be satisfied with the manner in which this vote is brought forward. Then, with regard to the votes generally, I find that they are simply and virtually, and effectively, an entire reversal of the alleged savings which the Government were to make in the several departments. Take, for example, the Land Department. We were told that the Government would make a saving of £15,000; and their plea of retrenchment was that they would make that saving in three months, and that it would represent £60,000 of the saving of £300,000 which they were to make in the next year: but now we find that this £15,000 is counteracted by a vote for £17,800. Then I take the four departments of Justice, Mines, Defence, and Lands, and I find that, although the Government stated their intention of making a saving of £71,000 for the remainder of this year, and on these four items an amount of £32,200, they now come down and ask for additional estimates to the extent of £32,976 on those items. It shows that, as I have said all along, their retrenchment is a sham. Take the Mines Department, in which they were to make a saving of £8,000, and yet now they come down and ask for £4,660 additional. I dare say the honourable gentlemen will say they propose to make reductions in one item and these increases in another; but they know that all through the public service, year after year, there are large savings on the votes taken by classes, and that to add this £4,660 and say at the same time that they are saving £8,000 is simply an absurdity. Now, Sir, we were led to believe that £32,200 was the saving this year in Justice, Mines, Defence, and Land Fund; and that was to be the basis of four times the amount of saving next year. Well, the supplementary estimates come down and propose £700 more than the alleged savings. I cannot understand what is the meaning of proposing £20,000 for the Wellington Post Office. In the first instance, there is some dodge about it. Supposing a thousand men were put upon the works, it would be impossible to spend £20,000 before the 31st of March next. I suspect that it is meant to put the whole of this £20,000 as a deficiency of the year, so as to swell the deficiency. If they can spend a couple of thousand before the 31st of March it is as much as can be done. What I want to know is, how are they going to contrive to spend £20,000? Is the dial to be set round with diamonds, and costly sculpture to be added to the building? All I know is that, with additional partition-walls from east to west and north to south, so as to strengthen the building to be proof against anything in the shape of an ordinary calamity, the amount we were told would be required would be something like £18,000. What is the other £7,000 required for? Perhaps before I go on the honourable gentleman will tell me. Is it proposed to have a clock-tower?

Major ATKINSON.—I would prefer the honourable gentleman to go on before answering him.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Does he propose to construct the tower at once, or does he not? If he means to have a clock-tower, of course that will account for some few thousands extra. If the clock-tower is not to be erected, as we were informed, £13,000 would be sufficient for the main building itself; and, supposing the clock-tower is to be erected, £3,000 additional would be required. How is it that £20,000 is put down, unless it is proposed to introduce into the building some rare work of art?—and we are not in a position to do anything of the kind at the present time.

Sir J. Vogel

The late Government proposed that the tower should not be erected now, but that the building should be constructed in such a manner as to allow the tower to be erected at a future time, when the colony had funds at its disposal for beautifying the architecture of the chief cities of the colony; but that in the meantime sufficient authority should be taken to build the post-office without the expensive addition of a tower. As I am informed, even with a tower £20,000 was not the amount that would be required.

Major ATKINSON.—I do not propose to follow the honourable gentleman. I think the exhibition to-night is something childish, and the honourable gentleman has wasted hour after hour in the merest talk: not with reference to business at all, but joking as to titles. That has been going on for some time.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The honourable gentleman is referring to a former debate.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think he is.

Sir J. VOGEL.—He is referring to a former debate, and you, Sir, have not allowed me to refer to a former debate.

Major ATKINSON.—I want to tell the Committee about one or two of these items. The honourable gentleman was very great in regard to defence. I will tell the Committee how it was we were out to this amount as to defence, and then honourable members will see the difference. These items have come in without our knowledge. We knew nothing about them when we made our Statement. The late Government took £5,000 for ammunition, and they spent £13,000; and now we have got to put it upon the estimates, and have got to stand the accusations which the honourable gentleman has hurled against us. Let me read two or three of these items. There is an amount here for Remington rifles: there was no authority for ordering these at all. They have come, and we have to pay for them. Then, we have just discovered an amount due for fifteen hundred Snider rifles, £2,000. Those and other items make up a total of £8,000 over and above the vote that we knew nothing at all about. That is the sort of thing the honourable gentleman has been doing with his Government. Almost every vote is run over, without the slightest authority of the House. All these things will be dealt with in Committee. I wish to say a word about the Imperial Institute. I hope the Committee will exercise its discretion in voting the amount set down for the Institute or not. I was doubtful about putting it on. The late Government had apparently determined to pay £1,000 a year for ten years. The arrangements of the late Government seemed to make it necessary that this should be submitted to the House in some form. Honourable gentlemen know it was impossible to deal with this payment. We had no opportunity of dealing with it. We have done more in the short time this session than we have done in any Parliament before; but we felt it right to give the Committee an opportunity of voting the amount if it thought it desirable to do so. I am not prepared, with the knowledge

I possess, to recommend it. I do not say I may not propose it next year.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Strike it off now, and take the sense of the House next year upon it.

Major ATKINSON.—I do not want the honourable gentleman's advice. His friendliness is nothing but a pretence—nothing but a wasting of time. A very large number of honourable members now cannot spend Christmas at home with their families. It is all very well with the honourable gentleman, who is comfortably at home in Wellington: but the honourable gentleman's action to-night has been, not to do the business of the country, but to waste time.

CLASS I.—COLONIAL SECRETARY'S DEPARTMENT.

Colonial Secretary, £7,723.

Sir J. VOGEL asked what was the arrangement about the Melbourne Centennial Exhibition.

Major ATKINSON said the Government intended to apply for the space offered, and had already appointed a Commission for the Exhibition, and intended to get up as good a show as possible for New Zealand. The amount, £3,500, was estimated to cover the whole cost, as far as could be judged. The Government had requested Sir James Hector to make a report on the subject, which he had done. They were informed the cost would be about £3,000; but they had put on an extra £500, and expected that would be the outside sum.

Mr. MONK moved, That the item "Contribution in aid of the Imperial Institute, £1,000," be struck out, as the Premier had said it was not necessary to pass this session.

Mr. BRUCE asked for an explanation of the item, "Compensation to Dr. Hacon, late Superintendent, Sunnyside Asylum, for loss of office, £338." There was a rumour that he had left through insubordination, and, if so, it was hardly right he should get this amount; and, if it was not true, the Minister should contradict it. It was stated that the insubordination was refusal to obey the instructions of Dr. Macgregor.

Mr. HISLOP believed there was some truth in the rumour that Dr. Hacon had disobeyed the instructions of Dr. Macgregor; but the circumstances were somewhat peculiar. Dr. Hacon was appointed to the Christchurch Asylum, and it was not very definitely understood as to whether he could or could not be removed from such a position. It was proposed that he should be transferred to Wellington, but he preferred leaving the service to doing so. It was determined by the late Government to put this item on the estimates; and the present Government, not having had sufficient time to consider the subject, yet thought a prima facie case existed, and so proposed the item in the meantime, and would look further into the question.

Mr. BRUCE understood from the Minister's explanation that it was not definitely decided to pay this compensation.

Dr. NEWMAN thought the explanation hardly gave the exact circumstances of the case. Exchanges were being made in the service, and it was proposed that Dr. Hacon should go where he would get £150 a year less salary, or he had the option of retiring. He thought Dr. Hacon had been exceedingly badly treated, and, as the late Government had put the item on the estimates, and it was recommended by Dr. Macgregor, it should be passed, and the compensation should be paid, as it was not a case of mere insubordination.

Mr. BRUCE said there was an item, "A. T. Campbell, compensation for land taken at Wanganui, £80." That case came last year before the Waste Lands Committee, of which he was a member. He did not recollect the facts sufficiently to go into the details of the case; but he recollected that the Committee unanimously recommended that Mr. Campbell should get £200. Why was he to get only £80?

Mr. HISLOP said Mr. Campbell had caused to be sold, under a provincial ordinance, a piece of land adjoining his own which belonged to an absentee, and in respect of which he was unable to get a fencing contribution. Mr. Campbell himself bought a piece of the land for £87. Afterwards it was ascertained that the owner had died in England and left the property to another person, under will. The representative of this person brought an action against Mr. Campbell to eject him from the property; but the parties afterwards came to some arrangement, and the property was resold to Mr. Campbell. The latter did not fight the case, because it was doubtful whether the ordinance under which the property was sold really gave the power which it was intended to give. It thus became a question whether the colony ought to compensate Mr. Campbell, for, though he had set the law in motion himself, a doubtful title had been given him by the Government under the ordinance. Mr. Campbell had chosen to take title under this ordinance, and, although he (Mr. Hislop) had given very careful consideration to the Committee's report, he did not think it right that £200 should be granted, because that would be equal to guaranteeing that the colony should give the full present value of land as to which a possible error had been made by Government officials owing to ambiguous legislation; but, as Mr. Campbell had afterwards paid for the property on the second sale, and had paid £77 for it previously, he might fairly be refunded that sum perhaps. The Committee thought Mr. Campbell ought to get the full present value of the property; but if such a principle were admitted it would probably lead to other such demands on the Treasury on account of errors of officials and doubtful legislation: it would be equal to the Government giving a guarantee against errors of this kind. He thought, therefore, the colony was only entitled to pay to Mr. Campbell the amount he paid into the Colonial Treasury in the first instance on account of the land when the owner could not be found.

Mr. BRUCE was glad to hear the Minister had given so much consideration to the question; but, at the same time, he might remark that Mr. Campbell's petition was presented by the late member for Waitotara, Mr. Bryce, who appeared in support of it, and Mr. Ballance, then Minister of Lands, was on the Committee, and fully concurred in the unanimous recommendation of the Committee that Mr. Campbell should get the £200. Some thought he was entitled to even more. Though he (Mr. Bruce) had not a clear recollection of all the facts, he did not think the Colonial Secretary had made a quite accurate statement of the circumstances of the case. However, he would not dwell on the matter.

Mr. HISLOP said no injustice would be done to any one by passing this amount. The decision of the Committee was very much founded on the belief that Mr. Davy had wrongly issued a Crown grant to the original owner of the land; but, on inquiry, he (Mr. Hislop) had found that that officer had only done what he ought to have done; and, instead of Mr. Campbell's title being weak on account of anything done by the department, it was weak on account of the proceedings originally taken by himself for his own protection.

Sir J. VOGEL said there was an item, "Expenses of Waitotara and Eastern Maori election petitions, £143." How was that divided between the two cases?

Mr. HISLOP said the amount for the Eastern Maori one, which was only an estimate, was about £55; but in the other case the amount was £84 14s. 4d., made up as follows: For travelling allowance and expenses—Chief Justice, £26 5s.; Justice Williams, £26 5s.; Deputy Registrar, £12 1s.; Secretary to Chief Justice, £10 1s. 8d.; Secretary to Justice Williams, £10 1s. 8d.

Sir J. VOGEL inquired whether there was a sum to be put on for the two special trains run to collect evidence, or whether that would be charged against the Public Works Fund.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that no special trains were run at all.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES asked if the country would always have to pay expenses in connection with the hearing of election petitions.

Major ATKINSON replied Yes.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES thought it a very pernicious system.

Sir J. VOGEL asked if the Premier would undertake to submit the item "Imperial Institute, £1,000," next year.

Major ATKINSON replied that he would not pledge himself. He had not yet mastered the subject. If on inquiry Ministers thought it should be granted they would place the sum on the estimates.

Sir J. VOGEL understood, then, that they were not to regard their method of dealing with the question that night as a test question.

Major ATKINSON.—No.

Item, £1,000, struck out.

Vote, as reduced, £6,723, agreed to.

CLASS II.—COLONIAL TREASURER.
Miscellaneous, £3,065.

Dr. NEWMAN called attention to the item, "Exchange and commission, additional, £3,000," and said he thought that this work was done in a very expensive manner, and that it was time the Premier looked into it to see if the work could not be done more cheaply. He thought any private firm with a similar amount of business to offer would get it done on more favourable terms.

Major ATKINSON said he would look into the matter; but he might say the colony now got its work done at less than market rates.

Vote, £3,065, agreed to.

Vote, School for deaf-mutes, £92, agreed to.

CLASS IX.—MINISTER FOR NATIVE AFFAIRS.
Miscellaneous, £200.

In reply to Mr. R. H. J. REEVES,

Mr. MITCHELSON said that this was a vote to Mr. G. M. Park, who entered the service of the Telegraph Department in 1869, and was stationed at Taupo during the time of the Te Kooti outbreak, and rendered valuable service to the colony during that time by supplying military officers in the district with information, which he gathered at considerable expense to himself. Sir Donald McLean recognised the value of his services, and promised that they should be rewarded; but nothing was done. Mr. Park presented several petitions, and in 1886 the Committee strongly recommended his claim. The late Government proposed to put a sum on the supplementary estimates; but, owing to the occurrences of last session, no such estimates were brought down. After inquiry and consultation with the Chairman of the Public Petitions Committee that dealt with the question last session, the Government had put this sum on, believing that it would settle the claim equitably.

Vote, £200, agreed to.

CLASS X.—MINISTER OF MINES.
Miscellaneous, £4,600.

Mr. MONK asked for an explanation of what seemed a large item.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said that half of it was for a reward for goldfield discoveries. The vote seemed large, but he did not think it would be expended.

Mr. MONK asked what was the use of putting on votes for such a purpose when they were not likely to be expended.

Major ATKINSON said it did not much matter whether the money was voted or not. He was inclined to think it was not of much use to put such votes on the estimates.

Vote, £4,600, agreed to.

CLASS XI.—WORKING RAILWAYS DEPARTMENT.
Working railways, £1,117.

Dr. NEWMAN said there was an amount set down for compensation for injuries, and for compassionate allowances to widows, and he thought some system or plan should be adopted with regard to these. Those who had influence might get a great deal, while those without it might receive very little. The Minister would do good work if he would look into this matter. He thought also that such work as crossing-keeping should be given to men who had received injuries in the public service.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that there was a standard for compassionate allowances. If a man in the department lost his life through an accident, his widow received six months' pay. He quite agreed with the other suggestion, and had no doubt that the Railway Commissioners, when appointed, would take the matter into consideration.

Mr. GOLDIE asked for what the gratuities were given—if they were for long service.

Mr. MITCHELSON explained that they were for long services. In one case a man who had been in the service eighteen years, on being discharged because of his inability through age, received twelve months' pay, and another man who had been twenty-two years in the service received a similar allowance.

CLASS XII.—MINISTER FOR PUBLIC WORKS.

Public Buildings—Restoration of General Post Office, Wellington, £20,000.

Sir J. VOGEL would like an explanation of this vote. Was it intended to put up a tower on the post-office?

Mr. MITCHELSON had not had time to consider the question of a tower, but had come to the conclusion that the specifications that had been prepared were not suitable. In fact, he thought the building, if re-erected in accordance with them, would be unsafe.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON wished to know why there was an increase on the estimated cost, which was £13,500.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that money would have to be provided for the internal fittings of the building.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES thought they might be sure the Minister would not spend more than was required. He thought it very necessary that the building should be erected.

Sir J. VOGEL moved, That the vote be reduced by £6,500. He did not know why more than that should be required, and did not think that more should be voted than was wanted. He was decidedly adverse to putting up a clock-tower, as the money could be saved at a time when, throughout the country, there was a want of small buildings for public purposes. It would be entirely impossible before next session to supply the internal fittings, and the votes should be taken separately. He knew from information that came before him before he left office that the building could be restored for £13,500.

Mr. GUINNESS supported the amendment. While public offices were required throughout the colony it seemed to him they were not in a position to spend money on a clock-tower: that should be deferred until they could afford to do liberal justice all round.

Mr. PEACOCK wished to know if the Minister intended to call for tenders for the fittings as well as for the restoration of the building.

Mr. MITCHELSON did not intend to call for tenders for both the building and the fittings at the same time. He hoped the vote would be left as it stood, and he would assure honourable members that no greater expense than was absolutely necessary would be incurred.

The Committee divided on the question, "That the vote be reduced by £6,500."

Amendment negatived.

Sir J. VOGEL said the retrenchment sham had burst, and they now knew that it was nothing more than an instrument for party purposes. How the Government could reconcile to themselves to talk of cutting down salaries in all directions, and refuse to carry on works of absolute necessity, on the plea that there was no money, and at the same time bring down such an extravagant vote as this, was past his understanding. If he were a younger and a stronger man he would stone-wall this vote for twenty-four hours, until honourable members could be brought back, as he felt sure they would vote against it. As, however, opposition appeared to be ineffective, he would ask the honourable member in charge of the department, while asking for authority for this amount in the Appropriation Act, to put in a provision that not more than £2,000 should be expended during the three months to the 31st March.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it was his intention to have a provision to that effect inserted in the Appropriation Act.

Vote, £20,000, agreed to.

CLASS XIII.—MINISTER OF DEFENCE.

Defence, £7,884.

Sir J. VOGEL said the Premier had made a charge against the late Minister of Defence of ordering rifles from Home without leaving any record in the office. He (Sir J. Vogel) was sorry that his late colleague was prevented, through illness, from being present; but he imagined it was not the fault of that honourable gentleman, but of some officer of the department, that a sufficient record was not placed before the new Ministry. The complaint was, that the Minister, when he tried to estimate the requirements of the year, was not informed of these rifles and arms which had unexpectedly arrived; but he would ask the Committee to suspend its judgment until it could hear what Mr. Ballance had to say in reply. Unfortunately that gentleman was at present too ill to be troubled by asking for information on the subject. This showed, however, that the so-called reductions only amounted to the ordinary saving between the amounts voted and those actually expended.

Mr. FERGUS said that, as a matter of fact, the appropriation last year was £5,000 and the expenditure £13,000.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES thought the amount of £50 put down for repairs to the graves at Te Awamutu ought to be at least £100; and also that the compassionate allowance to the widow of the late Colonel Lyon was very small, and ought to be £500 instead of £100.

Mr. GOLDIE said that Colonel Lyon got £900 the year before he died, and he (Mr. Goldie) thought the amount now given to his widow was quite sufficient.

Major JACKSON said Colonel Lyon got two years' pay on retiring, which he was entitled to, and he had worked for two years at £50 a year, and had done better service than those who were receiving far larger salaries. He had done good service in times past to the country, and had never spared himself; and it was only a nice tribute to his memory to give this small amount to his widow.

Vote, £7,884, agreed to.

LAND FUND ACCOUNT.

CLASS XIV.

Minister of Lands, £17,900.

Mr. MONK would like to know how it was there was so much under-estimated in regard to salaries as £15,000.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said there had been a mistake made in not looking into the figures more carefully. One or two of the items covered the amount voted on the general estimates plus the amount that was required in excess. He would ask the Committee to reduce the vote by £5,000, and he begged to move a motion to that effect.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES would like to know how it was that £1,000 was under-estimated for expenses under the Thermal Springs Act.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said on the general estimates £500 was voted. It was found that the service at the close of the year would require a total expenditure of nearly £1,000.

Sir J. VOGEL said this was one of the alleged savings which he spoke of during the session as having no other basis than the good intentions of the Minister in charge—merely the sanguine expectations of what new Ministers would do when, as they said, they turned that big building upside-down. Instead of a saving of £15,000, which was to form the basis of £60,000 saving next year, honourable members found there was a demand for £17,800 on the supplementary estimates.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the proposed savings were based on a conclusion that the reductions would take place on the 1st of January, and these estimates now were based on the belief that the expenditure must go on till pretty near the end of the financial year. The retrenchment proposed also included the abolition of the Land Boards and the dispensing with the services of officers who would have gone with the Land Boards.

Mr. MONK asked if he was to conclude that the reductions or savings were not likely to eventuate.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the whole of them could not eventuate. The Government were continually springing surprises of expenditure that were never thought of.

Motion to reduce the vote by £5,000 agreed to.

Vote, as reduced, £12,800, agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS FUND.—PART I.

CLASS II.

Public Works Department, £532.

Mr. MONK inquired how it was there was such a large amount as £532 as compensation to Mr. W. Dartnall for loss of office.

Mr. MITCHELSON explained that this gentleman had been for many years Engineer in Southland, and had been in the service of the Government since 1874; and the sum set down was the sum he was entitled to receive for loss of office, according to the minute of the late Government. The present Government had a doubt whether officers in the Public Works Department were really entitled to compensation, as the works upon which they were engaged were generally of a temporary character; but they found a minute of the late Public Works Minister recommending the payment of this amount to Mr. Dartnall, and this minute had received the approval of the late Cabinet. It was brought before the present Cabinet; and, although they placed this amount on the estimates, the Government did not intend to pay it until they had considered the question as to whether Mr. Dartnall was legally entitled to receive this sum.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES reminded honourable members that Mr. Dartnall had been in the provincial service before he joined the General Government service.

Vote, £532, agreed to.

PUBLIC TRUST OFFICE ACCOUNT.

Public Trust Office, £5,330.

Mr. HUTCHISON said the evidence taken on a petition before the Native Affairs Committee showed there was very great dissatisfaction among those most directly interested in the management of the leaseholds under the West Coast Settlement Reserves Act. There was great complaint as to the way the work of collecting and distributing the rents had been performed. There was great dissatisfaction now among the Natives interested in these leases, and, as there would be much additional work under the Act just passed, he hoped the Colonial Treasurer would make inquiry, with a view to efficiency being secured.

Major ATKINSON said he would take an opportunity of looking into the matter.

Sir J. VOGEL said he had come to the conclusion—although the custom had existed while he was in office—that charging against departments like the Public Trust Office and the Government Insurance Office the cost of their own audit was not a good system, because it made the audit officer of either of those departments a mere member of that department, which meant a loss of independence on the part of those responsible for the audit. The official was under the head of his own department, and should not have to look to another department on such a question as a rise of salary. Of course the object was to show the cost of the Audit Department to be as small as possible; but it was a merely fictitious way of showing the cost of the Audit Department. The Audit Department was sufficiently valuable in itself to bear the necessary cost. He thought the cost of audit of the Public Trust Office and the Government Insurance Office should be charged along with the rest of the Audit Department, and that the audit of both should be made quite independent. He thought it was a vicious principle to have officers in the immediate pay of the departments they were auditing.

Major ATKINSON said he should be glad to consider the matter.

On the resolutions being reported, Mr. PEACOCK asked whether the Premier was prepared to give effect to the suggestion he (Mr. Peacock) had made in a motion he had put on the Order Paper, but which had not been reached, setting forth that rewards should be offered on certain conditions for the discovery of new goldfields.

Major ATKINSON said he would give effect to that suggestion of the honourable gentleman's.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Before you put the question that the resolutions be agreed to, Sir, I wish to state, lest my remarks in Committee of Supply were not taken down, that I very much regret that the amount of £20,000 voted for the Wellington Post-office was passed. I am of opinion that had there been a fuller House it would not have been passed; and I should have felt myself justified in delaying its passage, only that I have not physical strength to do so by those means which are popularly termed "stonewalling." Similarly so in reference to the charge of wasting time made against me by the Premier earlier this evening: I should have felt myself justified in adopting a like course, if I had been strong enough, with regard to the clause introduced into the Loan Bill after the departure of so large a number of members. But, Sir, I am of opinion that the loan—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must remind the honourable member that the Loan Bill is passed, and, being passed, he cannot debate it.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I believe, on this question I can speak to anything.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Not to a past debate. Past debates are not allowed to be referred to.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I can move that the votes be recommitted.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Not the Loan Bill. The Loan Bill is passed, and disposed of. You can move that these resolutions be recommitted, of course, but not the Loan Bill.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Well, Sir, I must adopt once more those means by which one can express his meaning at greater length. I was about to say that the House has decided by its votes not to continue immigration—not to borrow for the purpose of immigration; and it will be misleading should we suppose that the votes which we have now passed, which comprise the amount of £10,000 for immigration, were other than an amount to meet engagements already contracted for. As regards future immigration, the Government have no authority from the House to enter into any arrangement beyond the present liabilities. I believe, Sir, that, were a well-considered scheme brought before the House, it might be otherwise. I shall not prolong my remarks, but only wish to place these remarks on record in Hansard.

Resolutions agreed to.

SAN FRANCISCO MAIL SERVICE.

Major ATKINSON.—I now, with the leave of the House, will move a resolution with regard to the San Francisco mail service. The Government had originally intended to ask the House for authority to enter into negotiations for a further contract; but, looking at the responsibility of getting a fair time for its consideration during the present session, they have now come to the conclusion that it would be better to ask the House to grant authority to renew the present service for one year with the present contractors. By that means we shall have plenty of time for the discussion of this question during next session, and the two contracts will expire within a month of each other. They will both expire in the same year—one in November and the other in December—when we shall, I hope, be able to enter into fresh arrangements for both these services. I do not propose to make a speech upon the subject, but I will move this resolution: That, in view of the contract for the San Francisco mail service terminating in November next year, and of the impossibility of giving the question of renewal full consideration this session, the Government be authorised to arrange with the present contractors for an extension of the contract for twelve months, and to submit to the House next session definite proposals for the continuance of the service.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I should like to ask the honourable gentleman, does he mean to give the Government unlimited power as to the expense, or does he mean that it should be done on the same terms as at present?

Major ATKINSON.—On the same terms as at present.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Nor does it say that it shall be with the concurrence of the New South Wales Government. But if the honourable gentleman assures us that this is the intention of merely continuing the contract on the same terms as at present, of course we shall accept the assurance. But I wish to say this: that I think this is a course which the honourable gentleman has been forced into not because of there not being time, but because it is the only course that is really open to him. But he lost sight of a matter which I may point out to him—that the key to the whole position is this: Whether the English Government are willing to concede the carriage of mails between San Francisco and England, and England and San Francisco, as they hitherto have done; and the communications with the Agent-General on the subject for many months past are decidedly discouraging in this respect. The position is one of a very critical and dangerous nature. The Canadian Government is pressing the English Government very strongly to adopt and subsidise the route between Canada and the Australian Colonies, and it is also pressing upon the Australian Colonies to encourage such a route. Now, I believe, though I am not sure, that the English Government, after a good deal of consideration, is assisting the Canadian Government with regard to subsidising the line to Japan or China, but it has shown no disposition to subsidise or help to subsidise the line to Australia. On the other hand the Canadian Government will probably look upon it as such an unfriendly thing on the part of the English Government to help the service by San Francisco to the Australasian Colonies that I am afraid it is very doubtful if the English Government will be persuaded to continue the arrangement after November next. I point out this difficulty to the honourable gentleman because, if he considers himself bound by the assurance he has given that he will not pay more for the service than he is paying now, his first point will be to ascertain whether the English Government will continue to carry the mails after twelve months. I communicated with the Agent-General, asking him to arrange, if possible, for carrying the mails between England and San Francisco, and San Francisco and England, for three years; but he gave me no encouragement to suppose that it would be done. I think it is wise, therefore, that the Government should try to extend the time now for one year. I do not believe the English Government would object to that, although I do not feel at all sure upon the subject, and I cannot help thinking that at the expiration of that year there is very little chance of the English Government assisting a line so opposed to the wishes of Canada. Therefore the colony will then have to face the question of carrying the mails between England and San Francisco, and San Francisco and England, at possibly considerably increased expense. In my opinion the permanent continuance of the San Francisco service really depends upon the United States Legislature. It depends upon their reducing the duty on wool. If such a course were adopted it would lead to a large trade between the Australian Colonies and the United States. But in the absence of such an inducement there would be a great obstacle to continuing the San Francisco service, and overlooking the Canadian line. There is another question to be borne in mind, and that is the completion of the Panama Canal. If it should be the case that the duty on Australian wool is reduced, in my opinion the colonies would be glad to obtain a good and perhaps expensive service with San Francisco. If such a change does not take place I am not hopeful that an arrangement can be made for continuing the San Francisco service beyond the year's extension now asked for, and I am not even confident that we shall be able to get that year's extension.

Major ATKINSON.—The subjects to which the honourable gentleman has referred have not escaped my attention, and I should not have thought that the honourable gentleman could have conceived it possible that I had not looked into my business. I have been in communication with Canada on the subject, and also with the authorities at Home, and there is some reason, I believe, for hoping that the Imperial Government will extend the service. That point is not settled yet, but I think it is possible they will be disposed to continue the arrangement, at all events for one year. As I have mentioned, it is quite possible that we may have to give up this route; but I do not want to go into these matters now, when nobody is listening, and it is only taking up time to no purpose. It is quite clear that we cannot have full information as to what we can do by way of Canada or by San Francisco, or even, possibly, by the more southern route; and, of course, it depends very much upon Sydney. The American Government are ready to advance their contribution by £30,000. Of course that is not nearly sufficient. The Government intend to give full information to the House next session on the subject, and in the meantime I hope we shall be able to extend the service for another year.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I did not attribute any want of attention to the honourable gentleman; I simply said the matter might have escaped his attention.

Resolution agreed to.

MASTERTON-MANGAMAHOE BLOCK.

Mr. BEETHAM said it had been reported in the Wairarapa District and Woodville that the Government intended to resume possession of the Masterton-Mangamahoe Special-settlement Block. He wished to ask the Minister of Lands if such was the case.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON replied that the Government had no such intention; but there had been some difficulty with regard to payment on the part of the selectors. At present only a portion of the money for the rural lands had been paid, but none with regard to the township.

REEFTON TOWN-SECTIONS.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES asked the Minister of Lands, if he can devise some means by which the town-sections unsold in the Town of Reefton may be disposed of, and the proceeds of sale placed in a suspense account, pending final settlement of contract between the Midland Railway Company and the Government? He understood that Mr. Alan Scott, the colonial manager of the company, was quite ready to agree to the course suggested, and such a course would give general satisfaction if by some means or other it could be adopted. He believed there were several people who had expended considerable sums in improving land in that neighbourhood; but the whole of the land was locked up at the present time, and, though in some cases people were living on sections, the county authorities could not rate them, on account of the land not having been made freehold. He hoped the Minister would be able to do something in the matter, which was one of very considerable local importance. Only that morning he had received a letter from a settler at Tadmor in which the writer said,—

"We very much feel the want of being able to get a title to land in this district. Cannot some arrangement be made similar to that suggested by you, and let the people have the land to settle on, instead of being, as it is, useless to the railway company and the colony?"

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the Government could not interfere at the present time, because the land was within the authorised area, and the negotiations with the company were not yet complete. The Government had taken power, however, under the resolutions which had been passed by the House, to deal with the lands within the company's area on the company's assent being obtained, and when the present negotiations were completed probably the honourable gentleman's suggestion would be given effect to. In the meantime, however, nothing could be done.

BAY OF PLENTY NATIVES.

Mr. CARROLL asked the Government if they would during the recess take into consideration the position of the Natives in the Bay of Plenty rendered landless, as it were, by the late eruptions. A number of them were in a very poor state, and their case required immediate consideration. He had recently been there himself, and he knew the state they were in. It was most desirable that some measure of relief should be adopted. There were large blocks of Crown land in the district that were not worth anything to Europeans for the purposes of settlement, but which would be very beneficial to the Natives if the Government could see their way to provide for these poor people by allowing them to have some of those lands. He was sorry the Native Minister was not present, and would ask the question of the Premier.

Major ATKINSON said the Government would look into the matter. He was sure the honourable gentleman would not expect him to give a pledge, but he should be very glad to inquire into the matter and consider it, and if he could do anything properly to afford relief he should be very glad to do it.

GREYMOUTH HARBOUR.

Mr. GUINNESS.—I understand it is not the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this session with regard to dissolving the Greymouth Harbour Board; but I will ask the Premier whether, under section 9 of the Greymouth Harbour Act, the Government are prepared to get a resolution passed sanctioning the guarantee of a further loan of £50,000, that being the balance of the amount authorised by Act to be borrowed. I know what information the Premier has given me privately, but, in the interests of my constituents, knowing that this matter is agitating the public mind, I wish the Premier to publicly state whether the Government intend to propose such a resolution, or what course they intend to adopt.

Major ATKINSON.—We were inclined to introduce a Bill, according to the recommendation of the Committee which sat on the Westport Harbour, to take over that harbour at once, and we should have proposed in the same Bill that the Government should take power to inquire into the working of the Greymouth Harbour, with a view, if necessary, of taking that over also; but, as the honourable gentleman is aware from the information I have given him, the Government does not think there is time to consider those measures this session, but the Government will make inquiry and take such action as may be necessary. With reference to money for carrying out the work, the Government are of opinion that the work should be pushed on with vigour, for it is a most important work. The Government do not propose to pass any resolution of the sort mentioned in the Acts, but it is their intention to find the necessary moneys on the security of debentures they hold, pending the decision of Parliament upon the whole question next session.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

This Bill was introduced, and read a first time.

On the question, That the Bill be read a second time,

Mr. TAIPUA said,—Sir, I only desire to ask the Government if they will endeavour to circulate their proposed Native Land Bills as soon as possible during the recess, so that the Maoris may have the opportunity of studying them. I intend to visit my constituents, and should like to consult with them.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—It is the intention of the Government to circulate the Native Land Bills as soon as they are prepared. The Government will during the recess take every possible care to make the Bills acceptable to both races, and as soon as they are prepared they will be circulated amongst the Maori chiefs.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without entering my protest against the Government not having taken into consideration the desirability of putting money on the estimates for the greater development of the gold-mining industry in New Zealand, and more particularly for the construction of roads and for the completion of bridges on the main line of road from Nelson to Westport and Reefton. It is well known that that district has been for years one of the most important gold-producing parts of the whole colony, and I can safely say that no part of the colony has been more neglected in the matter of roads and bridges than that has been. Any honourable gentlemen who take an interest in the development of mining resources must know that, as far as the West Coast is concerned, it can safely be said that our district is par excellence the most prosperous in the whole of the colony; and what we do want is a little more encouragement and more money spent amongst us for the purpose of fostering mining industries. I do not blame the Government on this occasion, because, as honourable members are aware, it has not very much money to give. But I think there might have been an attempt made to place that part of the colony which I represent in a rather better position in regard to public works. I find, on looking over the estimates, that we have hardly a single shilling put down for our district. I trust that during the recess the Minister of Lands and Mines, and also the Minister for Public Works, if they can find it convenient to do so, will visit our district. For I am certain, if they do, they will return to Wellington so impressed with the importance of the district that they will come before the House to conscientiously ask for a considerable sum of money to be devoted in opening up the land, and possibly in aiding the industries, on the West Coast. The Government, as I said before, I am well aware, have not very much money to spare. They have adopted a system of retrenchment that I hope they will carry on; and I trust that when we meet again, whenever that may be—either in April or in May, I suppose—the Government will bring down to the House such a scheme of retrenchment as we can approve of; and, for my own part, I can say that if they do that I shall be one of their supporters.

Mr. MARCHANT.—I wish to bring officially under the notice of the Government the matter of the Ngaire Swamp. A few hours ago I saw in the newspapers that the Taranaki Land Board proposed to lease twelve hundred acres of the swamp-land to Messrs. Campbell Brothers, who live near there. Now, I think it desirable the Government should, before this matter is finally accomplished, know the history of the swamp. There is about seven thousand acres of it altogether, and that block was leased six or seven years ago to Mr. Caverhill for a term of twenty-one years. He was to pay £200 a year for the first seven years, £400 for the second seven years, and £800 for the third term of seven years. But a swamp, of course, requires draining, and for some cause or other he was unable or unwilling to drain it, but just let it lie on his hands. The Government thought it desirable to acquire this block of land for settlement, and they paid Mr. Caverhill £1,000 about eighteen months ago, I think, to extinguish his rights. That was clearly done with the object of acquiring the freehold of the land. That must, of necessity, have been so, because there could have been no other object in paying Mr. Caverhill £1,000; but now it is proposed by the Land Board to lease twelve hundred acres of the very best part of this land to Messrs. Campbell. It is not going to be given away; it is going to be put up to auction, but at the very low upset rental of £35 a year for the twelve hundred acres. The lessees are expected to spend £100 during the first year in drainage, and £50 for a year or two after, I understand. But I hold it is improper that such a valuable property as the Ngaire Swamp should be dealt with in such a manner. It is eminently suited to be divided into small farms of one hundred or one hundred and fifty acres. The land is not wet—you can walk across it at almost any time of the year; and it is within a mile and a half of the railway-station. All the conditions point to this being one of the most suitable blocks possible for locating farmers of moderate means upon. I have already mentioned the matter to the Minister, but I wish officially to draw the attention of the Government to it, with the object of their inquiring carefully into the matter, to see whether it may not be possible to acquire the freehold. I understand there is every probability of the freehold being acquired before very long; but if large sums of money are spent on this property the Native owners will not be disposed to part with the freehold. Let us acquire that first, then drain it, and settle a large body of prosperous farmers upon it.

Mr. O'CONOR.—I desire to say a few words to the House on a matter I think of very considerable importance. It is very well known that for some years past I have given a very large amount of my time to pushing forward the coal industry; and I desire to say now that, as far as my convictions go, there is nothing of greater importance to the colony at the present juncture. To show that, I need only refer to the results that are taking place alongside of us, and I think they are well worth the attention of honourable members. At the present time this is the state of the trade at Newcastle, New South Wales: The export of coal thence has been,—

Year.	Tons.
1882	..	..	1,415,990
1883	..	..	1,463,280
1884	..	..	1,616,730
1885	..	..	1,652,136
1886	..	..	2,172,835

At the time when I visited Newcastle, for the purpose of seeing how trade was going there, they had inferior ports and inferior coal to ours, and now they have arrived at the result that over a million of money is paid in the employment of labour there for the output of coal. To achieve a result anything like equal to that would be of the greatest possible advantage to New Zealand, for it would give as much employment as the loans we are now tapering off. A million of money expended in labour in this country would give us an enormous result, not only in the employment of our people and in the consumption of our products, but in giving us an article of export which would counter-balance the great waste the colony is now undergoing in sending so much capital away to meet our engagements at Home. We have now advanced the Westport Harbour so much that a very marked improvement has been made. Another year of energetic progress would see us in a position to export our coal. For two years I have been struggling; for two years I have been constantly complaining to the late Government and asking them to have inquiries made, so that a stop might be put to the waste of time and of money which was going on there; but I could get nothing done. I want honourable members to understand distinctly that I do not wish my strictures to apply in the slightest degree to the present Harbour Board, and for this reason: that the results of the last four months' operations—since they have taken office—have to me been most satisfactory. In order to show that, I have had a return made out by the Secretary and Treasurer of the Board, showing the work which has been done. That return shows the output of stone on the breakwater from the commencement of the undertaking up to the present time. I will read the table, in order that honourable members may clearly understand what the results have been.

"Recapitulation.

"73,384 tons of limestone delivered in breakwater.

74,857 tons of granite delivered in breakwater.

148,241 tons in all.

"The items charged against the cost of stone as above are stripping, quarrying, and loading stone, haulage to breakwater, tipping, and maintenance of line. At the present output of stone 1s. per ton should be added for the following: Interest and sinking fund, 7d. per ton; fuel, explosives, &c., 5d. per ton; making the total cost per ton 8s. 1½d. + 2s. 9½d. ÷ 2 = 2s. 11·87d. + 12d. = 3s. 11·87d. The Cape Foulwind Railway is at the present time also returning a revenue for passenger and goods traffic of about £20 per week.

"CHAS. A. GREENLAND, Secretary and Treasurer.

When the present Board took office the cost of the stone was 4s. 1d. per ton, and the output was 5,000 tons a fortnight. The cost has diminished from 4s. 1d. until now the cost of the stone has come down to 1s. 11d., and, adding to that the cost of management and interest of money, the whole cost is 8s. 6d. a ton, and the output for the last four days was equal to the whole output for the fortnight, under the previous management, before the present Board came into office. That shows that, while the Board have reduced the cost of the stone by more than one-half, and at the same time reduced the general expenditure by over one-sixth, they have increased the amount of work done by more than double. I consider these results speak for themselves with regard to the difference in the system of working, and it would be very wrong of me under the circumstances to allow it to be thought that my condemnation, which is amply borne out by the verdict of the Committee, applies in any way to those who have been so successful in bringing about this change. There is another small matter to which I should like to refer, and which I had intended to go into more at length, expecting that there would be a debate on the Bill which it was rumoured would be brought down. The matter is the occurrence which took place between myself and the late Minister of Mines. It was represented that I was in some way importuning the Minister, and I desire to give an emphatic denial to that.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The honourable gentleman must not refer to a previous debate of the present session.

Mr. O'CONOR. — Without referring to a past debate, I wish to say that I had an interview with the late Minister of Mines, and on that occasion I reproached the honourable gentleman with the action he had taken in burking the inquiry.

Mr. SPEAKER. — The honourable gentleman is out of order if he is referring to a matter of debate this session.

Mr. O'CONOR. — Sir, I am referring to a personal matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. — You must not refer to a past debate under cover of a personal matter. There is a proper time for personal explanation, but this is not that time.

Mr. O'CONOR. — I am not referring to a past debate, but to an occurrence that took place.

Mr. SPEAKER. — Is not that a matter which was referred to in a previous debate?

Mr. O'CONOR. — I do not know.

Mr. SPEAKER. — It is my duty to know, and I hope it is unnecessary to remind you that you must obey the order of the Chair.

Mr. O'CONOR. — If you rule that I am out of order I shall, of course, say no more.

Mr. SPEAKER. — I consider you are out of order.

Major ATKINSON. — Might I ask the honourable gentleman to allow us to pass these Bills through, as we are keeping the other Chamber waiting?—and then he can make any statement he wishes on a motion for the adjournment of the House.

Dr. NEWMAN. — I wish to ask the honourable gentleman a question with regard to the Hospitals and Charitable Aid Act of 1884. Under that Act 264,000 acres were set apart as reserves for the purposes of the Act. For three years nothing has been done with regard to that reserve, and I should like the Premier to take the matter into consideration.

Major ATKINSON. — I will certainly take it into consideration, but I cannot state that the Government will be prepared to do anything in the matter until they have looked into the whole case.

Mr. PEARSON. — I should like to ask the Premier whether there is any necessity for raising the taxation for the purposes of charitable aid on personal property as well as on real property.

Major ATKINSON. — I think, myself, it should be levied on all property, and I do not at all agree with the present mode of levying it. Whether we can make any proposal which will have the effect the honourable gentleman refers to I cannot say; but the matter shall have careful consideration.

Mr. GUINNESS. — Will the honourable gentleman also bear in mind, when considering the question raised by the honourable member for Thorndon, that the House the other evening negatived a proposal of mine to set apart endowments for Charitable Aid Boards, and the honourable member for Thorndon was one of those who voted against that proposition?

Major ATKINSON. — The endowment is already set apart by the Act.

Mr. GUINNESS. — That is so; but what I desired was a further extension of the endowment: and that was negatived. I also wish to ask the Minister of Mines whether the Government intend to give effect to the report of the Goldfields and Mines Committee, which recommends that no action should be taken by the Minister in regard to closing any of the schools of mines that have been established throughout the colony. That Committee, as the honourable gentleman will no doubt recollect, reported that owing to the lateness of the session there was no time to make the necessary exhaustive inquiries before they could decide what schools should be continued. In many districts on the West Coast schools of mines have been established. At Greymouth there is a school with a very large number of members, and in a flourishing condition. The people there have learned with alarm that it is not the intention of the Government to continue the allowance to these schools of mines.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—I think I have expressed myself sufficiently plainly in this House already on that subject—to the effect that the Cabinet, whilst they would recognise any existing liabilities in this direction, only intended to retain the schools of mines at Reefton and the Thames.

Mr. GUINNESS.—And in regard to all other schools?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—We will carry out engagements only.

Mr. MONK.—I think the sooner Mr. Speaker leaves the chair the better, because the honourable member for Taranaki has been trying to shove the public treasury into the Ngaire Swamp.

Major ATKINSON.—I should like to make a short statement in regard to the Ngaire Swamp. The matter is receiving the careful attention of the Government, and if it is found not to be advisable to let it in the way proposed the Waste Lands Board will be consulted before anything further is done.

Bill read a second and a third time.

AUSTRALIAN AND NEW ZEALAND CABLE.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I have also to make a statement with regard to the cable question.
